Miss Verinder listened attentively till I had done. She then thanked me very prettily for my advice, but informed me at the same time that it was impossible for her to follow it.

"May I ask," I said, "what objection you see to following it?"

She hesitated—and then met me with a question on her side.

"Suppose you were asked to express your opinion of Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's conduct?" she began.

"Yes?"

"What would you call it?"

"I should call it the conduct of a meanly deceitful man."

"Mr. Bruff! I have believed in that man. I have promised to marry that man. How can I tell him he is mean, how can I tell him he has deceived me, how can I disgrace him in the eyes of the world after that? I have committed myself by ever thinking of him as my husband. If I say what you tell me to say to him—I am owning that I have degraded myself to his face. I can't do that—after what has passed between us—I can't do that! The shame of it would be nothing to him. But the shame of it would be unendurable to me."

Here was another of the marked peculiarities in her character disclosing itself to me without reserve. Here was her sensitive horror of the bare contact with any thing mean, blinding her to every consideration of what she owed to herself, hurrying her into a false position which might compromise her in the estimation of all her friends! Up to this time I had been a little diffident about the propriety of the advice I had given to her. But, after what she had just said, I had no sort of doubt that it was the best advice that could have been offered; and I felt no sort of hesitation in pressing it on her again.

She only shook her head, and repeated her objection in other words.

"He has been intimate enough with me to ask me to be his wife. He has stood high enough in my estimation to obtain my consent. I can't tell him to his face that he is the most contemptible of living creatures, after that!"

"But, my dear Miss Rachel," I remonstrated, "it's equally impossible for you to tell him that you withdraw from your engagement, without giving some reason for it."

"I shall say that I have thought it over, and that I am satisfied it will be best for both of us if we part."

"No more than that?"

"No more."

"Have you thought of what he may say, on his side?"

"He may say what he pleases."

It was impossible not to admire her delicacy and her resolution, and it was equally impossible not to see that she was exposing herself in the wrong. I entreated her to consider her own position. I reminded her that she would be exposing herself to the most odious misconstruction of her motives. "You can't brave public opinion," I said, "at the command of private feeling."

"I can," she answered. "I have done it already."

"What do you mean?"

"You have forgotten the Moonstone, Mr. Bruff. Have I not braved public opinion, there, with my own private conviction to help me?"

Her answer silenced me for the moment. I set me trying to trace the explanation of her conduct, at that time, to the right motive. Some one, out of the strange avowal which had just escaped her, I might perhaps have done it when I was younger. I certainly couldn't do it now.

I tried a last remonstrance, before we returned to the house. She was just as immovable as ever. My mind was in a strange state of two feelings about her when I left her that day. She was obstinate; she was wrong. She was interesting; she was distressed; she was deeply to be pitied. I made her promise to write to me the moment she had any news to send. And I went back to my business in London, with a mind exceedingly ill at ease.

On the evening of my return, before it was possible for me to receive any communication, I was surprised by a visit from Mr. Ablewhite the elder, and was informed that Mr. Godfrey had got his dismissal—and had accepted it—that very day.

With the view I already took of the case, the bare fact stated in this manner, as I have underlined, revealed Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's motive for submission as plainly as if he had acknowledged it himself. He had got his dismissal for money; and he needed it by a given time. Rachel's income, which would have helped him to any thing else, would not help him to that. And Rachel had accordingly released herself, without encountering a moment's serious opposition on his part. I am told that I showed my surprise at this action, I ask, in my turn, What other theory will account for his giving up a marriage which would have maintained him in splendor for the rest of his life?

Any conclusion I might otherwise have felt at the liberty to form in which things had now taken was effectually checked by what passed at my interview with old Mr. Ablewhite.

He came, of course, to know whether I could give him any explanation of Miss Verinder's extraordinary conduct. I was needless to say that I was quite unable to afford him the information he wanted. The annoyance which I thus inflicted, by disappointing the expectations formed in our interview with his son, threw Mr. Ablewhite off his guard. Both his looks and his language betrayed, more plainly than I could have told him a mercies man to deal with, when he joined the ladies at Brighton the next day.

I had a restless night—wondering what I ought to do next. How my reflections ended, and how thoroughly well founded my distrust of Mr. Murthwaite proved to be, in terms of information which (as I am told) have already been put fitly in their proper place by that accomplished person, Miss Clack, I have only to add—in completion of her narrative—that Miss Verinder found a quiet and repose which she sadly needed, poor thing, at the house at Hunsgtead. She honored us by making a long stay. My wife and daughters were charmed with her; and, when the executors decided on the appointment of a new guardian, I feel sincere pride and pleasure in recording that my guest and my family parted like old friends, on either side.

CHAPTER II.

THE next thing I have to do, is to present such additional information as I possess on the subject of the Moonstone, as will enable more correctly, on the subject of the Indian plot to steal the Diamond. The little that I have to tell is (so I think I have already said) of some importance, nevertheless, in respect of its bearing very remarkably on events which are still to come.

About a week or ten days after Miss Verinder had left us, one of my clerks entered the private room at my office, with a card in his hand, and announced that a gentleman was below, who wanted to speak to me.

I looked at the card. There was a foreign name written on it, which has escaped my memory. It was followed by a line written in English at the bottom of the card, which I remember perfectly well:

"Recommended by Mr. Septimus Luker."

The audacity of a person in Mr. Luker's position presuming to recommend any body to me, struck me for the moment by surprise, that I set aside for the present, wondering whether my own eyes had not deceived me. The clerk, observing my hesitation, favored me with the result of his own observation of the stranger, who was waiting down stairs.

"He's a remarkable looking man, Sir. So dark in the complexion that we all set him down to the office for an Indian, or something of that sort."

Associating the clerk's idea with the very offensive line inscribed on the card in my hand, I instantly suspected that the Moonstone was at the bottom of Mr Luker's recommendation, and of the stranger's visit at my office. To the astonishment of my clerk, I at once decided on granting an interview to the gentleman below.

In justification of the highly unprofessional sacrifice to curiosity which I thus made, I can permit me to remind any body who may read these lines, that no living person (in England, at any rate) can claim to have had such an intimate connection with the romance of the Indian Diamond as mine has been. I was trusted with the secret of Colonel Herncastle's plan for escaping assassination. I received the Colonel's letters, periodically reporting himself a living man. I drove his body from the Moonstone to Miss Verinder. I persuaded his executor to act, on the chance that the jewel might prove to be a valuable security for a loan. And, lastly, I combated Mr. Franklin Blake's scruples, and induced him to be the means of transporting the Diamond in his own pocket to London. If any one can claim a prescriptive right of interest in the Moonstone, and in every thing connected with it, I think it is hardly to be denied that I am the man.

The moment my mysterious client was shown in I felt as strongly convinced that I was in the presence of one of the three Indians—probably of the chief. He was carefully dressed in European costume. But a swarthy complexion, his long lithe figure, and his grave and graceful politeness of manner were enough to betray his Oriental origin to any observer who looked at him.

I pointed to a chair, and begged to be informed of the nature of his business with me.

After first apologizing—in an excellent selection of English words—for the liberty which he had taken in coming to me, the Indian produced a small parcel the outer covering of which was of cloth of gold. Removing this and a second wrapping of loose silken fabric, he placed a little box, or casket, on my table, most beautifully and richly inlaid in jewels, on an ebony ground.

"I have a letter to show you," he said, "to ask you to lend me some money. And I leave this as an assurance to you that my debt will be paid back."

He opened the casket, and added, "And you apply to me," I rejoined, "at Mr. Luker's recommendation?"

The Indian bowed.

"May I ask how it is that Mr. Luker himself did not advance the money that you require?"

"Mr. Luker informed me, Sir, that he had no money to lend."

"And so he recommended you to come to me?"

The Indian, in his turn, pointed to the card. "It is written there," he said.

Bright and clear, and thoroughly to the purpose! If the Moonstone had been in my possession, this Oriental gentleman would have murdered me, I am inclined to think, without a moment's hesitation. At the same time, and barring that slight drawback, I am bound to testify that he left a most favorable impression on a client. He might not have respected my life. But he did what none of my own countrymen had ever done in all my experience of them—he talked to me like a man.

"I am sorry," I said, "that you should have had the trouble of coming to me. Mr. Luker is quite mistaken in sending you here. I am trusted, like other men of my profession, with other people's money; but I never lend it to strangers, and I never lend it on such a security as you have produced."

Far from attempting, as other people would have done, to induce me to relax my own rules, the Indian merely made me another bow, and wrapped up his box in its two coverings without a word of protest. He rose—this admirable occasion rose to go, the moment I had answered him!

"Will your condescension toward a stranger, excuse me for asking one question," he said, "before I take my leave?"

I bowed on my side. Only one question at parting! The average in my experience, was fifty.

"Supposing, Sir, it had been possible (and customary) for you to lend me the money," he said, "in what space of time would it have been possible (and customary) for me to pay it back?"

"Actually, in the usual course pursued in this country," I answered, "you would have been entitled to pay the money back (if you liked) in one year's time from the date at which it was first advanced to you."

The Indian made me a last bow, the lowest of all—and suddenly and softly walked out of the room.

It was done in a moment. In a noiseless, supple, cat-like way, which a little startled me, I own. As soon as I was composed enough to think, I arrived at one distinct conclusion in reference to that extraordinary comprehensible visitor who had favored me with a call.

His face, voice, and manner—how I was in his company—were under such perfect control that they set all scrutiny at defiance. But he had given me one chance of looking under the smooth outer surface of him, for all that. He had not shown the slightest sign of attempting to fix any thing that I had said to him in his mind, until I mentioned the time at which it was customary to permit the earliest repayment, on the part of the debtor, of money that had been advanced as a loan. When I gave him that piece of information, he looked me straight in the face, while I was speaking, for the first time. The inference I drew from this was—that he had a special purpose in asking me his last question, and a special interest in hearing my answer to it. The more carefully I reflected on what had passed between us, the more I shrewdly suspected the production of the casket, and the application for the loan, of having been mere formalities, designed to pave the way for the parting inquiry addressed to me.

I had satisfied myself of the correctness of this conclusion—and was trying to get on a step further, and penetrate the Indian's motives next—when a letter was brought to me, which proved to be of even less importance than Mr. Septimus Luker himself. He asked my pardon in terms of sickening servility, and assured me that he could explain matters to my satisfaction, if I would honor him by consenting to a personal interview.

I made another unprofessional sacrifice to mere curiosity. I honored him by making an appointment at my office, for the next day.

Mr. Luker was, in every respect, such an inferior creature to the Indian—he was so vulgar, so ugly, so cringing, and so proxy—that he is hardly worth describing. He never was of any use, in these pages. The substance of what he had to tell me may be fairly stated as follows:

The Indian, after I had satisfied the first of the Indian, Mr. Luker had been favored with a call from that accomplished gentleman. In spite of his European disguise, Mr. Luker had instantly identified his visitor with the chief of the three Indians, who had formerly annoyed him by loitering about his house, and who had put him to alternative but to consult a magistrate. From this startling discovery he had rushed to the coincidence (instantly, although I am bound to say, must certainly be in the company of one of the three men, who had blindfolded him, gagged him, and robbed him of his banker's receipt. The result was that he became quite paralyzed with terror, and that he finally believed his best hope had come.

In his side, the Indian appeared in the character of a perfect stranger. He produced the little casket, and made exactly the same application for a loan which he had already made to me. In the speediest way of getting rid of him, Mr. Luker had referred the disciple to the money-lender. The Indian had thereupon asked to be informed of the best and safest person to apply to for the loan he wanted. Mr. Luker had answered that the best and safest person, in such cases, was usually a respectable solicitor. Asked to name some such individual of that chimerical description, Mr. Luker had mentioned me—for the one simple reason that, in the extremity of his terror, mine was the first name which occurred to him.

"The perspiration was pouring off me like rain, Sir," the wretched creature concluded. "I didn't know what I was talking about. I hope I hope you'll look over it, Mr. Bruff, Sir, in consideration of my having been really and truly frightened out of my wits."

I excused the fellow graciously enough. It was the readiest way of releasing myself from his society. Before he left me, I maintained him to make one inquiry. Had the Indian said any thing noticeable at the moment of quitting Mr. Luker's house?

Yes! The Indian had put precisely the same question to Mr. Luker, at parting, which he had put to me—receiving, of course, the same answer as the answer which I had given to him.

What did it mean? Mr. Luker's explanation gave me no assistance toward solving the problem. My own unaided ingenuity, consulted next, proved quite unequal to grapple with the difficulty. I said a dismal farewell to my client, and, until I went up stairs, in no very genial frame of mind, little suspecting that the way to my dressing-room, and the way to discovery, meant, on this particular occasion, one and the same thing.

THORNE'S POOR RELATIONS.

THE old Brewery burned down to the ground. Many rejoiced thereat, but they might have known that their joy would be short-lived. That from the ashes would arise a formidable structure which would make the friends of temperance look grave.

It seemed as if the whole town were abroad on the night of the fire. And indeed the conflagration was a sight to behold. The immense quantities of grain stored in the buildings adjacent to the Brewery, the whiskey and the high wines, imparted a splendor to the flame which was worth seeing as the cost of a night's sleep. And what a spectacle to eyes unused to rage effects those flocks of birds which circled round the scene of desolation on golden and silvered wings!

Most persons gazing on the miserable forged their individual heart-ache and worry. Even Uncle Thorne did. He lived on the narrow street which led down to the Brewery, and came out and watched the fire with others until morning. He had good reason for being on the alert. A sudden change in the wind, or even a slight increase, might send an unlucky spark into his premises and do damage there.

Not persons gazing on the miserable forged their individual heart-ache and worry. Even Uncle Thorne did. He lived on the narrow street which led down to the Brewery, and came out and watched the fire with others until morning. He had good reason for being on the alert. A sudden change in the wind, or even a slight increase, might send an unlucky spark into his premises and do damage there.

Not persons gazing on the miserable forged their individual heart-ache and worry. Even Uncle Thorne did. He lived on the narrow street which led down to the Brewery, and came out and watched the fire with others until morning. He had good reason for being on the alert. A sudden change in the wind, or even a slight increase, might send an unlucky spark into his premises and do damage there.

Not persons gazing on the miserable forged their individual heart-ache and worry. Even Uncle Thorne did. He lived on the narrow street which led down to the Brewery, and came out and watched the fire with others until morning. He had good reason for being on the alert. A sudden change in the wind, or even a slight increase, might send an unlucky spark into his premises and do damage there.

with all these people who crowd the ferry-boats, and the cars, and the stages—the streets, and theatres, and churches; have they all some heartache? some smarting disappointment? does a shadowy fear follow the steps of every one, and haunt the days and nights? Is it a world of sorrow? but is there not sure deliverance for all? Death, I mean not by the gateway thou dost keep! Hear the story of George Thorne.

The fire occurred on Saturday night.

Next morning, at nine o'clock, the sexton, he was Uncle Thorne, was in the church porch ringing the three bells. Years ago this sexton climbed the dark belfry stairs to ring the bell for the congregation that worshiped in the house of the Lord below. But one dark night he fell and broke his leg. Every body said then, what is shame it was that the steep narrow stair had never been divided with a railing, for many times Thorne had predicted that just such an accident as this would befall him.

Now that it had happened the rope was brought down from the belfry, and the sexton rang the bell standing in the porch where every body could see him. It would have been a less acceptable sight to some eyes had the ringer been any body besides old Thorne. Priests and children, as a general thing, keep the machinery of their winking dolls out of sight, and all people of good taste conceal their skeletons; on the same principle the bell-ringer should have come back unseen to a corner, or behind a door; but there he was in the porch, and there he would be until he ceased to ring for others, and was taken away miserable and people didn't mind, because he was old Thorne.

On Sunday, having rung the children into Sunday-school at nine, the congregation into church at half past ten, and again at two P.M., he limped homeward, having depended on young Mr. Matson to lock up the church after service, and hang the key he knew where. Young Mr. Matson was in Uncle Thorne's confidence, his boundary partner, one might say; for he had the management of the garden next the church, and whenever the pews grew forth a benevolent uncertain sound the young man would cry "Rhematism!" drop his tools, and run into the porch and lay his hand on the knotted rope to keep good purpose that people were set to thinking of the sexton with wondering admiration.

Thorne had many reasons for discussing himself that afternoon. He had not taken cold watching the fire; he did not feel the loss of a night's sleep; but he had met two or three neighbors myself in particular among the many hanging about the smoking pit, and he thought that he might be of service to them. He understood their deep feelings, and little as was the respect he felt for all the Brewery represented, he had secretly experienced a sense of loss and humiliation as he looked down toward the ruin, which made him feel kindly drawn toward more serious mourners.

As he passed out at the gate he saw Uncle Rockaway leaning over the picket fence, his arm in a sling. He surprised Ralph—that was clear; had Ralph suspected that the sexton would return so early in the day he would not have been found hanging over the fence in that disconsolate manner.

When he saw old George the necessity of speech was upon him. He, Rockaway, had shed more tears over that picket standing there these five minutes than he had shed in all the years that lay between him and his childhood; but his eyes were shaded, and of course no one would suspect him? There was something in his voice, though, that made George more than commonly cautious in his answers; and, commonly, it must be said of him, he was caution itself.

"You're going to have a heap of strawberries out of that 'ere patch," Ralph said. "What the deuce do you do with 'em all?"

"They don't rot for one thing," answered George. "They get ate up mighty easy. I planted for my poor relations, you know."

Any body but Ralph must have seen that Thorne's voice was more pleasantry than it was very well known that Thorne had no relations—but to hear him talk you might have supposed he had an entire town-hound full.

"I didn't know that you had any folks," said Ralph. "I never see any of 'em about."

"You didn't? What a poor beggar you took me for, Rockaway! No folks!" Thorne spoke precisely as though in the sense of this very fact had not made him miserable many a night; it was very well known that Thorne had no relations—but to hear him talk you might have supposed he had an entire town-hound full.

"Come in! the house," he added, leading the way. "It's not a very pretty bad piece of business for some folks, that fire last night. Not so for Kimberly though as for others."

"That's so," said Ralph, as he walked up the graveled path behind Thorne. "Mr. Kimberly's well off enough. I wish I had what he throws away."

"You'd be rich," returned Thorne, a little more thoughtful even than before. "How far did that hurt go, Ralph?" pointing to the arm in the sling.

"Too far, 'cause it didn't go far'd enough," was the answer. George understood Ralph to mean that since it didn't go so far as to kill him, the hurt was a failure. And he, moreover, was not surprised that Ralph should feel just that.

"I got a tall beam-end on to my shoulder," Ralph went on; "it came near tearing it up by the roots—you can see it didn't. The old Brewery might as well be gone for's I'm concerned. I couldn't do nothin' now, brewin' or no brewin' —not if brewin' would go halves. When you got your leg broke, George, 'twas a good job for you."

"Yes," said Uncle Thorne, reflecting, "twas a good job! I never knew the worth of that leg till it was gone, certin. If you mean it's good to find out the value of what we've got when we haven't got it no longer. But 'cording to my notion, it's best to be thankful, and understand what our good fortin is, as we go along."

"Yur had the church to your bark," said Ralph, when the Brewery gets on its legs again I'll get a chore or so to do, but now you see I'm out in a gale with my ears broke. With the little gal—"

"Where is Gussy?" asked George, with a new tone in his voice—a tone that was not almost, but quite tender.

"I went out of the house to git rid of her," answered Ralph. "I couldn't stand it looking at that child. My fingers would itch to see a sewer her questions. I couldn't get 'em to. Gussy never see a fire afore. George—I wouldn't wonder if the time had come when she'd have to go to the place for such."

"It's a comfortable place," said George, cheerfully. "I was to one of the services in our church of 'em, and we walked up to their building afterward, the church folks, I mean, did—it looked as neat as a pin. I reckon it was so old and pleasant I felt as if it was almost a privilege to be there."

"It don't take me that way. I git a feeling in my chest as if I should bust, sometimes, jest a-hearin' along with 'Gus."

"But she wouldn't feel that way, you know. I never see smidgener or cheerfuller girls in my life than was there, Rockaway."

But it seemed the more cheery George's words the deeper Ralph's gloom; his head sunk, he looked even better, no other than he was, a hopeless, ruined man. "I wish I was dead, or I were, ruined himself? That made the case no better. Oh, did it not make every thing the worse?

George thought and thought. At last he said:

"Look at here"—then he paused: he might be wrong, but it seemed to him that he had had a revelation; he was almost afraid to say it. Ralph Rockaway was certainly the last person in the world to whom, naturally, it would seem agreeable he should say such things—but—"Look at here," he repeated; "what have I got this house and my own here for? nobody to live in, but except when Miss Bowles comes over to chore round? You're kind o' done up, Ralph. We've known each other forty year. We never had any misunderstandings—your mind your business and I mind mine—couldn't—couldn't there room round for you and 'Gus?" he overcame by force of will.

"Thorne," said Ralph, not replying instantly, and when he did so raising his eyes from the ground and looking sternly at his friend, like a half-frightened, doubtful manner, "if I thought you meant it I really don't know what I'd say to it."

"You mustn't say nothin'," said Uncle Thorne, rising lastily. "I'll go and see what the little gal's doin', and bring her round if I find her. You sit there and wait for me, and don't till I come back."

"Rockaway the day the better the dead," he thought, as he limped off. "I've been expecting 'em along for quite a while, and now I guess they're here."

And who should he mean by "they" if not the poor relations for whom he used jokingly to say he was keeping his little Paradise of a place in order.

"The child won't make no noise, for one thing," he reflected, as he walked along, his brown eyes taking note from under their shaggy brows of every group of children, men, and women as he passed. At last, having approached the ruins quite as near as he cared to do, he stopped and asked a little girl if she could tell where Gussy was.

"Gussy Rockaway? to hum. I see her going in."

The house in which Rockaway lived was dismal enough, though orderly and neat. Orderliness and gloom. Uncle George Thorne felt chilled as he opened the door and looked in. There sat the little girl before a cold stove, and as she had just kindled a fire: drooping and sad she looked. The furnishing of the language by which she made herself intelligible to others, and others to her, and for a few seconds she surveyed her with a sad commandment. And truly for a man of his age he did depart himself oddly. For the first thing the sexton did after he had entered the house, by means of a smile, was to shut the damper of the stove, take off the tea-kettle, fasten down the windows, wrap the hat of broad brim which he had worn about the table in a towel, and then put on her head the hat she had taken off but now, and over her shoulders fasten the shawl she had taken up from the chair where she had dropped it; this done he extended his hand, and Uncle Thorne would never, never in this life, forget the emotion he felt when she bravely took it, and held it with such womanly confidence, such childlike docility, and walked out with him: and then what did she think when she saw him lock the door of the dismal house and put the key in his pocket?

What should she have done? It was all right, she believed. Mr. Thorne was going to take her to her grandfather, who got that ugly hard hurt sight. She was not very much surprised, for our dull old world was always a wonderful world to the deaf and dumb girl; the strangest things were always happening in it. Talk about fairy-land!

When she saw that it was really to Mr. Thorne's own house that they were going, into the lovely garden which was such a blessing to that street, a male servant opened the young door, and then made old Thorne feel that he must stoop down and kiss it. But the feeling sufficed for him. Indeed, where was the difference between it and the act?

The smile on her face assumed another character, and moved him still more, and in another way, when he led Gussy to the porch, and she saw her grandfather actually sitting there.

Well—well! perhaps the story shall be very short—the old wreck, Ralph Rockaway, was patched up in that deck-yard, until pronounced sea-worthy again. But those who so pronounced knew very well what they meant. It was not as a ship of the Royal line—a man-of-war—that the old tug would get a commission for deep waters. It must be content henceforth to do a coasting service, and in a small way at that.

One day when Uncle Thorne had learned so much of the sign language as to be able to converse with his little handmaiden, she said to him:

"Folks used to tell you kept this place so beautiful because you had relations you were expecting along. When are they coming?"

Why did she ask? Was she thinking with dread that when the new friends came the old must be gone? She had looked more than usually thoughtful before she asked the question, and she waited for his answer with a gravity, but for the patience of it, too painful to think of. While waiting Gussy looked up at the stone-walls of the cottage which were embroidered so thickly with vines, and she noticed that among the branches of woodbine, and under the broad leaves, more than one dear little bird had built a nest. And indeed, she thought, how could they help building there? Was it better to love and be loved, or to love and have?—she might have questioned Mr. Tennyson.

"They've come, I guess," said George to himself, and when he looked at him for an answer, this was the answer he had made. Yes—she has letters had arrived! She needn't doubt about it—they had arrived, or were to stay.

Other friends had come and gone—counted also by him as akin—mourners who gathered bouquets from his garden to place on the graves of their lost ones; many a wreath of immortelles flowers he had himself fashioned to lay on the bosom of the dead, and offer in rest to the dead body of Christian brother or sister on its way to the grave: many a time the fruits which ripened on his vines had been given with contentment to the fever-parched and the food-loathing; he had all his life been serving his poor relations, many of whom had been visibly mourners and poor, but lived in very gay places surrounded by fine shows of wealth, but now these had come to abide with him—they had come to stay, the apprehension was lost, the fear had vanished.

A lady who had grown up under Thorne's eye as a child, and was now Sunday-school boy as a child and then as a teacher, and had got in young Mr. Matson to help him ring her into wedlock, and a very pretty one she was that old bell (half hour) stood on his gravel-walk one morning looking at the humming-birds as they darted in and out among the honeysuckle flowers.

"Uncle Thorne," said she, at the end of her reflective observation, "how did all this loveliness come? when I was last time I was this way, yes, it was a good while ago, to be sure! there was only the stone-house and the beginning of things. It's a wonder place of beauty now. What work it must have cost you!"

"Child, I went to work here, ma'am," said he, "it was a heap of hard work, and that's the truth. And I didn't know one flower from another. It's just growed, you see, on the place has. I can't tell one of them flowers from another, by the color of 'em. I'm color-blind..... I've got my poor relations to thank—that's what made me acquainted with so many of my relations."

The lady pondered a moment on these seemingly inconsistent, unexplained words; she caught the queer smile lurking about Thorne's mouth.

"Ah, now," she said, with another smile, so different from the last that no two knew what heartache was, and disappointment, and apprehension, and fear—"Ah, now, Uncle Thorne, your secret is out! you've had many, many poor relations than I have—but oh, you've treated them better! I'm poor enough to receive something of your kind, but I've not a rose: a rose or two of this garden. I wouldn't if I could, have it without a thorn."

Uncle Thorne died—for in due time the apprehension was verified and the fear pursued no longer, because it overtook and fell upon him and his dwelling—died and became a young woman to follow him as a mourning daughter to the grave: all the church folk, and that girl besides, to hold the pall, and the lady lying host, and it was not a lonely death-bed, for he saw tender love in the dear eyes that watched him. The thing he had come there to do—Simple soul, did he not believe it would be so? God bless to us the memory of old George Thorne!

HUMOR OF THE DAY.

QUEER KIND OF LOVE.—A nervous electrician.

An Irishman, fresh from Hibernia, caught a bumble bee in his hand, supposing it to be a humming-bird. "Och," he exclaimed, "how hot his fut is!"

A PAGE ALWAYS GROWING.—The Page of History.

A chap who was told by a clergyman to "remember his wife," replied that he had trouble enough with his own without remembering other men's wives.

A SITTER IN TIME.—The latest novelty in sewing-machines is one that will follow the thread of an argument.

"First class in philosophy stand up. Brown, what is it?"

"Life consists of money, a horse, plenty of wine and liquor, and a handsome wife."

"What is poverty?"

"The condition in which genius receives from a discriminating public."

"What is time?"

"Going regularly to church in good weather, and doing nothing when you please without allowing a return of the compliment."

"What is fame?"

"A six-line puff in a newspaper."

A CURIOUS FACT.—It appears that three young gentlemen of Glasgow, Scotland, have been cast in prison for thirty days for theft of a bow. In spite, however, of the philosophical appearance of the animal, and the direct testimony of possession, no one could find out the true owner of the bow after seven days' search. The sheriff properly held that it was a find and the supposed "theft" has developed into three jail-birds.

DEFINITIONS OF CHARACTER.

Fine Fellow—The man who advertises in your paper, the man who never refuses to lend you money, and the fellow who is counting your notes.

Gentle People—The young lady who lets her mother do the ironing for fear of spoiling her hands, the miss who wears thin shoes on a rainy day, and the young gentleman who is ashamed to be seen walking with his father.

Industrious People—The young lady who reads romances in bed, the friend who is always engaged when you call, and the correspondent who can not find time to answer your letter.

Ungrateful Correspondent—The fat man in an omnibus, a well man on a crowd, and a short man on a parade.

Social Friend—A man who never shuts you the door, a man who does not like to be shot at, and the steamboat company that runs the Sound.

Disgusted Man—A chit in a country town, a middleman on a steamboat dock, and a railroad company on examination-day.

Irreverent People—Woman by that tyrant man, boys by their parents and teachers, and all poor people by society in general.

Unhappy People—Old bachelors and old maids.

Boastful Person—The husband who does not praise his wife's cheerling, the wife who blushes her husband's boots, and the man who thinks you do him much honor.

Mean People—The man who kicks people when they are down, and the schoolmaster who refuses to pay for his paper.

Sensible People—You and I.

WHO, INDEED!—We heard the other day of a gentleman who "died without a will." "Died without a will," thought we; who ever heard of a person who died "with a will?"

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE—Bonbon.

When Mr. Moody (Headkeeper Moody) was on a journey in the mountains of Massachusetts, he called on a brother in the ministry, and, on his knocking, he was told by the servant girl that the "minister" was not at home, but that supposed very glad to see him.

"Why, what is the matter?" said Mr. Moody.

"Why, I should be very glad to have you stop and preach for me to-morrow, but I don't know what to say to such a case."

"Why, what is the matter?" said Mr. Moody.

"Why, you see, I have got so much a habit of rising on Sunday morning and saying, 'Dear friends,' that it is impossible to say a stranger."

"If that is all, you may well stop and preach for me," said Mr. Moody's reply.

When the Sabbath day came, and Mr. Moody had opened the meeting and named his text, he looked round on the congregation.

"My brethren, I am going to speak to two sorts of fishes to-day—sinners and sinners. Sinners, I am going to give you a certain fish, and I would have you give good attention.

When he had preached to them so long as he thought best, he said:

"Brethren, sinners, I have done with you now; you may take your fish and go, and I will now turn to speak to you please." But all tarried and heard him through.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS—Domestic quarrels.

Some time ago Huntsville, Alabama, was under municipal law permitting only druggists to sell intoxicating liquors, and then only on the prescription of a physician. It happened on a cold, rainy day, that a third chap, whose name might be Johnson, was drummer from a New York dry-goods house, dropped into Huntsville, and, wishing to get a drink, wrote out a note and sent a little darkey to the drug-store for a bottle of "Old Rye." The boy returned minus the money, but with information that a physician's order was required. The drummer then wrote out a note to "M.D." to Johnson's name attached to the note, and sent it back. Upon forthcoming, the boy got into conversation with Johnson, the druggist addressed him as "doctor." He answered, "Old Johnson, you know I'm no doctor." "But the M.D. to your name testifies to it." "Only stood for 'Mighty Dry,'" was the cool reply.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.—"Blowing off" one's knowledge.

It is said that kisses, like the force of philosophers, vary. Some are as hot as a coal of fire, some as sweet as honey, some as milk, some as tasteless as lukewarm suds. Stolen kisses have more nutmeg and ginger in them than any other sort, and are consequently the most enjoyable of all.

"Patrick," said a priest to an Irishman, "how much hir will you take for Biddy?" "Well," said Pat, "I may as well confess to your reverence for the whole stock, for my wife and I are going to take the rest of it on the first dark night."

HOW TO WIN.—"Sukey, you've got an easy life of it, I'm sure," said Mrs. Partington. "Nothing else like a lady all day long, with nothing to do but knit and work and look pretty song."

"I do what I can, ma'am, and do it cheerfully," said Sukey. "One can but be employed, and you, when you are young, were employed in knitting socks, and the Byzingtons, when he is spitting with his father, are in the better service of the Lord, for in every thing depends on the way you take work. I love my labor, ma'am."

A certain man was married; he lost his wife and had a stone erected over her grave. He married a second time, and when she died he had a mattress spilt, and it was carved for the two departed. He proposed to a third, and the lady quickly remarked, "I do not believe that stone will split again." A refusal.

AN EXCESSIVE TRAIT.—A lady's walking dress.

A "great brute of a husband" advertised in the morning papers for a strong, able-bodied man to hold his wife's tongue.

NONSENSE PROVERBS.

What's in the pot mustn't be told to the pan.

There's a mote for every muffin.

A clear song and no shiver.

Rest and rust go together.

Set a beggar on horseback, and he will chast the livery-stable keeper.

There's a B in every bonnet.

First catch your hare, then cook him.

Every plum has its pudding.

Short grass is the sweetest kind.

It's a long lane that has no blackberries.

Wind and weather come from heaven.

A dower in the kitchen-hole is worth two on the bush.

Round robin is a sly bird.

There's a shiny lining to every hat.

The longest day must have an end.

You must take the pips with the orange.

It's a true adage that kisses the cook herself.

No rose without a murderer.

Better to sing like a bird than not to marry at all.

Too many followers spoil the cook. (N.B. This is not nonsense.)

HOW TO IMPROVE A LADY'S LOOKS—Put one hundred thousand dollars into her pocket.

THE PRUSE MINISTER—One who eschews long sermons.

A doting mother of a waggish boy, having bestirred a lot of nice preserves labeled them, "Put up by Mrs. ——." However, the youngster discovered them, soon ate the contents of one bottle, and wrote on the bottom of the label, "Put down by Johnny L——."

MAY DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

"I CAN NOT SING THE OLD SONGS."—[SEE PAGE 314.]

MAY-DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

ALL nature seems to know when May has come; and May-Day is Nature's holiday as well as the children's—at least it is so in our climate. The naked severities of winter have then vanished, and the earth is newly born. Then begins that procession of growth which culminates in the pomps of glorious summer. Then Nature's birth period—the time of beginning for flowers, and for the singing birds, for the humming bees, and for the unfolding forest leaves. The whole of the world is felt again, as if it were a fresh start—as if all things had once suffered death and were now bursting forth into life, admitting into resurrection. It is therefore a season of hope. We have a confident assurance of God "continuing in the garden"—not in the garden where hide the guilty ADAM and EVE, but in that where the innocent children are playing—and proclaiming—"There has been an Easter-morn! Come and see that the dead are indeed risen!"

If we are in this season carried even so back to the freshness of our childhood, and we seem to be again among the well-known hills, dancing round the May-pole or gathering May-flowers. In his illustration of May-Day in the Country MR. HERRICK has been happy in the choice of his subject; and earlier has pleasantly framed in the happy little group with the trailing arbutus, one of the prime objects of a May-Day's search.

"Who, in the merrie days of May," asks a contemporary, "does not feel a stir in the pulse, and recall a memory of happy days in the past, when it was a pleasure to go in search of the earliest of the spring flowers, this token of sunny days and leafy woods, of balmy winds and smiling skies? Accordingly, there is a scholarly air close by the side of the snow-drift, or the gnarled roots of an ancient forest tree, which concealed the treasure; and sometimes on a sunny hillside you caught the beauty of its laughing eye, and inhaled the fragrance of its dainty breath. The wild woods rang with the merry shouts of those who, heeding low, had pulled from under the leaves vast quantities, and among tufts of rough, roundish leaves were the delicate blossoms delicately fashioned by fairy fingers, flushed with modest pink, and breathing the spicy odors of Araby the Blest. No garden ever trained this darling of the forest, no hot-house culture has ever given it a simple touch, but its beauty, grace, and fragrance it surpasses the gorgeous inmates of the gardens. Its pure lips are made of ivory and its glistens like a star, and its color is that of the morning dawn. Poets have immortalized it, painters have transferred its glowing tints to canvas; but poem and picture can not set the blood bounding in the veins as does the sight of a little clump of its starry blossoms."

We shall not attempt to put in words the story which MR. HERRICK has so well told in his picture. We will only recommend our boys to the first of May our young readers are all enjoying themselves as heartily as the little group in his picture seem to be doing.

I CAN NOT SING THE OLD SONGS.

THE simple pathos of the engraving which we reproduce on page 316 will most commend it to the readers of the Weekly. A fair girl, just passing into womanhood, in deepest mourning for one near and dear—it may be even for the life-mate of hope and love—checked by choking emotion in the first song she has attempted to recall the melodies of happy hours gracefully spent, and turning away from the thrilling chords of the familiar accompaniment with a sigh, the burden of which is conveyed in the title—itself the refrain of an old song—"I can not sing the old songs!" which our engraving will, in more appropriate silence, address to the sympathies of the reader.

DAME GIACINTA'S STORY.

"YOU must know, most noble cavaliere!" Dame Giacinta began—"that I was not cityborn, but lived among the hills, the ranges known as the lands of the Vidoni, which stretch along Lake Benaiac; in the service of which family I abode till the noble and fair changed masters: for I became thither to abide with mine uncle, in whose house, Matteo, my good-man, found me, and wedded me when I was forty years. The Palace entitles slow my father before I knew his face; and in that same battle Messer Geronimo Videni was wounded sorely. His widow Donna Agatha was, that very kind to my mother, and would have her always near her own person, albeit she was too weakly to be of great use as nurse-woman; and when, five years later, I was left orphan, counted me to be about what she may be somewhat above my station; while she loved me, and I lost her favor, though she was too wise to spoil me. Like to her own, I had been my uncle's one small favor. Messer Marco was but a youth when he became head of his house; but both in bearing and in spirit he was more than his years. Such as knew him well liked him well, for he was true, and brave, and generous, to the heart's core; but he was no respecter of persons with man or woman, being rough and curt of speech, and scrambling impetuous of manner; neither did he affect the company of neighbors. Even in hunting or hawking he mostly took his pleasure alone, and seldom cared to show himself in the tilt-yard —holding all other costly pastimes in like scorn. The Lady Agatha used sometimes to lament this to me, and to wish that Messer Marco could be prevailed on to wed. A gentle, fitting helpmate—she thought—might do much toward softening him to take such a place among his equals as beseemed the chief of the Vidoni. So she cast her eyes round about heedfully, till they lit on a damsel of good birth and breeding—daughter to one of the Spinetti—who had just returned home from the Carmelite convent, where she had been nurtured by the special care of the abbess.

"Doubtless the Lady Maddalena was nearly beautiful; but, had I been a man, I would as lieve have wived with one of the fair saints that see Gloria limned so deftly. Her cheeks might have been as snow-flakes, for all the flush that love or anger ever brought out thereon: her eyes might have been opals for a little softness, and her very smile—she smiled but seldom, save the mark!—was frozen too. I do not think, at first, Messer Marco was much disposed to look at her; then, but in most things he let his mother have her way, and perchance was somewhat weary of hearing from her that 'Giacinta's expert in the wedlock, it still was his bounden duty in such troublous times to provide his house with an heir;' so he gave over a little suffering, making condition that he should be troubled with no formal wooing. And, indeed, he scarce saw the bride half-a-score of times, before he brought her home.

"The change that came over Messer Marco, within a week or two after his wedding-day, I was appointed the Lady Maddalena's own tiring-woman, so I saw it all. Before they had been married two months he loved her with all his soul and strength; but she never seemed to notice his passion—much less to return it. It angered me to see how cold she was to him, her face waxing thin and drawn, and his eyes hollower and brighter; while morning or evening brought no change in the look of that demure face. It would have been better if she had shown fear or loathing of him than that deathly coldness; but she would not. She would slowly away if he came too near, or murmur if he wrung her hand too hard. 'I pray you be not so rough; you crush my fingers'—looking as like a little fair virgin martyr. I can not guess if the Lady Agatha feared, or had in her made a mistake. She was not the woman to confess such things to any living creature; if it was so, she had not long space to repent her error. She much fever carried her off suddenly in the eighth month after the wedding. She passed away at last very happily and calmly, thanking God for her mercies and praying that God, in his own time, would be pleased to remove from them the curse of barrenness.

"My good mistress would scarce have been happy, even in heaven, if she could have seen her thing went on after she was gone. Messer Marco grew weary of wooing his white statue; moreover, he fancied she mourned his mother less than was becoming. Then, gradually and at times, and his tongue would utter wild words when it slipped its bridle. From being sober as he ascheeze he became drunken often—very often —though I never saw him utterly bestotted with wine. All the while his wife never stirred one of her lady fingers to hinder him from the road he was trending—but looked on, placid and unmoving, perchance, now and then, a little scornfully—just as I have seen a woman from the from a safe distance, the gambols of a big boarhound. I began to hate her—I know not why now—I think she ignored me. Many times my words were always sweet and meek, her voice seemed to grow harder while speaking to me at times.

"When we first heard of our bride there was much talk of her piety; and she took marvelous good care to keep up the fame of it—more at Castel Vidoni. Benedicte! the good old chaplain who had shrived the Vidoni and their household for a score of years, could make nought of his mistress's turn. She prayed from the first to be allowed to keep her own confessor—a brother of the Franciscans, I think—and the chaplain had to waited on her in her father's house ever since he left the Carmelite convent. Poor Donna Agatha, I remember, called the request quite reasonable, and worthy of such a paragon as she had chosen; and Messer Marco objected to nothing that, nor indeed to aught else, but did he interfere with his wife's religious exercises.

"I am but a chattering beldam now, and then I was not a jot subject to the vice of tattle above other tiring-women; yet I profess that I disliked and distrusted Fra Remo's sallow face from the first instant I set eyes on it. The friar duly received and saintly as he would, and droop the lids over his greedy black eyes, and press his lips together to keep down his triumph, but he could not keep the round red spots from coming out on his cheek-bone, nor the fingers from quivering under his robe. The first time I marked those signs was one evening, when wild weather continued him to carry the castle for the floods were out. Donna Agatha was ill at ease, as the monk sat at supper with my master and mistress in the great hall—because he touched nought but bread and fair water. It was my duty to stand behind the Lady Maddalena's chair, to fetch and carry during her meals in her chamber. Messer Marco had not yet fallen into the evil habits whereof I spake; but this night was sultry, and he had been hot and angered by the high floods: his mood seemed somewhat jocund, and once—speaking to his wife—he put forth his hand and pinched her betwixt his fingers.

"My good-man was ever too easily moved to jealousy—the saints wot, with little cause—but he never showed it by aught else than by his caresses bestowed on me by my cousin. It was marvel, as we the Lady Maddalena shrank away as though her husband's touch pollution, that I watched not her so narrowly as I did the priest. It was a light scandal, after all, to make the blood flush so in his cheek, and set his fingers twitching in his sleeve. I understood none of these things then; but the time came when I understood them all. As I said, matters went from bad to worse after Donna Agatha's death, and came at last to this—that the Lady Maddalena would no longer share his bed or his chamber, alleging that she feared his violent humors, especially when heated by wine. Perchance, Messer Marco was ashamed to contradict her; any how, he let her have her own way, sullenly. Thenceforward she lived almost like a recluse; never going abroad save when, at stated times, she went in her litter to confession or other religious exercise in the church of San Francisco at Gallano; Fra Remo came very rarely to Castel Vidoni, fearing, it was thought, result of his injury: for our lord had looked askance at him more than once lately, vouchsafing no greeting beyond a growl in his beard.

"Now, Benvenuto Andrea was one Giovanni Bandello, whose father and grandsire had been falconers before him to the Vidoni—a faithful race, and renowned for their skill and expert in his calling, but cross-grained in temper, and disliked by all save Messer Marco, who trusted him entirely. For some time Andrea's countenance had been gloomier than usual, and he went about muttering to himself as though some load on his mind troubled him: but none of us cared to ask what ailed him. One day he and Messer Marco went out, as was their wont, hawking along together. I chanced to be crossing the great hall when they returned, and I saw, from my lord's face that something had perturbed him strangely, so that I durst not for-bear questioning him; but he only laughed out loud—though all the while his lips twisted and writhed as though in pain—and bade me send him a cup of wine, for his mouth was parched with drought: saying that nothing worse had happened than that his falcon Bianca had killed a peacock in the monk's bank, so that the twain lay dead together by the side of the marsh. As I was leaving the hall, he called me back sharply, and bade me tell no one of this, but repose on the morrow to visit the church at Gallano. I answered him 'yes:' for she had charged me to see that my master was ready early, should she would have none of my company. He nodded his head without speaking—draining two or three tankers of wine—and then, no food—called for a fresh horse, and rode forth alone; though it was past the hour of the Angelus, and the skies were overcast.

"Nigh ten days ago, Fra Remo had set forth for Rome on some special mission; he was much trusted and beloved by his Order, and it was thought would ere long rise high therein. His confessor had been absent more than once before, and then he had been sudden was went to be shriven always by a certain Fra Anselmo—an aged monk, of great repute for sanctity. On such occasions I had noted that my lady's devout exercises were gotten over much quicker than when Fra Remo guided them. All that night and the next I was disturbed without my signs of Messer Marco. My lady never troubled herself concerning his movements, and asked no questions now that he was gone, or for how long; but she went to Gallano as she had purposed, and had been home again some two hours when my lord returned.

"I was looking from the window into the courtyard when he rode in, and I hasted down to ask what ailed him. I thought for sure he was sickening of the same fever that carried off his mother. His lips looked black, and parched; and his eyes burned like flames in the midst of his wan face; and, instead of sitting in saddle still and upright, he reeled all bent and shrunken together; and his chin was down on his breast, as if he were too weak to lift it. His voice, too, when he spoke, was weak and piping, though it got stronger afterward. He said there was naught amiss with him, save perchance some slight chill from the night dews, and that he would be well again when he had eaten and drunken. He bade me tell them hasten with supper, and pray the Lady Maddalena not to fail to bear him company thereat, as it was the feast day of San Marco, his patron; for on occasion of fast or feast he commonly kept her own chamber. Right few words were spoken at supper; but Messer Marco's manner was so different from what it had been of late, that I was very quiet and pie-like—that my lady's pale blue eyes opened wide in surprise more than once. He seemed to have forgotten his customary dislike of wine, though; for he scarce ate any thing, and drank only a cup or so till supper was over; then he prayed my lady to pledge him, and poured out wine from table, flagon a certain flagon which had stood before him untouched.

"'Tis Monte-pulciano, near a century old—a very rare wine,' said he—'so rare, that only once, Maddalena mia, have you tasted it.' My master had his own fancies; he drained not the day I was born; another you deigned to taste when you crossed this threshold as bride; and as to my flagons, I drink only—by—empty another to-night. I pray you balk it not. If you will drink to naught else, drink to my better life and amending. Forsooth, I shame to say, need amending.'

"My lady bowed her head very coldly, as she took the cup in both her white hands; yet she seemed to like the flavor of the liquor, for her color was longer than I had ever seen it. Generally she was deadly pale by like a bird. All the while Messer Marco's eyes were fixed on her, eagerly, but he himself forgot to drink.

"'Heaven prosper your good intent!'—she said, in her meek, quiet way, as she set the cup down; and as he passed out of the hall, as light as a shadow.

"It was my lady's fancy to bide mostly alone in her chamber, whence opened her oratory; so I sat with my broidery-work in the outer room, within hearing of her silver bell. I might have been there an hour or so, and had fallen a-musing over my work, when the door opened and my mistress stood there, beckoning. I saw at once she was in mortal sickness or pain; for she was deathly white, and kept gasping and moaning, with her two hands clasped hard across her breast. I hasted back to her bed and then shrieked for help as loud as I was able. When the other bower-women came I ran down myself to the hall—to tell my lord what had happened. He did not seem to heed me; but sat there like a man in a dream, and when I plucked him by the sleeve, and cried to him 'in Christ's sake to come quickly,' he only shook me off, and said in a hoarse, hollow voice:

"'Bid her obey; all will be well, when she sleeps.'

"I dared not stay, lest my help should be needed up stairs; so I hastened back thither, but I was too late to be of use; and later still was the knell, thought he dwelt hard by, and was summoned by a servitor on the first alarm. My lady never spoke one word that could be smiled-at, and, last only shivered and moaned. And the moans and the shudders grew fainter and weaker, till she lay at last, still and cold, like a crushed lily in July.

"I had small liking for my mistress, as I have owned; but I felt as sorry then as if I had loved her; and much was the wondering and making mouths among the other women gathered round the bed, when Messer Marco's voice from the doorway made me start and turn.

"'Wherefore this outcry?' he asked. 'Fear ye not to wake her; for she must needs be sleeping?'

"Then Sêr Geronimo, the leech, came out of the shadow—trembling; for wild tales had gone abroad of late concerning Messer Marco's temper.

"'Alas! my lord,' he said, 'be not deceived; slumber such as these ones can be broken by the Judgment-trumpet. The noble Lady Maddalena's spirit has passed from us, from some cause unknown, as I think, of the heart.'

"Messer Marco looked at him, in the same dreamy way as he had looked at me in the hall but now.

"'Ay, and is it so?' he said. 'Then hath earth lost a fair saint, and heaven gained a fairer angel. Now I know what I have to do.' And so went out.

"A dreadful suspicion shot across my mind, making me shudder from head to foot. I knew my master even from boyhood, when there was a knot-heart's core under the rough rind, and I could not leave him alone just then. So I followed him out, and caught him by the mantle and prayed him—as well as I could, for my chattering teeth—to take no unseemly step or hasty in his sorrow. He drew himself out of my grasp —so quickly that I thought he was angered—saying,

"'Nay, touch me not, good Giacinta; I have no ailment thou canst heal. Trust me: I am best alone.' And so left me, but hither my page Pietro. He must carry a message forthwith.'

"I stood without and listened while my master lacqued to Pietro:

"'Ride down at speed to the Franciscan convent at Gallano; and, after commending me to the Prior, bid him say matins and mass nor tremor, nor any due office be omitted for the rest of thy lady's soul. She hath deserved well of their Order, and the first word of her decease should set all the bells a-tolling. And specially pray Fra Remo to come up hither instantly: I heard yesternight that he would be home earlier than he had reckoned on, and by this time he may well be returned. As he shrived thy lady living, so let him absolve her dead. Now, Pietro, with my good leave, shall usurp his ministry.'

"So Pietro departed. Messer Marco locked himself in his own chamber; and of a blank hour in its duty bound, laid out decently the lovely white corpse. It might have been some two hours before Fra Remo came. I had not even heard of his coming ere I did; but I saw their meeting in that same room where I had been sitting at the broidery. Beyond that room was a third apartment, used only as an antechamber. Fra Remo's countenance was very much changed, as there was a flush of a black color thereon, hard to describe, and purple circles under his eyes, as if marked with a brush; brown his lips no less black; he could not keep them from twitching; nevertheless, in fair set terms, he began to condole with my master—suggesting the idea of consolation such as he, and furthermore, that the change (albeit so sudden) must needs have been for the benefit of the deceased lady. Messer Marco cut him short, once.

"'Trouble not yourself, reverend father, concerning a grief which is mine alone,' which in-wise in there waiting your last offices. Nathless, though I bear my burdens after mine own fashion, I pray you to remember your promise; when your ministry is fully performed you will find me ready to receive them here.'

"Then Messer Marco took all go forth, save Pietro the page. Into his ear he whispered some words that I could not catch; but I guessed the boy when he came out that he deemed that he had been bidden to fetch from below two goblets, and the jewell flagon holding the famous Monte-pulciano. I know not why, but the chill fluttering at my heart increased every instant, and there was a faint sickly savor in my nostrils like the savor of death. So I crouched down behind the curtains in the third or antechamber, while Pietro passed still further away, using the wine; and, when I heard the door locked from within, I crept forward and laid mine eye to the key-hole—through which it was easy both to see and hear. Messer Marco sat with his elbows resting on the table and his face buried in his hands. He never stirred till the voice of the inner room opened softly and Fra Remo came forth. The monk looked still more ill at ease than he had done half an hour agone. He kept wetting his parched lips with his tongue; and I could see his eyes turn, first in surprise, then in eagerness, toward the great golden flagon. Certes, Messer Marco saw this as well as I, for he smiled in a strange fashion as he beckoned to the other to draw near.

"'Reverend father,' he said, 'you are continent in diet and drink, as in all things else, I know; nevertheless, your vow forbids you not to touch wine for mere health's sake. Albeit we are neither of us in mood for feasting, a draught of this rare liquor may serve as a cordial now, to keep our hearts from fainting in their heaviness. Do me right, I pray you, in this one goblet.'

"So Messer Marco took up the flagon; and with a steady hand poured out the precious liquor, that sparkled in the lamp-light, though it gurgled out slowly like oil. The monk drank with such fierce eagerness that I doubt if a fly could have slaked its thirst from his empty goblet; but Messer Marco's was scarcely tasted when he set it down; he half concealed the cup with the broad sleeve of his mantlet, so that for a while Fra Rèmo noticed this not.

"'Now shall we be better able to speak of my loss,' Vidoni said. 'A cruel one, is it not, reverend father? And so cruelly sudden too! I fear me, I never prized aright my sainted Maddalena, while she tarried with me. Ah! she was too good for earth, and too gentle for one rude and unmannerly as I; yet, peradventure—I speak this humbly and under correction—it might have been better, if she had thought her husband's soul worth caring for when her own was safe; and if she had beckoned him sometimes to follow along the narrow path whereof you priests discourse, instead of letting him hurry down the broad road after his own devices.'

"'Nay, nay, fair son,' the monk answered, huskily. 'Wrong not so the dead, I beseech you. That devout lady was no less anxious, I well believe, for your eternal weal than for her own, and you were ever named in her prayers.'

"My master's laugh was like the bark of an angered hound.

"'Then she had her own method of showing her carefulness, even as she had her own method of discharging wifely duty. You were her confessor, Fra Rèmo, wherefore you have not to learn that, for these years past, I have won from her neither favor nor mark of tenderness—more than sister might bestow on brother. Ay! even of such she waxed more niggard day by day. Yet I strove for her love harder than many men strive for heaven; and, even when my mood seemed roughest, unless my brain were distraught by drink, I watched for some sign of softening or glance of pity, as one perishing of famine waits for the food that will never come. I deemed it mine own fault, for having mated myself with one far above my level; and tried to think it not strange that angels should keep their wings from soiling. I well-nigh laughed at first, when, two days agone, Giuseppe, my falconer, came to me with a strange tale. 'Tis a shrewd knave, though a sullen, and hath eyes like one of his own hawks—eyes, Fra Rèmo, that from the top of a high pine-tree can pierce even into a lady's bower. Ha! why look you so aghast? Can it be that your favorite penitent kept back somewhat at her last confession? Take another cup of Monte-pulciano. 'Twill stop the fluttering of your pulse, mayhap. "Her last confession," said I? No, no. Her last you heard not; I will tell you why.'

"My heart stopped beating, as, looking through the keyhole, I saw the friar's face turn from sallow to ashen-gray, till its color might have matched his robe.

"'What think you of my scheme?' Messer Marco went on. 'The maddest freak surely that ever crossed a drunkard's brain—yet rare sport came of it. I knew that my pious dame purposed to attend at your church of San Francisco this morning—there, in your reverence's absence, to confess herself to Fra Anselmo. So I rode down, and lay in Gallano yesternight; and caused a fashioner with whom I have dealt to provide me with a Franciscan habit. Also, very early in the morning I caused a forged message to be conveyed to the said Fra Anselmo; bidding him set off instantly, to attend the death-bed of that wealthy and devout widow Catania Pratellesi. The holy man, unwitting of the more honorable penitent then on her road, went forth with speed. It repented me to beguile his age and infirmity; but there was no other way; and so only could I compass mine end. In my Franciscan's robe and cowl I lurked in shady corners of the church—peering out from the porch now and then—till my Maddalena's litter drew up at the gate. Then I slid stealthily into a certain confessional, and drew the bolt. So my wife came; and, finding the door shut, guessed that none other than Fra Anselmo could be within. And thus it came about that I heard— Fra Rèmo, can you guess what I heard? Aha! There's blood enough in your cheeks now, even without a second draught of Monte-pulciano.'

"In truth, a dark red flush had surged over the monk's face and brow, up to the tonsure. I thought the falling-sickness was upon him as he stood up—rocking on his hands that rested on the table—with awful fear and rage in his staring eyes. Messer Marco rose up too, and with his strong arm thrust the priest back rudely into his chair.

"'Sit down!' he went on, low through his teeth. 'Sit down—or, by Christ's body, you shall feel my dagger-point. I have not yet said all my say. I heard, that—instead of a pure maiden I brought home a harlot in thought—ay, and soon after, a harlot in deed. I learned that oftentimes—when she shrunk from my lawful caress as though it were taint, her lips were reeking from kisses, and the prints of lustful fingers were fresh on her neck. I learned, too, who it was that trained her to dishonor, taught her to carry her shame haughtily, and how to hoodwink her cuckold. I let her finish, and mumbled out something that passed for absolution—I doubt if it helps her much now—so she departed, lightened in spirit, and ready to sin again. I called her by no hard names when we met; only I prayed earnestly that she would sup with me. She did so to-night, and she drank of that same liquor which so tickled your palate. An hour later she lay within there; waiting—as she had done a score of times before, Fra Rèmo—waiting for you—cold as you found her. Ha! have I touched you more nearly now? And do you feel aught working in your veins—save Monte-pulciano a century old? Per Dio! You have rare luck: never a one in Sacred College hath tasted better liquor than that which brings you death—you a simple priest. Now, whether ye like it or not, you shall drain one more cup to the days that are gone, and your pleasant paramour. Ye will not? Nay then'—leaping up, he caught the monk by the throat.

"I could find no voice to scream; but I beat on the door till my hands bled, and made shift to call on my master by his name. If he heard he heeded not; for he never turned his head nor shifted his knee or his hand after once he got the friar down. I could not take my eye from the keyhole, though the iron seemed to burn it. I could not faint either, or shut mine ears against the hard breathing, and the horrible choking gurgle, and the hoarse rattle that ended all. When at last Messer Marco rose, shaking himself, there lay on the floor, beyond, a ghastly tumbled gray heap; from which stretched out two sandaled feet, still quivering. After a pause my master walked toward the door. The power to move came back to me then, in the very extremity of my fear; for I thought that he was angered at my watching, and was coming forth to slay me likewise. So I staggered to one of the windows—I know not how—and strove to hide myself under the curtains. While I was cowering there, Messer Marco's voice sounded close to my ear, speaking low and gently, as I had never heard it speak since the night his mother died.

"'Ah! my poor Giacinta, thou hast seen, then, and knowest all. I have a lie ready for the rest of mine household to account for yonder carrion, but I palter not so with thee. Thou mayest betray me if thou wilt—I think thou wilt not. Fear not that any, save one, shall come to blame for what hath been done here; if needs be I will avouch my own handiwork. Go and call Pietro now: for I must to Pisa to-night—there to take counsel with my trusty cousin, who shall advise me whether it be best for me to bide or flee.'

"Betray him! He might well be safe against that. I straightened myself and strove hard to be calm, while my master's call rang through the corridor; and, shortly after, I heard him charge the page to see his sorrel saddled instantly, and to send once again for the leech—who had already left the castle—for that Fra Rèmo had fallen down in a fit. Then he returned and passed into the innermost chamber, closing the door behind him. Besides this, there was between us the chamber in which the other corpse lay: nevertheless, I could hear quite plainly my Lord Marco sobbing as though his heart were broken—so in very truth it was—and I could hear him calling the dead woman by all manner of fond names, such as he had never used since the old days when he did not think the winning of her love was utterly hopeless. Then, by Heaven's grace, I too fell a-weeping—for I think, without those tears, my brain would have turned with grief and horror. At last the steps of Sêr Geronimo the leech, and others, were heard in the corridor without, and they knocked for admittance. Then my master came forth and crossed the second chamber, without glancing aside at the friar's corpse. Indeed, I think he would have gone out without noticing me; but I felt, I can not tell why, that I should look upon his face no more; so I stopped him, and knelt down before them all, and pressed my lips upon his hand—though it was blackened with guilt now, it had stroked my head kindly when I was a little child—and prayed that God would help and forgive him. I doubt if he understood my words; but he tried to smile as he stooped his haggard face down close to mine, and just touched my forehead with his lips. Then, speaking to none else, and staring always straight before him—he went out; and, two minutes later, I heard the rattle of his horse's hoofs in the court-yard beneath.

"I dared not go with the rest into the second chamber; but they told me afterward that Sêr Geronimo shook his head as he knelt by Fra Rèmo's corpse, and that others beside him noticed purple marks on the throat that could scarce be accounted for by the fit of the falling sickness. But it was the business of none there to be over-curious; and the Franciscans, when they heard the news, and came to fetch their dead away, raised no question: perchance Fra Anselmo had warned his brethren to avoid unprofitable scandal. Unprofitable of a truth it would have been: before dawn the sorrel wandered back with splashes of blood on saddle and housing; and those who went forth to search found Marco Vidoni stone-dead in a pine-wood not a league from his own gate. Riding through the dark at furious speed, his skull had been dashed against a trunk leaning somewhat athwart the road, and he could not have lived a second after the shock.

"Bernando Vidoni, the cousin of whom my poor master spake, soon came from Pisa, and saw the double funeral celebrated with due pomp and solemnity. He was a good man and a kindly, and would have driven none of the old household forth. But few of us had the heart to take service under a new master; and I went with the rest to this city, where some of my kindred abode; and before I had tarried very long with these my good Matteo found me out and wooed and wedded me. We have been very happy since in our humdrum fashion; but always when this day comes round I rise with a heart as heavy as lead, and it is never lightened till I have recited many Aves, and spent some space in prayer. And, should bread be harder to win than it hath ever been with us, I will still find coins enow to provide a mass in behalf of all who passed to their compt that night unannealed, and a special one to boot for poor Messer Marco's soul."

SO FAR—SO FAR AWAY.

So far away! So far away!
Thy stars are not the stars I see;
With me 'tis night, with thee 'tis day,
And day and night are one to me.
So far—so far away!

I faint beneath those wandering airs
Whose wings around the world go free;
I snatch at straws the whirlwind bears—
Touched they the land that blooms for thee
So far—so far away?

The forms that near me breathe and move,
Like visions rise, like visions flee;
I can not live to other love,
My soul has crossed the deep to thee
So far—so far away!

Earth's drooping shadows close me round,
The heavens have lost their light for me,
The voice of joy breathes not a sound,
And hope swoons dead on yonder sea
So far—so far away!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE new method of embalming dead bodies seems to be a complete success. Recently a subject who died early in February, and was treated by the process of Professor Seely a few days after death, was examined at Bellevue Hospital. It presented a thoroughly natural appearance, and was perfectly preserved. Thus, by the application of a simple wash, and without any mutilation, the bodies of deceased friends may be preserved unchanged for an indefinite period. It is claimed that they will last a century. Also this invention places in the hands of scientific men the means of preserving the subjects of their necessary studies without the special difficulties which have hitherto been unavoidable.

A very peculiar "slander case" is said to be about to appear in our city courts. A lady brings an action for slander against a gentleman, on the ground that he "on divers occasions has said, she is my wife, and I can prove it." The defendant affirms that while the lady was a teacher in a public school and he a member of a State volunteer regiment they became engaged; and when it was probable that he should be "ordered to the front," they agreed to be married, and went privately to a clergyman's house, where the ceremony was performed in presence of witnesses. He states that after the close of the war he engaged in mercantile business, and went to the house of the lady's relatives to board; and although they resided under the same roof the marriage was still kept secret. But after a while the lady took a dislike to the gentleman; various troubles followed, and finally a suit has been commenced against him for slander in affirming that she is his wife. The lady positively denies all the gentleman affirms; says that she never was married to this or any other gentleman, and that she never was at the clergyman's house on any occasion. It is certainly a novel case.

An ingenious writer, from careful investigations in regard to the milk used in London, has arrived at the conclusion that the number of cows supplying the metropolis is not more than sufficient to provide each person with about a table-spoonful per day. What is sold under the name of "milk" often contains useless and injurious adulterating ingredients. Water, of course, is largely used, not in London alone, but extensively in this country, especially in large cities. The pale little children are thus daily robbed of the nutrition their food should contain. They fade away without any startling disease, and die of infant marasmus. And it is regarded as a sad and inscrutable providence. But adulteration with water is not the only one to which milk is subjected. Large quantities of water make the milk look too blue; so it is needful to add various substances to give it a richer color; molasses or sirup to sweeten, and salt to flavor it. Analysis has also shown the presence of starch, chalk, soda, gum-tragacanth, and other articles far less pleasant to think about. We once knew a good lady, living not a thousand miles distant, who had a fancy for always straining her milk after she received it from the milkman. One morning this straining process disclosed what the country boys call a "polliwog," as lively and brisk as if in its native element. She had never heard that a bona fide cow gave "polliwogs," and the evidence was to her conclusive that the services of the "cow with the iron tail" had been called into requisition. But no such simple process as straining will detect all of the articles which we consume in the form of milk. Therefore the best we can do is to purchase of reliable dealers, and to test the purity of milk by such ordinary means as we can command.

It is said of a fashionable lady, who went to a party not long since, that she arrived there about the first of the evening, but the last of her dress did not arrive until after twelve o'clock.

A terrific hurricane and hail-storm lately occurred in Prairie County, Arkansas, by which houses, fences, and trees were prostrated, and many persons seriously injured. The whirlwind seems to have chosen an erratic course, and to have picked out special localities in which to wreak its fury. During the progress of this hail-storm pieces of ice of irregular shape, from the size of a walnut to that of an ordinary glass tumbler, were projected upon the ground with fearful effect.

"How things 'got into the papers,'" remarks the author of "Five Hundred Pounds Reward," in describing Mrs. Maldon, the landlady of St. Mark's Bay Hotel, "had always been rather a mystery to her; but she accepted the fact of editorial omniscience just in the same blind way that all women believe in machinery. Tell them a thing is done by machinery and difficulties vanish at once. There's nothing left to think about. A machine is a machine, just as a conjuror is a conjuror; and to push the matter farther would be simply to blunder into a world of things which nobody understands."

Whether all women have a blind "belief in machinery"—except in that which constitutes the sewing-machine—may be questionable. But certainly neither men nor women need place implicit confidence in many of the "things" that "get into the papers" nowadays. Such strange reports, such extraordinary stories appear in sundry newspapers under the guise of truth, but in reality made up, as the saying is, "out of whole cloth" to produce a sensation, that one really knows not what to believe. Nevertheless we must have our newspaper which tells of so many wondrous things:

"It makes us weep at tales of woe—it fills our hearts with mirth;
It tells us of the price of stock—how much produce is worth;
And when, and where, and how, and why, strange things occur on earth.
Has war's loud clarion called to arms? has lightning struck a tree?
Has Jenkins broke his leg? or has there been a storm at sea?
Has the sea-serpent shown his head? a comet's head been seen?
Or has some heiress with her groom run off to Gretna Green?
All this, and many wonders more, from daily sheets you glean."

A well-known literary gentleman, who has been a smoker for thirty years, has completely abandoned the habit, and is all the better for it. He says: "I have less headache, I enjoy exercise more, and step out much more vigorously. My room is cleaner. I think I am rather better tempered, as well as more cheerful and satisfied. I endure the inevitable ills of life with more fortitude, and look forward more hopefully to the coming years. It did not pay to smoke; but most decidedly it pays to stop smoking."

From San Francisco we learn that a new material is now being used for mattresses. It is made from the soap root, which grows in unlimited quantities near the mountains of the Sierra range. It is a bulbous root, enveloped in a very tough and supple fibre, resembling somewhat the husk of a cocoa-nut in color and appearance, but nearly as tough as whalebone. The manufactured article is fully equal to curled hair, and makes comfortable, useful, and healthful beds. A factory has been built on Little Bear River, about a mile from Dutch Flat, which is now employing a large number of men.

The Phrenological Journal thus discourses: "If you would have a loving wife be as gentle after as before marriage; treat her as tenderly when a matron as when a miss; don't make her maid-of-all-work, and ask why she looks less tidy and neat than when 'you first knew her;' don't buy cheap beef, and scold because it does not come on the table 'porter-house;' don't grumble about squalling babies if you can not keep up a 'nursery,' and remember that 'baby may take after its papa' in disposition; don't smoke and chew tobacco, and thus shatter your nerves, spoil your temper, make your breath a nuisance, and then complain that your wife declines to kiss you; go home joyous and cheerful, and tell your wife the good news, and not silently put on your hat and go out to the 'club,' and let her afterward learn that you spent the evening at the opera with Mrs. Dash."

Nothing gives the interior of a house a more cleanly and cheerful aspect than frequent whitewashing or whitening. The most common and inexpensive kind of lime whitewash is a great purifier. A fine brilliant wash is obtained by mixing "Paris-white" with glue, in the proportion of sixteen pounds to half a pound of glue. The glue should be the white, transparent kind. It should be covered with cold water at night, and in the morning carefully heated until dissolved. The Paris-white should be stirred into hot water until it is of the proper milky consistency for applying to the walls, and the dissolved glue added and thoroughly mixed. This recipe is considered one of the best, and has the merit of being inexpensive.

A Frenchman who died in penury had preserved, as interesting mementoes, the corks of the bottles with which he had in better days sumptuously entertained his friends. These corks bore melancholy inscriptions, testifying the depravity of human nature. For example:

"Champagne cork; bottle emptied 12th of May, 1843, with Mr. B——, who wished to interest me in a business by which I was to make 10,000,000 francs. This affair cost me 50,000 francs. Mr. B. escaped to Belgium. A caution to amateurs."

"Cork of Cyprus wine, of a bottle emptied on the 4th of December, 1850, with a dozen fast friends. Of these I have not found a single one to help me on the day of my ruin. The names of the twelve are annexed below."

We find two methods for catching rats, each highly recommended. The first is complicated but inexpensive. Cover a common barrel with stiff, stout paper, tying the edge around the barrel; place a board so that the rats may have easy access to the top; sprinkle cheese parings or other "feed" for the rats on the paper for several days, until they begin to believe they have a right to their daily rations from this source. Then place in the bottom of the barrel a piece of rock about six or seven inches high, filling with water until only enough of it projects above the water for one rat to lodge upon. Now replace the paper, first cutting a cross in the middle, and the first rat that comes on the barrel-top goes through into the water and climbs on the rock. The paper comes back to place, and the second rat follows the first. Then begins a fight for the possession of the dry place on the stone, the noise of which attracts the rest, who share the same fate. The second method is recommended by a servant who was "experienced." She took a small quantity of old Bourbon whisky, made it sweet with sugar, crumbled in bread enough for the crowd, and set the dish in the cellar. A few hours after she went down, and found several rats gloriously fuddled, engaged throwing potato-parings, and hauling one another up to drink. These were easily disposed of; and those not killed left the premises immediately, suffering from a severe headache.

Those who do not believe in omens will enjoy a laugh over the following story; and those who do better pass it by, if they fear to have their faith disturbed: An old gentleman whose style was Germanized was asked what he thought of signs and omens.

"Vell, I don't dinks mooch of dem dings, und I don't pelieve averydings; but I dells you somedimes dere is some dings in sooch dings ash dose dings. Now de oder night I sits und reads mine newspaper, und mine frau she shpeak und say:

"'Fritz, de dog ish howling!'

"Vell, I don' dinks mooch of dem dings, und I goes on und reads mine paper, und mine frau she say:

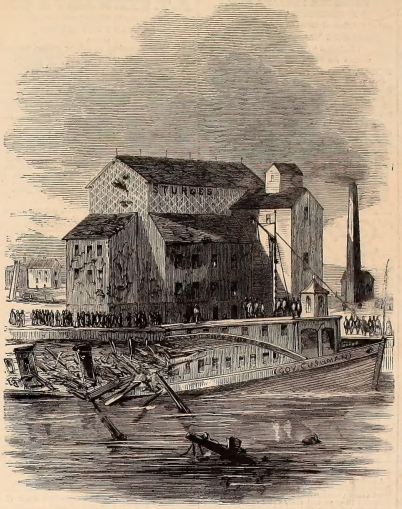
"'Fritz, der is somedings pad is happen—de dog ish howling.'

"Und den I gets oop mit mineself und looks out troo de wines on de porch, und de moon was shinin, und mine leetle dog he shoomp right up and down like averydings, und he park at de moon, dat vas shine so bright ash never vas. Und ash I hauled mine het in de winder de old voman she says:

"'Mind, Fritz, I dells you dere ish some pad ish happen. De dog ish howlin.'

"Vell, I goes to pet und I shleeps, und all night long ven I vakes up dere vas dat dog howlin outside, und ven I dream I hear dat howlin vorser ash never. Und in de morning I kits oop and kits mine breakfast, und mine frau she looks at me und say werry solemn:

"'Fritz, dere ish somedings pad ish happen. De dog vas howl all night.'



"Und shoost den de newspaper come in, und I opens him—and by shings, vot you dinks! dere vas a man died in Philadelphia!"

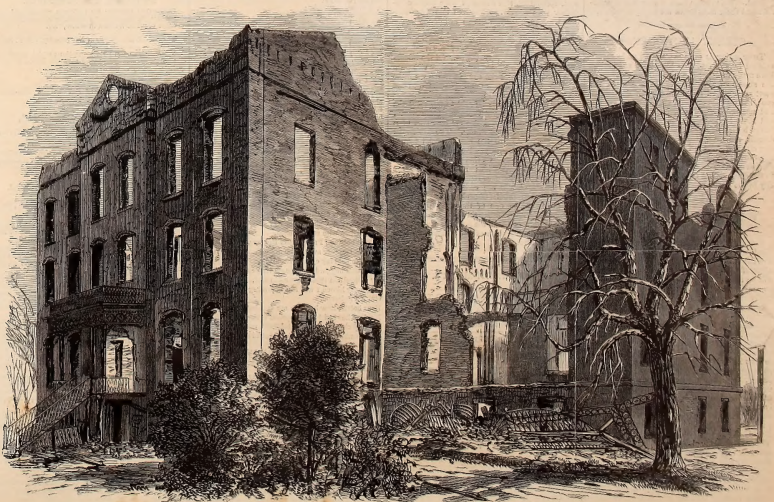
WRECK OF THE AMERICAN SHIP "GENERAL GRANT" ON AUCKLAND ISLANDS, MAY 14, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 318.]

STREET AUCTION SCENE IN NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 318.]

EXPLOSION OF THE PROPELLER "GOVERNOR CUSHMAN," AT BUFFALO, N. Y., MAY 1.
[SKETCHED BY L. C. MIX.]

EXPLOSION AT BUFFALO.

THE propeller Governor Cushman, a vessel of 688 tons, running on Lake Erie, exploded her boiler in her dock at Buffalo, New York, on May 1, killing eleven persons, and wounding several others. The hull was badly shattered, and the vessel was rendered a complete wreck. The explosion was terrible in its effect, shaking the buildings for several blocks adjacent to the locality at which the disaster occurred. Its force was so great that one of the deck hands was hurled over a Sturgis elevator one hundred and fifty feet high. We give above an illustration of this terrible disaster.



KING THEODORE OF ABYSSINIA IN WARRIOR'S COSTUME.

KING THEODORE.

THE cable telegram, informing us of the success of the British expedition undertaken for the invasion of Abyssinia and the rescue of the English prisoners held by King THEODORE, also announces the death of this monarch. The first dispatch indicated that the King was slain in the defense of Magdala; but a later telegram represents that he fell by his own hand, after his defeat and the capture of his last strong-hold.

The character and career of King THEODORE were alike remarkable. Prior to 1850, or thereabouts, he was not known beyond his immediate personal circle. His original name was DEJAZE

RUINS OF THE OHIO FEMALE COLLEGE AT COLLEGE HILL, NEAR CINCINNATI, OHIO.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. W. WINDER, CINCINNATI.]

KASSAI. He was born about the year 1821, in the province of Kuara. His father, a man of no distinction, but descended, it is said, from the royal line of Abyssinian princes, died when THEODORE was very young. His mother, unable to support him, sent him to a convent, where he was educated and received his Christian name. Naturally ambitious and politic, he succeeded in time in getting into the service and winning the confidence of RAS ALI, the Chief of Debra-Tabor or Gondar, and the principal Chief of Abyssinia. Eventually RAS ALI sent him to govern certain provinces near Senaar, but placed the Queen above him as a safeguard. KASSAI, or THEODORE, on the first difference of opinion between himself and the Queen-mother, rebelled against her authority or interference, and in several battles defeated her troops. At the same time he declared his allegiance to RAS ALI, and presented himself in that chief's capital. In short, while fighting against the mother he continued to enjoy the confidence of the son, and finally married his daughter.

In 1852 he determined upon a coup, and being at the head of a large army he declared war against RAS ALI, and, defeating him and his allies in two pitched battles, at once deposed him. He then turned his attention to the minor chiefs, and proposed a National Council to determine the claims of himself and others to the succession. Finding that one of his rivals, named UBYE, Chief of Tigré, was likely to be elected, he made war upon him and defeated him. Finally, being successful over all his opponents, and having gained the support of the Church, he was in 1855 crowned Emperor under the title of "THEODOROS, King of kings of Ethiopia." No sooner was he seated on the throne than he began to reform the administration of the country. He suppressed all feudal power; abolished the slave-trade; purchased Christian slaves from the Mohammedans in order to set them free; introduced decent dress into Abyssinian society; and set a good example to husbands by his conjugal fidelity.

The immediate cause of the late war appears to have been the failure of the English Government to reply to his letter to Queen VICTORIA, asking that the terms of an old treaty, by which the embassadors of each country were to be recognized by the other, should be enforced on the part of England. THEODORE does not appear to have understood the nature of the circumlocution offices of England, and weary of waiting for a reply, and feeling insulted, he cast the British Consul, Mr. CAMERON, into prison. A missionary named STERN had abused THEODORE in a book, and he also was arrested. Subsequently other British subjects were arrested, including Mr. RASSAM, who had been sent to negotiate for the release of the others. After exhausting all diplomatic resources to obtain from THEODORE the release of the captives, the English Government last year declared war against THEODORE. The war was chiefly carried on with the troops, European and native, which in India had become accustomed to the hot climate. The first English troops made their appearance in October, 1867; but it was not until the close of the year that the whole of the army arrived. The details of the war have been previously given in this journal. We propose here to give only the portrait and these facts about the dusky monarch.

STREET AUCTIONEERS.

THAT spring is once more upon us is clearly evinced by the fact that the street auctioneers have made their appearance in great numbers in the streets of New York. They are not the most musical and delightful heralds of the season; but we suppose that, like certain unsavory and unattractive animals, they have their use, and must be endured. As soon as the first balmy breath of spring makes the open air endurable, the street auctioneers, such as we portray on page 316, are found in the public places, eager to sell to crowds equally eager to be "sold." Our illustration is of a scene perfectly familiar to the denizens not only of New York but every city in the Union.

WRECK OF THE "GENERAL GRANT."

THE daily papers for some time past have been filled with accounts of the Robinson Crusoe-like life led by the survivors of the wrecked ship General Grant in the South Pacific Ocean. It will be remembered that the vessel was wrecked on May 14, 1866, sixty-eight of the eighty-three passengers and crew perishing, while the remainder were cast upon an uninhabited island, where they lived for a year and a half, until rescued on November 21, 1867, by the brig Amherst of New Zealand. One man died on the island, and four, including Mr. BARTHOLOMEW BROWN, the chief officer, were lost in a boat, in attempting to sail to New Zealand without chart or compass. Four passengers, all men, and the stewardess, Mrs. Jewell, were among those who survived, and were taken away by the Amherst. Many of the others were passengers from Australia, and mostly women and children. This is the third instance within the last four years of a shipwrecked party being obliged to pass many months on the Auckland Isles and being afterward rescued. The first case was that of Captain MUSGRAVE and four sailors of the brig Grafton, who were cast ashore in that desolate archipelago in January, 1864, and escaped in July, 1865, by crossing the open sea in a small boat to Stewart Island, which lies south of New Zealand. The second instance was that of Captain DALGARNO and part of the crew of the Invercauld, who were living on the same island with those of the Grafton, but without knowing it, from May 10, 1864, to May 22, 1865. A year after their departure the wreck of the General Grant took place.

We are enabled to give in this Number of the Weekly an illustration of the wreck of the vessel. The facts of the wreck are hardly less curious than the life on the island. The vessel was becalmed and was drawn by a strong current into the mouth of a large cave, and literally battered to pieces against its sides, and by the falling rocks which were displaced by its masts. The wreck took place at night, and the boats left the ship in a sinking condition at daylight, as represented in our sketch on page 316.

OHIO FEMALE COLLEGE.

WE give on page 317 an engraving of the ruins of one of the best known educational institutions in the West—the Ohio Female College, at College Hill, seven miles northwest of Cincinnati, Ohio. This college was founded in 1848. During the earlier years of its existence it experienced the vicissitudes of fortune too often characteristic of such institutions; but on the whole, and especially in more recent years, it has enjoyed an unusual degree of prosperity. On Thursday, April 23, the main edifice and the chapel were destroyed by fire. All the other buildings—seven in number—were saved, together with some twenty pianos, the organ, the college library, and a large portion of the furniture. The literary societies lost their libraries and furniture. The pupils and teachers, with the prompt aid of the citizens, succeeded in saving most of their effects. No one was seriously hurt. The exercises of the college will not be discontinued, as ample arrangements have been made by the Board of Trustees and the spirited citizens of the village for the accommodation of teachers and pupils. The property destroyed was insured to the amount of $45,000. The débris is being cleared away, and the trustees expect to have new buildings, on a larger scale, ready for occupancy by the opening of the next college year in September. The President of the Institution, Rev. JAMES M. ANDERSON, having recently accepted the Professorship of Mathematics at Williams College, the trustees have elected Rev. N. C. BURT, of Cincinnati, as his successor.

METHODIST GENERAL CONFERENCE AT CHICAGO.

THE delegates of the Methodist Episcopal churches throughout the United States, and many special delegates from England, Ireland, and Canada, are now holding their fifteenth quadrennial Conference at Chicago, Illinois; and will be in session until the end of the present month. The Republican Convention meets in the same city on May 20, and thus it happens that Chicago will be the scene of the largest religious and one of the principal political gatherings of the year. We illustrate in this Number the assembled Conference; and shall in future Numbers fully illustrate the politicians in council.

The Conference met for organization on May 1 in the Clark Street Methodist Church. Bishops MORRIS, SCOTT, AMES, JANES, CLARK, THOMSON, KINGSLEY, and SIMPSON were present, together with about two hundred and fifty delegates. The latter are shown in our engraving seated in the front rows of seats, while visitors are represented in the rear. Among the delegates are those from some of the Southern churches not represented in 1864. Of the Southern delegates who applied for admission two were colored men; but at the time at which we write this the question of their admission had not been settled.

This Conference may be said to represent the whole Methodist family throughout the world, and is authorized to legislate for that part of it resident in the United States. The Methodist Church, according to the latest official figures attainable, numbers, exclusive of probationers, 3,309,729 members. Of this number 2,497,540 are resident in America; and 2,358,425 are members of the churches represented in the present Conference, and are resident in the United States. The Methodist Church, as is well known, has grown to be one of the most prominent branches of Protestantism throughout the world; the above figures reveal the fact that a great proportion of the members of the Church are resident in this country.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN. The only reliable Remedy for those Brown Discolorations on the face is PERRY'S MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. ☞ Sold every where.

FOR THOSE DISFIGURING DISEASES, Black Worms and Pimples on the Face, use PERRY'S COMEDONE and Pimple Remedy. Order from Druggist, or send to Dr. B. C. Perry, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.

N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

SHAW'S CHEMICAL, ELECTRO, SILVER-PLATING FLUID makes worn-out plated ware as good as new. Samples sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents to pay for packing and postage. Address J. SHAW, Chemist, 30 Elm Street, Bridgeport, Conn.
☞ Agents wanted every where.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN,

MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN,

and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION"

renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION

SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.

This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been established 25 years.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance.
For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"

for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO" A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

LARGE SIZE, PRICE $1 00.

A positive remedy for all kinds of Humor, Scrofula, Scurvy, Salt Rheum, Erysipelas, Nettle Rash, Boils, Carbuncles, Ulcers, and all Obstinate Affections of the Skin; Mercurial Diseases, and every Taint of the System; Dyspepsia, and those diseases originating in the Derangement of the Digestive Organs, viz.: Bilious Complaints, Neuralgia, Nervous Affections, Headache, Languor, Loss of Appetite, Depression of Spirits, and Costiveness. Prepared at the NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT, under the supervision of GEO. W. SWETT, M.D., Boston, Mass.

Adam and his Curious Wife.

Had they not sinned,
We should have no hoop skirts,
Not even a waterfall;
No work for tailors,
No shoemakers or cobblers,
No churches, no schools,
No preachers or lawyers,
No United States,
No French Empire,
No British Lion,
No gold or silver,
Not even greenbacks;
No doctors to dose with drugs,
No grave-diggers;
No death, no pain—
Not even Wolcott's Pain Paint.

For Pain Paint ruins all Pills, all Plasters, all Soothing Syrups, and the whole cursed system of dosing the stomach. The manufacturers of these abominable compounds curse Dr. Wolcott and his Pain Paint as the cause of all their misery. But Dr. Wolcott keeps right on, regardless of the puppies snapping and snarling around him.

The people know that Pain Paint is a hundred years ahead of the worn-out trash that lies mouldering unsold in the drug stores, for Pain Paint can be proved at the moment of the most extreme distress, free of cost, at 170 Chatham Square, New York. It never colors or smarts, but reduces and cools inflammation, heat, and fever at the first application, and druggists sell ten times more Pain Paint than any other remedy. Get quart bottles; they hold sixteen one-dollar bottles, and cost only $8 apiece.

S. T.—1860.—X.

"To be, or not to be, that is the question."
Whether to suffer with mental anguish,
Feverish lips, cracking pains, dyspeptic agonies,
And nameless bodily suffering;
Or whether, with sudden dash,
Seize a bottle of PLANTATION BITTERS,
And, as Gunther swears, be myself a man again.
Gunther said my eyes were sallow,
My visage haggard, my breath tremendous bad,
My disposition troublesome—in fact,
He gently hinted I was fast becoming
Quite a nuisance.
Four bottles now beneath my vest have disappeared:
My food has relish, my appetite is keen,
My step elastic, my mind brilliant, and
Nine pounds avoirdupois is added to my weight.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—A delightful toilet article—superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED

For "MEN OF OUR TIMES;" or, Leading Patriots of the Day. An elegant octavo volume, richly illustrated with 18 beautiful Steel Engravings, and a portrait of the author,

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

Agents say it is the best, and sells the quickest of any book they ever sold. Some are taking 200 orders per week. It will outsell "Uncle Tom's Cabin." We employ no general agents, but pay extra commission. Old agents will appreciate this item. Send for circulars giving full particulars. Address
I. D. DENISON, 208 Broadway, New York.

What we Love a Woman for;

The Secret of Success; That Horrid Little Fright; How to make Paper Flowers; How to make Skeleton Leaves; Potichomanie; Effects of Tea on the System; The Sergeant's Ghost, &c. See "MAPLE LEAVES," for May. Only 25 cents a year. Send Subscriptions to O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau Street, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are receiving by each and every Steamer

ELEGANT NOVELTIES

IN THE

LATEST PARIS STYLES DRESS SILKS, DRESS SUIT MATERIALS, PARIS-MADE MANTILLAS, INDIA CAMEL'S HAIR SHAWLS, BRUSSELS POINTE LACES AND LACE GOODS, LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S DRESSES, DRESS HATS, AND UNDER-GARMENTS, &c.;

ALEXANDRE'S CELEBRATED KID GLOVES IN NEW SHAPES AND COLORS;

And are constantly making ADDITIONS TO ALL THEIR POPULAR STOCKS,

AT EXTREMELY ATTRACTIVE PRICES.

BROADWAY AND TENTH STREET.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made: 3 New Patents received.
MARTINGALE RINGS, $18 and $20 single gross.
SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross.
BILLIARD BALLS, $9 and $10 per set.
CHECKS, $8, $10, and $12 per 100.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $18 to $150 per gross pair.
WM. M. WELLING, 571 Broadway, New York.

2,500,000 Customers in Four Years.

Patronize the Best.

Having the largest capital, most experienced buyers, and extensive trade of any concern in the Dollar Sale business, we

GUARANTEE SATISFACTION

in every instance, and also the best selection of goods ever offered at

ONE DOLLAR EACH.

No other concern has any show wherever our agents are selling. Our motto, "Prompt and Reliable." Male and female agents wanted in city and country.

THE LADIES

are particularly requested to try our popular club system of selling all kinds of DRY and FANCY GOODS, DRESS PATTERNS, COTTON CLOTH, CASTORS, SILVER-PLATED GOODS, WATCHES, &c. (Established 1864.) A patent pen fountain and a check describing an article to be sold for a dollar, 10 cents; 20 for $2; 40 for $4; 60 for $6; 100 for $10; sent by mail. Free presents to getter up, (worth 50 per cent. more than those sent by any other concern), according to size of club. Send us a trial club, or if not do not fail to send for a circular.

N.B.—Our sale should NOT be classed with New York dollar jewelry sales or bogus "Tea Companies," as it is nothing of the sort.

EASTMAN & KENDALL,
65 Hanover Street, Boston, Mass.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Moonstone," a Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Creese," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year......$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year...... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year...... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

FALLACIES of the FACULTY

The stomach is the ruling organ of the system. If that digestion is imperfect, every member, every gland, every muscle, every nerve and fibre is more or less out of order. All the fluids are depraved. The brain is clouded. The spirits are depressed. All dyspeptics know this to be the truth. It is not, however, half the truth. Volumes would be required to enumerate the pains and penalties of dyspepsia, nor could any pen do them justice. Tens of thousands feel them; no man can describe them.

Can they be prevented? Can they be relieved? Can they be banished at once and forever? Unquestionably they can. No dyspeptic has ever been in vain. Believe no one who says the complaint is incurable. The very worst cases of dyspepsia will yield to it—is eradicating it in thousands of cases over which medical practitioners have shaken their heads ominously, saying, "Nothing can be done."

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

The faculty has its fallacies. One of them is that indigestion is the most difficult of all the ordinary ailments of mankind to combat and subdue. This is a mistake. Nothing can be easier than to conquer it if the true power be administered. This vegetable combination, which has become famous throughout the civilized world as HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, is an antidote to the disease which has never been known to fail, and fortunately it is every where procurable. If you wish to be rid with the dyspeptic, try the pharmacopœia prescriptions. If you want to avoid it and suffer none of its recurrence, take the Bitters daily. There is no discount on the testimony in its favor. If there is a man or woman who has ever tried it for indigestion without receiving benefit, the fact has not transpired. Universal, uncontradicted praise avouches its wonderful tonic virtues.

New Spring Goods

FOR GENTLEMEN.

ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

Curls! Curls! Curls!

A sample of Prof. Butler's Magnetic CURLIQUE sent to any address free. Beautiful, luxurious, flowing curls produced on the first application without injury to the Hair. This is the only reliable and harmless Hair Curler. All others are worthless imitations. Address Sole Agent, JAMES S. BUTLER, No. 923 Broadway, New York City.

PARIS, 1867.

Cheap, Useful, and Elegant,

IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

(The qualities and reasonableness of this new metal, such, compared to gold, that even judges have deceived) with BISHOFOFF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH.

The Imperial Russian Commissioner of Watches says: "I have made a metal differing entirely from any ever known to the public. It has seriously occupied my attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the approbation of the press in consequence of its remarkable properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and has been favorably reported by receipt of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacture of Church goods.

The qualities of this metal are such that it is surprising to observe, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further particulars will be found in my pamphlet, which will be posted on demand.

My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are of the new style, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell my Watches at the very low and extremely low price of $16 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.

Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

Any responsible house can receive goods on letters. Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

SOMETHING NEW.

THE BALLARD BREECH-LOADING SHOT-GUN. This gun is now ready for the new ready for delivery. Price, $50 00. Sent, securely packed, on receipt of price. For the wholesale trade, H. D. & H. BALLARD, No. 9 Southover Portals, Eagle Revolvers, American Watches, Jewelry, all sizes. Superior quality. Send for circular. Address MERWIN, TAYLOR, & SIMPKINS, Sole Agents, 562 Broadway, New York. New York, May 1st, 1868.

Orders will be executed for all goods in our line.

TO THE LADIES

We are Agents for over 2 HUNDRED Foreign and Home Manufactures, and are prepared to furnish the whole country with DRY and FANCY GOODS, SILKS, SHAWLS, JEWELRY, SILVER WARE, FURNITURE, PIANOS, SEWING MACHINES, &c., &c., at the uniform price of

One Dollar for Each Article.

Send your clubs or tea and upward for descriptive Circular, showing what article can be obtained for One Dollar, with testimonials from all parts.

CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Presents worth from $1 to $400 sent free of charge to agents getting clubs.

Agents wanted in every town.

CUSHMAN & CO.,
10 Arch Street, Boston.

THE DOLLAR WATCH.—The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, handsome case, glass crystal, white dial, steel and metal works, watch stem wind and set, will answer correct time. Warranted for two years. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Sent by mail for $1 50, or by Express, C.O.D., on receipt of order. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 75c., 80c., 90c., best at $1 00.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 75c., 80c., best $1 00.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 75c., 80c., 90c., best $1 00.
IMPERIAL (Green), 50c., 60c., 75c., 80c., 90c., best $1 00.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 75c., 80c., 90c., best $1 00.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 $ lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1, $1 10, best $1 25 $ lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families using large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 25c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 20 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States and Canada have their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouse in New York.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in the club send his name and say how much tea or coffee he will select for his share, and price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is completed, send the list to us by mail, and we will put up a party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them; with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution when they arrive. Any one can get up a club, and no more. The largest clubs obtain the largest inducements. The benefits arising from clubs can divide equitably among themselves.

The Teas made to order for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money order, by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by express, C.O.D., to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We invite correspondence, and solicit orders for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that call themselves branches of our Establishment, or copy our name in any way, or use any of our Signs or Devices.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens book of type, 25 cents. Address, POTTER & CO., 13 Courtlandt Street, New York.

$25 PER DAY. WANTED, Male and Female, Local and Traveling Agents, to whom steady employment. No capital required. Address at once, EXCELSIOR MANUFACTURING CO., Boston, Mass.

INDELIBLE PENCIL, for Marking Linen. Will mark 1500 articles. Used like a lead pencil. Will not boil. 50,000 sold. Sent by mail, prepaid, for 25 cts. Warranted. Money returned if not satisfactory. Sample, in neat case, for 50 cts.; 2 for $1; 1 doz. for $3. AGENTS WANTED. $10 per day easily made. Address HENRY L. PELTON, 170 Nassau St., N. Y.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
(Near Church Street),
NEW YORK.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

ECONOMY is Wealth." Franklin. Why will people pay $50 or 100 for a sewing machine when $25 will buy a better one for all practical purposes? Notwithstanding the assertions to the contrary, the subscribers beg to inform their numerous friends that the "FRANKLIN" and "FRANKLIN SHUTTLE" have had in my quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete in every respect, combines all necessary principles, and DOES NOT infringe upon any other in the world. Its superiority the poor man's friend. The Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of patrons will testify. AGENTS WANTED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and prices away to families who desire a handy and desirable article.

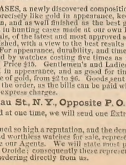
J. C. OTTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $8, $13, $25, $39. Price of Type, $1 per lb. Send 25 cts. for 32-page Book of Specimens, Cards, &c., to 25 Ware St., Boston.

4 SEWING MACHINE, 4

THE CELEBRATED $4 CHAMPION SEWING MACHINE is a glorious success. It is highly appreciated, and is entirely new and original. It stitches and embroiders beautifully, making the Elastic Lock-Stitch. The ladies are in love with it, and agents make from $100 to $200 a month. Every machine warranted 3 years. For a sample machine and terms to agents, send 4 cents for stamp and a our circular and receive the letter. Address, in plain hand, M. LEWIS & CO., Manufacturers, 629 Broadway, New York.



Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIODE WATCH FACTORY.

DIRECTOR.—A newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These Watches are made at our own Factory, from the best and most approved styles, are jeweled in five holes, and well finished throughout, and for appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing ten times their price. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep correct time for one year. Ladies' and Gents' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. As Oriode Watches are not made in the United States, they escape the payment of gold. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must get all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in order to impose upon the public. We have NO AGENTS in the United States, and have not employed any Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. One genuine Oroide Watch can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

PATENT OFFICES.

Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for over Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis.

☞ A Hand-Book about Patents, Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, Industrial Statistics, Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

Greatest Curiosity of the 19th Century.

WONDERFUL ELECTRIC FISH. It pleases all. By mail for 25 cents, or 3 for 50 cts. Address the inventor, NATHAN HALL, West Millbury, Mass.

☞ Agents wanted in every part of the world.

THE LITTLE JOKER—A monthly paper, crammed full of jokes, stories, poetry, and spicy advertisements. Specimen 10c. Address LITTLE JOKER, Holliday's Cove, W. Va.

EMPLOYMENT. $15 00 to $30 00 a day guaranteed. A few Males or Female wanted in every town—descriptive circulars free. Address JAMES C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Cements, Varnishes, Polishes, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and 1000 things useful in every day domestic life. Every family should have a copy. Sent postpaid for 25 cents, by O. A. BRADLEY, P.O. Box 102 Newark N. Y.

$4 EMPLOYMENT. $10.

HUNDREDS of Agents make from $5 to $10 per day selling our NEW PATENT EXTENSION REEL AND SWIFTS combined. Used in every family for winding Yarn, Zephyr, Thread, &c. Will fold into small skeins, and weighs less than one pound. Agents wanted. For terms address

H. I. STORKE & CO., Auburn, N. Y.

$250 per Month guaranteed to Agents every where selling the Celebrated Wilcox Patent Cable Lines. Write for Circulars to the American Wire Co., 79 William St., N. Y., or 16 Custom St., Chicago, Ill.

$2 00 to $5 00

FOR every hour's service, pleasant and honorable employment without risk. Desirable for all ladies and gentlemen. Address mechanics, address, every body. C. W. JACKSON & CO., 58 Beekman St., New York.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to every subscriber. Only 10 cts. a year.

Dr. Hudson's Anodinized Shark's Oil, for the speedy cure of Deafness, Noises in the Head, Painful Discharges from the Ears, &c. Price $1 00. Address Dr. J. HUDSON, Care Box 3075, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Ready:

LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. With a Collection of Meteorological Tables. By Elias Loomis, LL.D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and Author of a "Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $2 50.

II.

KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: Portrayed in the Light of Scripture History and the Book of Psalms. By Frederick William Krummacher, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite," &c. Translated, under the express Sanction of the Author, by Rev. M. G. Easton, M.A. With a Letter from Dr. Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

III.

WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By Henry White, M.A., Ph.D. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, Italian, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe." By W. Pinnock Futnoir, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book" "Guide to the Knowledge of Holliday," University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

V.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years'-Truce—1609. By J. Lothrop Motley, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Complete in Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

VI.

BARNES'S THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS. History of the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States. By William Barnes, M.A., Author of "The Body Politic," &c. With Eighteen Steel Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

VII.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1867. Edited by William Smith, LL.D., Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

VIII.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from Journals of Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Extracts from Journals. Edited by Arthur Helps. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

Uniform with Queen Victoria's Memoir of the Prince Consort.

IX.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

X.

DU CHAILLU'S GORILLA COUNTRY. Stories of the Gorilla Country: Narrated for Young People. By Paul B. Du Chaillu, Author of "Explorations in Equatorial Africa." Profusely Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

XI.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. By Albert Barnes, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Arrocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

XII.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Illusions, Selected with Notes and Prefatory Reflections as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of Love. By Mary Clemmer. Post 8vo, Cloth, $2 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

POOR HUMANITY. By F. W. Robinson, Author of "Christie's Faith," "Mattie: a Story," "Carry's Confession," "No Man's Friend," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE. By the Author of "Si. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Miss M. E. Braddon, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c., &c. The Sequel to "Birds of Prey." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SOONER OR LATER. By Shirley Brooks, Author of "The Silver Cord," &c. Illustrated by De Maurier. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

MY HUSBAND'S CRIME. With Illustrations by Gaston Fay. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ONE OF THE FAMILY. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Sam Slick's Wise Saws," &c.

BROWNLOWS. By Mrs. Oliphant, Author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of My Life," "Margaret Maitland," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, 37 cents.

MARGARET'S ENGAGEMENT. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By Annie Thomas, Author of "On Guard," "Denis Donne," "Theo Leigh," "Walter Goring," "Played Out," "Called to Account," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

GUILD COURT. A London Story. By George Mac Donald, Author of "Alec Forbes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By Sarah Tytler. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

HOW IT WOULD BE, IF SOME LADIES HAD THEIR OWN WAY.

"The Pen is Mightier than the Sword."

MORTON'S GOLD PENS

DO NOT WEAR OUT.

A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

BY THEIR USE

THE LABOR OF WRITING IS REDUCED,

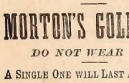
Greater Uniformity is Obtained.

Ease, Elegance and Beauty are acquired

ECONOMY, PLEASURE AND PROFIT CONSULTED.

The Best, Cheapest and most Durable Instruments for Writing ever used.

SENT BY MAIL SAFELY.



Prices, Fifty Cents and upwards.

NO TRAVELING AGENTS EMPLOYED.

Call and you will find Pens exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing; or enclose stamp for circular

A. MORTON,

25 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

LYON'S
Ladies' Paper COLLARS.

Splendid imitations of Linen Embroidery and Needle-work in great variety. They are worn by ladies every where. We will send a dozen of either of the above, or of all of them, by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price. Try them. Address

Wm. P. Lyon & Son, P. O. Box 4461, N. Y.

N. B.—Merchants will be supplied on very liberal terms. Samples and Price-list by mail when desired.

Lead-Encased Block Tin Pipe.

THE ONLY PIPE YET PRESENTED for PUBLIC USE which combines SAFETY TO HEALTH with STRENGTH, PLIANCY, and DURABILITY. It is CHEAPER and STRONGER than lead pipe, and is a SURE PROTECTION against LEAD POISONS. Recommended by Chemists, Physicians, Water Commissioners, and Practical Plumbers. Pamphlets containing information sent free. Address THE COLWELLS, SHAW & WILLARD MANUFACTURING CO., No. 105 Beekman Street, corner of Pearl Street, New York. Furnish full of water and size of pipe wanted.

A NEW KNIFE.

J. RUSSELL & CO.,
GREEN RIVER WORKS,
MANUFACTURERS OF FINE
TABLE CUTLERY
AND POCKET KNIVES,
OFFER TO THE TRADE
A NEW KNIFE
FOR HOTELS, STEAMBOATS, AND RESTAURANTS.

This Knife is forged—Handle and Blade—from one bar of steel, is heavily plated with silver, and is the strongest, most durable, and cheapest knife in the market.

Referring to the above advertisement, we desire to commend the use of the "NEW KNIFE." It is all the Patentees claim for it, and will prove satisfactory. PRICES: Table, $12; Dessert, $10 per dozen. We will send one dozen to any address, payable on delivery, with express charges.

SOLD WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO.,
Importers of China, Glass, &c.,
479 BROADWAY, FOUR DOORS BELOW BROOME STREET.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

Food should produce Blood, not Gas. Fizzlency is proof positive that the stomach lacks digestive power. Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient relieves the stomach and bowels from a plethora of wind, and restores their natural energy, while it relieves them from all obstructions. Sold by all Druggists.

SCHENCK'S
TIC DOULOUREUX
OR Universal Neuralgia
PILL.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure for NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage: One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents; six do., $5.00, postage 27 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 48 cts. Sold by all Druggists.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!

Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-plated Ware, Cooking Utensils.

CHINA AND GLASS WARE,

at greatly reduced prices.

BASSFORD'S,

Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

The Finger of Fate,

BY

CAPTAIN MAYNE REID,

IN THE

Fireside Companion,

OUT TO-DAY.

For sale by all News Dealers. Price 6 cents—$8 00 per year.

GEORGE MUNRO & CO.,
137 William Street, New York.

ASK FOR A WALTHAM WATCH.

It is the Best. It is the Cheapest.
ALWAYS GET THE GENUINE.
T. B. BYNNER, 189 Broadway, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,

And others should send $1.00 in gift of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 63 Broadway.

C. O. D.

American (WALTHAM) Watches,

NOW UNIVERSALLY ACKNOWLEDGED THE BEST AND CHEAPEST WATCH IN THE WORLD.

I will send to any address by Express, a genuine WALTHAM WATCH, Chronometer Balance, Extra Jeweled, and in fine Silver Case, for $35, to be sold on delivery, accompanied with certificate of American Watch Company, guaranteeing it to be in all respects as represented. THE BUYER TO HAVE PRIVILEGE OF EXAMINATION IN THE POSSESSION OF EXPRESS COMPANY. (No dealer in metal watches can make a similar offer. The purchaser is reminded that the price named is only a small advance on the real value, and dealer at any price, and manufactured only by the purposes of fraud and deception, necessarily sold under fictitious names, and in such manner that the real swindler's name continues wholly unknown, and consequently redress becomes impossible.

Name and address must be distinctly written. Buyer to pay Express charge. Address

EUGENE BADGLEY, 137 Fulton St., N.Y.

F. BLUME,

1125 BROADWAY, HAS JUST PUBLISHED:

The Eye that Brightens when I Come (for Piano) .30c.
Pulling Hard Against the Stream .....30c.
Nellie's Gone Forever.....30c.
Have You Seen Her Lately? (comic).....35c.
"Dandy Pat," and "Paddy's the Boy," each .....35c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Music mailed.

TRY

B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,

MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.

Cures Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.

Try your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY,

64, 63, 66, 67, 65, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 46 and 48 West Street, New York.

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

28 Elevations, splendidly printed in Colors, and 22 Plans and Sections, to working scale. Postpaid, $12.

WOODWARD'S
Country Homes.

150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect,
191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all my books on Architecture.

I. E. WALRAVEN,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

Curtain Materials, Linens, Upholstery Goods, and Window Shades.

686 BROADWAY, NEW YORK;
719 CHESTNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA.

STUMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN

One Forward and two Backward Arches, ensuring great elasticity, well balanced elasticity, easiness of point, and smoothness of execution. Sold by all Stationers. One gross in twenty-one assorted points and gold Pen. One dozen Pens, assorted points and of Patent Ink-retaining Penholder, inclosed on receipt of 50c. A. S. STUMPSON & CO., 111 and 113 William St., N. Y.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

CONSULAR SEAL

CHAMPAGNE,

AS IMPORTED FOR N. Y. UNION CLUB.

TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway,

Publisher and Importer of

SCIENTIFIC WORKS,

has just issued a new General Catalogue of Books, 48 pages, octavo. Sent by mail on application.

THE UNIVERSAL FAVORITE.

$5 SEWING MACHINE

SIMPLE AND PRACTICAL.

Every machine is perfectly adjusted, packed in a small box, and will be sent, per express, on receipt of $5, to any address in the country. On exhibition and for sale by

GRAHAM & CO.,
Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel, 504 Broadway.

To Book-Keepers and Business Men.

THE CRITTENDEN COMMERCIAL ARITHMETIC and BUSINESS MANUAL contains the Rapid and Improved Methods of Calculation, and the Modern Forms of Business Papers, accompanied by explanations which are required among business men. Also numerous useful labor-saving Commercial Tables, and much Valuable Business Information.

Four Large Editions sold within a few months. Used in Hundreds of Counting Houses and in the Schools, Academies, and Colleges throughout the Country. Highly commended by eminent Merchants, Bankers, Instructors, and the Press. FIFTH EDITION, revised and much enlarged, NOW READY. Handsomely bound, 12mo, Price $1 50. Will be sent to any address, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price. Agents wanted. Address

S. H. CRITTENDEN & CO.,
637 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

Invented by a surgeon. Legs with lateral motion at ankle; Arms with new shoulder motion. Send for a pamphlet. DOUGLAS BLY, M.D., 695 Broadway, N.Y.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. BABBITT'S LOAF COFFEE." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All other Coffees "exposed," and the Coffee ground with a glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory,

B. T. BABBITT,

Nos. 64, 63, 66, 67, 65, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

DRUNKENNESS CURED

By UPHAM'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1 25 by S. C. UPHAM, 38 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED to introduce our NEW STAR SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Price also on both sides. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. We will choose Machines to responsible parties, and EMPLOY ENERGETIC AGENTS ON A SALARY. Full particulars and copy of Paper furnished on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., St. Louis, Mo.; Cleveland, Ohio; or Boston, Mass.

500 Photographs for 10 Cents. Address A. SEYMOUR & CO., Box 57, Station A, N. Y. City.

POLLAK & SON, Manuf'rs of Meerschaum Goods, Amber, etc., 405 Broadway, next Broome St., & 37 John St., Up Stairs, New York. Pipes Made to Order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5346.

WARDS SHIRTS

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars, sent free every where. THE CASH can be paid to Express Company on receipt of goods. Cor. Broadway and Union Square; also 387 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 595.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE LITTLE WOMAN.—[SEE THE POEM, PAGE 322.]

LITTLE WOMAN.

(See Illustration on preceding Page.)

LITTLE WOMAN! Busy bee!
Pattern of home industry!
Not a moment can she spare
From her all-absorbing care,
Though the cat stands mewing there,
With arched back, and wondering why
It can't catch its mistress' eye;
For her heart by duty steeled!
No! potatoes must be peeled
Though a thousand pussies squealed.
So she sits, sweetly sedate,
Grave as chancellor of state.
If she could be, stern as Fate.
Puss, she knows, wants but a glance
To be off in Dervish dance,
Tumbling, twirling round and round,
Then with mischief backward bound
For its tail, that's never found.
So she sits and peels away,
Though she longs to be at play.
Pussy, wait till work is done,
Then you'll have your fill of fun;
For our Little Woman, now,
With pursed lips and anxious brow,
Grave as bishop or as judge,
From her work will never budge
Till 'tis done. Then up, away!
She, the gayest of the gay,
Veriest mudcap at her play.

Mother's helpmeet! Father's joy
Elder brother's pride and toy!
To the rest—a baby brother
And two sisters—second mother!

Little Woman! Charming sprite!
Though not, like rich damsel, digit
In bracelet can bright,
Or in tissues airy light,
Who coquettishly finesses
With her silkiness of tresses,
Decked with gauzy daintinesses;
Still, adored with modest care,
And thy wealth of auburn hair,
With bewitching simple grace,
Framing in thy sweet Spring face,
Thou, the fairest of the fair,
Spell-bound boldest each one's sight.
And thy maiden charms are such
We can never gaze too much.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1868.

THE VICE-PRESIDENCY.

THE Chicago Convention will of course nominate General GRANT for the Presidency by acclamation; and a party platform which at such a time has such a candidate. His character, his career, and his genuine republicanism are his platform. His clear sagacity and unsophisticated sense of justice assure the eminent Radical; his coolness, prudence, and moderation the cautious Conservative. The party extremes are thus likely to be balanced and tempered by him as in no other man. The Convention will find it an easy and a grateful office to nominate a President. Who shall be its candidate for Vice-President?

The Convention can not forget that the Republican party will be judged by the men who are nominated at Chicago; and it must remember that it is the tendency of the party—like every party in power—to forget how much character counts for in the contest. The advantage of presenting to the country with General GRANT a man of similar simplicity and sincerity of character is incalculable. The disadvantage of nominating any man whatever whose name does not every where and inevitably inspire confidence is infinitely greater than any supposed gain from propitiating cliques, or sections, or States. Who, then, shall be the candidate?

Experience will teach the Convention that no man whose political faith is not entirely in his personal character ought to be nominated for Vice-President. The general theory that secured at Baltimore in 1864 the nomination of ANDREW JOHNSON should be spurned as it deserves. JOHNSON was nominated by the tendency that did not heartily trust the Republican principles. He was pressed because he had been a Democrat, because he had been a slaveholder, because he lived in a border State, and because, notwithstanding all these things, he had been true to the Union cause. But the real faith of the party he neither understood nor accepted, and those who urged his nomination knew it. He was the candidate of those who have little confidence in principles as controlling political action, and who afterward favored the Philadelphia Johnson Convention. But the Chicago Convention will not wisely forget that now, as in 1864, there is a great fundamental principle involved in our political situation. It was so also in 1865. It has been so ever since slavery was an element in our political debates. Recrancy to that principle is fatal. If JOSHUA R. GIDDINGS had been permitted to leave the Chicago Convention of 1860 by the reluctance of the Convention to declare for equal rights, the party would have been morally weakened in a perilous degree. The Convention did not hesitate. It raised that banner. Mr. SEWARD carried it over the line of the Slave States, and planted it at St. Josephs, in Missouri; and it was one of those events which our political history will always remember to his honor.

The Vice-President must, therefore, be a man of the soundest Republican convictions. That, however, is not to be determined by the noise of his asseverations, nor the extravagance of his expressions, nor of the methods he favors. Violent rhetoric is always easy. Mr. JOHNSON was very forward in declaiming that treason must be made odious, and that traitors must take back seats. But the party at large measures men, not by their Congressional declamation, but by the tenor of their whole career. We are fools if we have not learned to value character and capacity more than rhetoric. Our candidate for the Vice-Presidency must be not merely a true Republican, universally known and respected as such, not only a man of spotless reputation, but a man of general intelligence and training which are essential to the proper discharge of the duties of the office. If he has been out of office for a time, so much the better; for he better really understands public sentiment, of which men in office are curiously ignorant.

Let us have a man of whom we are all justly proud in his degree as we are of GRANT; whose character illustrates the principles and aims of the party; and whom we would be willing to support for the Presidency. We want no bargains, no compromises; for they are not necessary. We do not wish to make a nomination to secure any particular State. The record and tactics uniformly fails. A proper candidate, from whatever State, will poll the whole vote of the party. We respectfully remind our friends in the Convention that upon no occasions party managers appear to represent the great public sentiment outside, but they do not. Eight years ago, in the very month of May, those who were accounted the shrewdest managers of the Republican party stood in the Richmond House at Chicago openly deploring the nomination of the "dark-lantern lecturer," ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and the defeat of Mr. SEWARD as the destruction of the party. They did not understand public feeling then, as they do not now. Let our delegates look around and ask himself what the great multitude that elected ABRAHAM LINCOLN four years ago wish and expect, and they will see that they desire only a man whom they know and trust as they do General GRANT. Whoever comes nearest to that is the candidate whose nomination will secure such a response as the delegates will be glad to hear.

If, however, passing such a man by, some doubtful candidate be selected, every one who, however prominent and whatever his radical consistency or obstinacy of will, yet conspicuously lacks the sagacity and moderation which are, at this time, as essential in the Vice-President as principle and firmness—or if the choice fall upon some mere politician in a low sense, or upon some one who has been much known upon the country; upon some one whose name excites no feeling beyond his own State, and who has even there no following but that which springs from patronage, the result will be a clouded reputation whose nomination would instantly throw the party upon the defensive; some man whose success must depend upon vestiges and means which would painfully contrast with that of General GRANT and fall chill and discouraging upon the party—should the Convention nominate such a man upon him will sadly disappoint the great body of intelligent citizens and seriously embarrass the path to victory.

IMPEACHMENT AND THE NEW YORK "TRIBUNE."

THE tone of the New York Tribune during the last days of the Impeachment trial was insulting to every honorable American. Apparently smitten with terror lest its honest verdict of the Senate should not agree with its own wishes it cracked the party whip in the most virulent and intolerable manner, threatening to advance every Republican Senator who might vote in obedience to his convictions to acquit the President as "infamous," and "the same as ANDREW JOHNSON" himself.

"The Republican party has taken the responsibility of Impeachment, and the Republican Senators have assumed themselves to exercise a judicial trust in the discussion. To presume that any Republican will deliberately vote to acquit Mr. JOHNSON is to assume that his course hitherto has been a fraud. The case we hear about the 'responsibility of an oath' is absurd. Every Senator has sworn, before, upon the responsibility of his oath, and to assume that there is any additional obligation in Impeachment trials upon the sincerity of all previous action. There is no Republican who has not asked for power, and followed and appreciated the President's course. He knows in what respects Mr. JOHNSON has erred, and how far his errors have injured the country. He knows, therefore, how far the President has sinned. He has united in approving that sin. Therefore, the whole theory of Impeachment is merely to repeat votes that have been given a hundred times. If it were wise to send Mr. JOHNSON for his policy, it is just to punish him. His Impeachment is the logical consequence of Republicanism, and no Republican can vote against it without making himself infamous. The only alternative is Impeachment or Infamy. If JOHNSON is acquitted, then the whole course of these men is a lie, and their deception is infamous. They led the party to this issue. They educated it to the work. They echoed every denunciation, and emphasized every criticism of the President's policy. If they have been honest in this, then impeachment is as sure as the sun."

According to this extraordinary outburst, the whole trial has been a ridiculous farce, for the Senate had already accused, tried, and convicted the President. All the previous logic declares that if it be wise for the Legislature in a free country to differ with the Executive and to argue against his policy, therfore it is just to punish him! If a President has not a majority in the Senate put him out. Every honorable and sensible Republican hangs his head to think that this folly appears in a leading journal of the party whose supremacy he considers essential to the national welfare.

The great service which the Tribune formerly rendered to this good cause will be always gratefully remembered. But since its principles have been in power, with all its experience and ability, its total want of ordinary judgment has constantly alienated from it the sympathy of very many of the most faithful and reflecting of the Republicans. During the whole Impeachment trial nothing could have been more damaging to the party and to the cause than the course of the Tribune. It has done all it could do to make it difficult even for Senators, who thought that the President ought to be removed, to vote for his removal. It has screamed at them as if they did not understand both what principle demanded, and what was true party policy. Soon after the trial began the Tribune announced in the most imposing manner that General GRANT thought it necessary for the safety of the country that the President should be removed; and it added, "When the General of our armies entertains this conviction there is no room for doubt as to the duty of the Senate." Never was there a more outrageous sentence published in this country. The Senate, according to the Tribune, is to register the will of the President, and lest that might not be enough, as the trial drew to an end, it insisted that Mr. EVARTS had dissolved his connection with the Republican party because he had defended the President—spoke of Senator GRIMES as "indignant and vindictive," because he insisted that other counsel should be present in the galleries of the Senate, and described him as "cowering into his seat" when he was hissed for his very proper effort. It said that "Senator TRUMBULL, painfully conscious of a sinful brief" was disingenuous in the motion. These eminent Republicans were assailed with ribald insult because it was supposed that they would vote against the wishes of the Tribune. It is very plainly insinuated that Republican Senators who should vote for the acquittal would have been bought with money, and would be worthy to rank with BENEDICT ARNOLD, and then endeavored to excuse itself by saying that such reports were "in the mouths of all men." The Brooklyn Union, a stanch Republican paper, well expressed the feeling of all good citizens in saying, "The absurdity of the Tribune's article of this morning is only equaled by its impudence, and that is unparalleled in Northern political journalism, or in civilized journalism any where."

The Republican party is disgraced and humiliated by the course of the Tribune during the trial, as it was by the Alta Vela discussion, and the quarrel between Mr. DONNELLY and Mr. WASHBURNE in the House. This is unavoidable, although the course to which we allude the Tribune no more represented the sentiment of the party than it did at the beginning of the secession movement when it said: "If the country goes madly and earnestly wish to withdraw from the Union, we think they should and would be allowed to do so"; or when it called the Declaration of Independence justified the secession from the British empire of three millions of colonists in 1776, "we do not see why it would not justify the secession of five millions of Southerners from the Union of 1861;" or when it betrayed its malevolence toward Mr. LINCOLN'S administration in its early days by saying it professed all willingness to renounce the national cause if LEE should cross the Susquehanna; or when it insisted that we should try one more battle and delude the rebels that we had no chief after we mingled in peace negotiations with rebels at Niagara; or when he wrote to President LINCOLN, in the dark days of the war, imploring him in the name of a heart-broken, bankrupt, bleeding country, to pay four hundred millions of dollars to the slaveholders to buy peace; or when the editor refused to read now declares it infamous in a Senator to think that ANDREW JOHNSON is not proved guilty of specific charges which the Constitution left to lead JEFFERSON DAVIS. Upon all these occasions the course of the Tribune or its editor, however sincere and patriotic and humane may have been the intention, did not, it seems to us, represent the conviction or the policy of the Republican party.

If evidently misrepresented the real sentiment of the party when it opposed the nomination of General GRANT, which it did at the time of the suspension of Mr. STANTON in a series of ungenerous insinuations, which have been silenced by the unanimous and enthusiastic selection of General GRANT as the Republican candidate for the Presidency. The Tribune's candidate in 1860 was EDWARD BATES, of Missouri. What the situation would now have been had Mr. BATES been nominated may be surmised. In 1864 it would willingly have seen Mr. LINCOLN set aside for another candidate. In 1866 it supported for Mayor of New York a person who wrote a letter to the World, when the Impeachment cause resolved to impeach, substantially proposing a vigilance committee and the disorganization of civil war. Such a person would have been a pleasing Mayor of the city at this time.

It seems to us that differing from his own Judgment as to party policy becomes a painful with this party record; and when it declared, without mentioning names when names were perfectly well understood, that SEWARD, FESSENDEN, TRUMBULL, SHERMAN, GRIMES, ANTHONY, and whatever other Republican Senators it supposed might vote against the President's conviction would be "infamous" if they did so, and must look thenceforth for a career outside of the Republican party, it assumed to speak for a party whose convictions and policy it has grossly misrepresented at most important epochs. The Tribune has the right to express its own opinion in such terms as it chooses. But a paper which justified secession has no right whatever to speak for the Republican party.

GENERAL BUTLER AS A PARTY REPRESENTATIVE.

IT has been stated from Washington for some time, and with an air of probability, that, in the event of the removal of the President, General BUTLER would be called to high position, either as a member of the Cabinet, or—what seems incredible—as Minister to England. Now, a party will be judged by the men whom it honors. If the Republican party, whether temporarily in power seems to us, as we have elsewhere said, essential to the national welfare, does not now commend its principles to universal approval by the kind of men whom it makes its representatives—if it compels honest and intelligent persons to say, "We are naturally Republicans, but really these gentlemen do not represent the party and its aims and principles as we understand them," the party will learn too late that the support of the intelligent and honest is also necessary to continuance in power. The party in this country must always represent progress, intelligence, morality. But it fails to do this when it advocates doubtful measures or honors doubtful men. It has, then, no right to expect loyalty, and when it thus betrays its commission the party discipline will ignominiously fail if it is applied to force submission.

To-day, with due admiration of his peculiar and valuable services in the war, and of his unquestionable cleverness, General BUTLER is not a true representative of the Republican party. On the 15th of December, 1866, we said of him in these columns: "General BUTLER does not seem to us to be the wisest national counselor at this time. He is emphatically the man for an active revolutionary epoch, the interregnum of law. In a reconstructive period like this, it is not only necessary that a political leader should be very sagacious and patient, as Mr. LINCOLN was, but that his character should inspire the fullest public confidence, as Mr. LINCOLN'S did. The moment self-seekers, the moment personal ambition is suspected, the power of the man is gone, and his counsel becomes merely a matter of curious observation and criticism. The people no longer recognize in him their representative, but they feel as if a clever manager were using them for his own advantage. Now, is it doubtful that the powerful impression of General BUTLER is that of a shrewd man bent upon personal success, who will ride any horse that promises to bring him to it? As he is reported to have said of himself, a man who voted a dozen times for JEFF DAVIS for President in the Charleston Convention of 1860 is a man who will dare any thing."

Has the career of the General in Congress disproved this opinion? He went into the House and rather arrogantly assumed a leadership, which was very promptly refused to him. He addressed the country in favor of impeachment, but its good sense saw the folly of doing what General BUTLER and not the General BUTLER'S grounds. Apparently resolved, however, to trim his bark to every gale, and believing that if impeachment were not popular something else might be, the General wrote a letter upon the finances, applying a construction to the law authorizing a certain issue of Five-Twenties, which no unprejudiced mind could seemed little different from swindling. This should have been quite enough to forbid the party with which the General was acting from trusting or following him. If his views were insincere, their declaration was grossly demoralizing. If they were sincere, they were none the less fatal to the national honor.

The country will not dwell unkindly upon the mournful tragedy of Great Bethel when it recalls the prompt and heroic occupation of Baltimore. As it remembers the vigorous mastery of New Orleans it would willingly forget the disaster of Fort Fisher. But it can never forget without incalculable loss and sorrow and shame that qualities which are valuable in the field are often to be most feared when the war is over. Neither the political career and professional reputation of General BUTLER before the war, nor his views upon public policy and the national honor since the war closed, entitle him to be regarded as a proper representative of the dominant party. The Republican party ought not to call a repudiator into office. It is inexpedient to do it. General BUTLER may demand it, and party managers may think it necessary to yield to his demand. But they ought to understand the inevitable consequences. They should stand firm in the position that no personal claim can be allowed to imperil the party. Certainly if any man may be said to have had "claims" upon the party (which no man has), Mr. SEWARD in 1860 was that man. But the good-sense of the party did not hesitate to sacrifice the "claims" of an individual to the general advantage of the party and of the country. General BUTLER in 1868 can have no "claim" upon the party comparable to that of Mr. SEWARD in 1860. Let him be judged as Mr. SEWARD was judged. If the party could not "afford" to make Mr. SEWARD its candidate, it "can not afford" to elevate General BUTLER.

If the voters of the Essex District in Massachusetts are satisfied with General BUTLER as their Representative; if they are in favor of paying honest debts in pieces of brown paper, they will elect a gentleman of their views. But the Republican party we believe to be of a different opinion; and should General BUTLER be imposed upon it as a National Representative, we trust that enough voices will be found in the party to show that he may represent the temporary party managers at Washington, but that a repudiator, however clever and conspicuous, is repudiated by the conscience and the political sagacity of the Republican party.

CONGRESS AND THE FISHERIES.

In Congress, the other day, Representative PIKE, of Maine, offered a resolution, which passed as amended, by a vote of 92 to 39, to the effect that the President be requested to send a sufficient number of vessels of war to the fishing-grounds in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, adjacent to the British Provinces, for the purpose of protecting American vessels in the exercise of their rights, as indicated in existing treaties."

Doubtless nine-tenths of the 10,000 American fishermen who pursue their occupation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and other Provincial waters, will be surprised to learn of any existing or prospective necessity for Government protection or interference in behalf of their rights. We question, indeed, if they would be able to define the precise nature and extent of those rights. All the differences of opinion which had for so many years constituted a standing menace of trouble between Great Britain and the United States were buried by the benign operation of the Reciprocity Treaty. In the course of ten conciliatory years fishermen learned to forget their nationality, and Americans cast their lines in British waters without much restriction, whenever the shoals of good fares seemed best assured; so that, after the treaty had terminated, there continued, through force of long habit, a mutual and tacit acquiescence in what had come to be regarded an equality of privileges. If fishermen only had been consulted, they would doubtless have preferred to fish fraternally together as before. Their interests did not clash. Both got as full fares and better prices than in previous years.

But, inasmuch as the abrogation of the treaty which secured these concessions to our fishermen deprived the Canadians of reciprocal advantages, and inasmuch, especially as we had taxed their fish, it became necessary for the Canadian Government to make at least a show of the rights they claimed by imposing a penalty upon Americans fishing in their waters. They did not enforce the attempt to exclude, our vessels, as they might have done; but, with commendable moderation, required merely a license fee of $30 per vessel. The Canadians have ever hoped for a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty. They were reluctant to go back to the status that existed before that treaty was entered into, which would only have revived old difficulties in full force, and therefore adopted this license system as a sort of compromise or half-way measure of repeal. The sum exacted was nominal and insignificant. It would not buy even a barrel of salt. It would not distress our fishermen, even if pertinaciously exacted by it as it has not been. Probably not one-half of our vessels have paid it. Either it has not been demanded of them, or it has been evaded. It is difficult to conceive such a tax, except in the employment of revenue vessels constantly on the alert. After the lapse of two years, the Canadian Government, which possibly feels pinched by its expensive "New Dominion" experiment, has taken some such measure into consideration. It also proposes to increase the tax to $4. This would doubtless be paid by our fishermen without demur. It is but a cheap price for so valuable a privilege. No one certainly would resist its payment unless encouraged to believe that they would be sustained by our Government in so doing; and unless they resisted, no occasion could arise to require armed interference, or even the presence of an armed fleet. It is better to pay it, even though there be a conflict of claims and pretensions in respect to the fisheries. It is not always the best policy to insist too strongly upon what are regarded as "rights." At all events no complaints or protests against its imposition have been heard yet, not even from New England, which section alone is specially interested. And the whole tax, if collected, would amount to only a few thousand dollars.

Nevertheless, upon the strength of this proposed action of the Canadians, which may never be consummated, Mr. PIKE at once became the self-constituted champion of men unconscious of any great grievances, and Congress adopts a resolution to equip a fleet at great expense, to threaten war for acts of injustice that may never be committed. The direct tendency of the whole procedure is to provoke hostility. It unnecessarily prejudices the minds of our fishermen to fancy themselves aggrieved and imposed upon; and it alienates those who are kindly disposed, and whose friendship it is our interest to cultivate. The provinces are gradually gravitating toward Republicanism and the United States, and at the present moment the feeling in favor of annexation is stronger than it ever was, especially in the Maritime Provinces. A large party throughout the "New Dominion" is exerting itself to secure the closest commercial, if not more intimate relations with the United States, and under the circumstances we can not fail to see the absurdity of any hostile policy or rapacious diplomacy. The road to an effectual settlement of the fisheries question is much easier through some treaty of reciprocity similar to the old one than by threatening displays of force. It is far more economical, more consistent with our dignity, and more creditable to the national intelligence and good sense. The general tone of the press upon this subject indicates that the public hold this view.

After all, it is quite likely, as Representative CHANLER intimates, that the resolution of Congress will chiefly serve in the interest of a few monopolists and owners of small fishing-craft-lads who wish to re-sell them to the Government at a profitable advance.

VANDALS IN NEW YORK.

WHEN the Barbarians conquered Rome they attacked the works of art. Passing the statues the victors with clubs knocked off sometimes a nose, sometimes a hand, or an arm; but the universality of the condemnation visited on this conduct by the civilized world left it doubtful if any of the representatives of this vulgar ignorance existed on the earth. But Vandals have, however, reappeared in New York. The portraits in the City Hall have been shockingly mutilated. The full-length portrait of Washington by GEORGE CLINTON has been ruined, and that of General MACOMB and of General HAMILTON seriously injured.

The Governor's room and the room adjoining constitute together a picture gallery interesting to citizens and strangers. It contains full-length portraits of all or nearly all of our State Governors, of the civil, naval and military heroes of the war of 1812; of WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, MONROE, and JAY, as well as of HAMILTON, and of the most distinguished Revolutionary characters; portraits, many of them of the three-quarter size, of the Mayors of the city from a very early period—STUYVESANT being one, and others of equal rank of celebrity are a very good bust in marble of HENRY CLAY. HUDBARD'S copy of the statue of WASHINGTON is temporarily deposited in the gallery.

These works of art are peculiar value as illustrations of the history of the city and State. The portrait of DECATUR is prized for its excellence. It is a forcible, manly picture, a faithful representation of that famous Captain. PERRY is painted passing in his row-boat in the heat of battle from his flag-ship, which had been disabled, to the vessel in which he gained the victory on Lake Erie.

The key to the gallery was easily obtained, upon a late visit, from the Janitor, who did not accompany us or direct us, because he had to do so. It was in this manner, doubtless, that the person who destroyed the portrait of Governor CLINTON gained admission to the gallery. On one occasion, a friend who had visited the gallery immediately before found the door unlocked and open, and no other person present.

The injuries that could have to the injury of these portraits it is difficult to conceive. Mr. COMB, who was one of the early graduates of West Point and an officer in the war of 1812, has long resided in the city of New York, and his mind but friendly recollections of him. The rascal who mutilated his face may have discovered in the handsome features and manly, noble expression a sufficient reason for dislike. CLINTON, also—stamped in his look as one of Nature's noblemen—must have excited in the breast of a malicious feeling, for there could have been no other animosity to CLINTON. Toward HAMILTON there may have been some hereditary hostility on account of his doctrines, which has frequently contrasted with JEFFERSON'S. But the cause, if it were any thing but malicious mischief, of dislike of his portrait must have been the consciousness that HAMILTON was one of the master-spirits who moulded our system of government and served mankind. If the Goth who mutilated these pictures had had a hammer in his hands he would probably have smitten the bronze statue of WASHINGTON—a copy of one of the most precious works of art in the country.

These injuries have been committed at different times, and it is very certain that the gallery is not closed for by the custodian of the pictures, and that the neglect of them after one attack, whereby they became exposed to another, subjects the person in charge of the apartment under the statute of the State, which punishes as a misdemeanor the "willful neglect" of any duty imposed by law on public servants. The Grand Jury should take cognizance of the matter, if there is any intention of preserving the other pictures. For many years Mr. MARTLING was keeper of the City Hall, and had charge of the Governor's room. Subsequently the care of it was devolved on Mr. TAYLOR. These officers performed their duty with great fidelity, and deliverers not only to persons very well known to them. No person could then have gained access to the room capable of doing such injury. But the fact that one such act did not secure the care which prevents repetition, and that no efforts have been made to discover the offender and bring him to justice, and none even to punish the negligence, assure us that this branch of the public service partakes of the general character of that of our municipal government in which the action of the machinery has been so reversed as to be used wholly to the injury of the people.

"DEMOCRACY" KNOWN BY ITS WORKS.

WE are sincerely glad that the Democratic party succeeded in electing a majority of the New York Assembly this year, because the people of this State have now had a fair opportunity of beholding the kind of millennium which the Democracy are ready to confer on mankind. Democratic ascendency in the country would secure, and therefore complete the Democratic ment and reform which might be expected from the party that so vigorously demands them. But in the perpetual spectacle of Democratic economy, public spirit, regard for public honor, and administrative efficiency is afforded by the city of New York in those departments of the government of which the Democracy have exclusive control. Fortunately the police of the city is in the hands of the State. For if the constituency that elects the Common Council were also to elect the constables, the city would become a by-word. The Metropolitan Police grew out of the bitter experience of the consequences of electing a person like FERNANDO WOOD mayor of the city, and lodging the substantial power over the police in his hands. Petitions went up from meetings irrespective of party, and the Metropolitan Police was established.

The great hope of the Democratic party is to control the State by the majority in the city. The computation of that majority is known. It is certainly not an untruth to say that the political sympathies of what are known as the ignorant and dangerous classes in the city are with the Democratic party. The ascendency of that party does not mean the control of intelligence in politics. It means that the most intelligent, the most truly conservative class of the population is in the minority. The ascendency of the Democratic party in the State means the control of the government by certain wellknown "rings" in the city, who, by means of the majority of their party in the Assembly, have this winter shown their hands. The taxes which these gentlemen would levy upon the State, and to support Roman Catholic schools in the city, in addition to the taxes that support schools for all the children of the State of every denomination, were very properly quelled by the decided protest of public opinion. But the intention was evident, and it will be effected whenever the ring-masters think themselves strong enough to try again.

These gentlemen have illustrated their principles and practice of public economy and financial reform by the Tax Levy for the city and county of New York. The Citizens' Association, which has experts constantly engaged in investigating and exposing these vast swindles, first sums up the points of this Democratic measure:

"Salaries of local officials are increased, some doubled—and some more than doubled: new offices with large pay are created; every item of customary expenditure has been enlarged nearly one hundred per cent; not only are the sums openly designated and fixed at a monstrous figure, but powers are conferred upon the Board of Supervisors power to issue bonds and run the city and county into debt to a limitless amount, and to any amount and purpose, and also giving the Supervisors power to expend two millions of dollars more upon the new County Court-house. All the acts of the city and county officials during the past year, which were done in violation of law, which have been vetoed by the mayor or arrested by the courts, are, by the provisions inserted in these tax levies, to be made valid, to fullest extent, and all the scheme which passed the Assembly of the State, and which has been sent to the Senate for concurrence. If the taxes are allowed to increase in the next fifteen years as they have increased in the past fifteen, then in that time they will be ninety millions of dollars per annum."

The party whose managers are responsible for this enormous tax levy is the same party whose orators are loudly declaiming against intolerable taxation. The men who fatten upon this blood of the people complacently represent themselves as peculiarly the people's friends. The party which controls the city of New York, and which has controlled the Assembly this winter, is the party of which vice and ignorance are every where the allies. Is this the party to which honest men wish to intrust the State government? Is this party, increased by the most disaffected part of the population of the late rebel States, the party to which men sincerely desirous of national prosperity and peace wish to intrust the national government?

THE ENGLISH SITUATION.

The British Ministry is a Committee of the House of Commons representing the will of the majority, and that majority is the Government. It can be only perplexed by the interference of the Crown. This has not really happened since the time of GEORGE III. until now, when the Queen has requested a Ministry defeated by a heavy majority of the Commons not to resign.

Her reason may be that this is a new Parliament, and the Reform Bill passed last year permits new constituencies whose voices she may think have a right to be heard before Parliament is dissolved. But when Mr. DISRAELI announced that the Queen had asked him to remain, Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT did not hesitate to say that the course was flagrantly unconstitutional. Mr. BRIGHT in a rather taunting replied by asking why Mr. GLADSTONE did not move a resolution of want of confidence. Mr. GLADSTONE made no answer. But if, after an emphatic expression of the House exhibited as offered by him, he should still find that Mr. DISRAELI did not intend to withdraw, Mr. GLADSTONE would subsequently bring in a motion of want of confidence.

Should Mr. DISRAELI, instigated by the Queen, still persist, the Commons would stop the supplies, and refuse to do so for even DISRAELI would venture to face the storm that would then burst, and which would hardly stop before it had swept away the Crown. It is to be presumed, therefore, that Mr. DISRAELI will be succeeded by Mr. GLADSTONE within a few weeks.

"THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL."

A STORY called "The Household Angel," by FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, begins in Number 31 of Harper's Bazar. Mr. LUDLOW'S nimble fancy and quick, shrewd eye, which have given to some of the most exquisite little tales we have, will have ample scope in his new work, the opening of which is very striking. The first words will be sure to fascinate the reader, and Mr. LUDLOW is not a magician who allows his spell to fail its power. "The Household Angel" will be charmingly and copiously illustrated.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

IMPEACHMENT.

The arguments in the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson were continued on May 7 and 8. The peroration of Mr. Bingham's speech was greeted by applause from the galleries, and Chief Justice Chase ordered them to be cleared. The final vote, which was to have been taken on May 11, was postponed on account of Senator Howard's illness until the 16th inst.

CONGRESS.

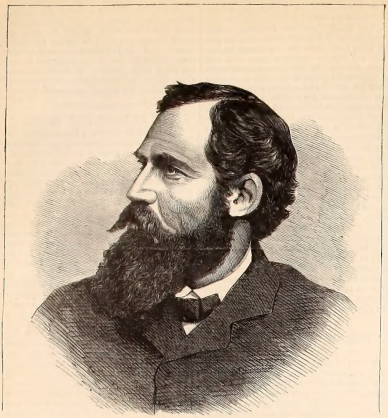
The House on May 7 voted to request the President to communicate to the House all correspondence respecting American fishing interests.

On May 8 the Representatives of Arkansas to the Union was passed by the House on May 8 by a vote of 110 to 37.

Bills admitting North and South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama were adopted in the House on May 11.

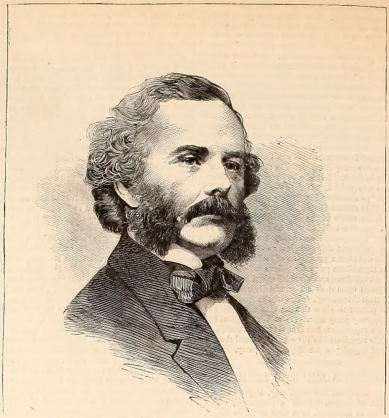
NEWS ITEMS.

The New York delegates to the Republican Convention have decided to vote for Governor Fenton for President.



A cyclone, half a mile in width, passed over portions of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin on the 8th inst. Cairo, Chicago, and Milwaukee suffered most severely.

General Batia is elected President of Mexico.



An eruption of the volcano of Mauna Loa, Hawaii, Sandwich Islands, began on the 27th of January last, and during the first civil week, a stream of lava which followed two thousand channels of earthquakes was discharged. Earthquakes were followed by heavy "rollers" waves which flooded the coast. The crater of Mauna Loa is 600 feet above the sea. It ran down the slope of the mountain in a broad stream of lava, and reached "The slope and part of the summit of the mountain are built of rich high wines filled with the most beautiful crystals, and thrown over the tops of trees to a distance of over 1000 feet. The lava flows were so thick that they swept over the tops of trees to a height of from 60 to 100 feet, and to the height of from 60 to 100 feet. The column of smoke which was thrown out of the crater was of immense size, the altitude of over seven miles), obscured every thing for a space of 15 miles. During the most terrible convulsions, Pele, the goddess creatures on the island could stand on the mountain tops. Cannes, France, on May 8.

Admiral Farragut has sent the steamer Swatara, under command of Commander James C. Pebiger, into the Arkansas, to the Island of Corea to inquire into the murder of the crew of the seaman of the American bark General Sherman. Some of them are said to be alive and held in slavery by the natives.

An anti-Popery riot occurred in Ashton-Under-Lyne, England, during which houses were sacked, people outraged, and several shot.

J. Q. A. WARD, N.A.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY.]

R. W. HUBBARD, N.A.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY.]

AMERICAN ARTISTS.

WE resume in this Number of the Weekly the series of sketches and portraits of American artists which was begun in a former volume.

J. Q. A. WARD, the sculptor, whose portrait will be found on this page, is a native of Urbana, Champaign County, Ohio, and is now about thirty-six years of age. Until his eighteenth year he was a farmer's boy; but in 1850, while on a visit to the studio of H. K. BROWN, he was inspired with the desire to become a sculptor. He had already given some few indications of a talent for art, and he found no difficulty in obtaining the entry of Mr. BROWN'S studio. Here he remained six years, engaged in drawing, modeling in clay, wax, and plaster, working in marble and bronze, and sometimes working on Mr. BROWN'S models. For the last ten years he has been constantly engaged in various kinds of art work. He spent two years in Washington, modeling busts of prominent men; and was for a long while very profitably employed in designing for the Ames Arms Company of Massachusetts.

His chief works have been his statuette "The Freedman," "The Indian Hunter," the Commodore Perry statue, and "The Good Samaritan." He obtained the commission for the statue of SHAKSPEARE for the Central Park monument, and is soon to begin work on it. An art critic, speaking of Mr. WARD'S various achievements, says: "Although Mr. WARD has never practiced modeling in an academy or foreign and famed studio, he has labored with rare assiduity to master the principles of his art; he understands proportion and anatomical life. His little models of Indian heads in red wax, taken from life in Dakota Territory, are among the most authentic aboriginal physiognomical types extant in plastic art, so carefully in detail are they executed."

R. W. HUBBARD is a native of Middletown, Connecticut. He is recognized as one of the most careful and successful landscape artists of the country.

TUCKERMAN, in his "Book of the Artists," says: "The repose of HUBBARD'S landscapes and those of kindred spirit, appeal mainly to the contemplative and patient, we had almost said pensive, observer. Their tone is usually subdued, their beauty, poetic; occasionally the effects are exquisite: they may lack boldness and vigor, but rarely meaning and grace, and as a class, they have a distinct and auspicious place and influence, and are related to the gentler, more thoughtful, and dreamy impressions we derive from nature. HUBBARD works slowly; he loves to elaborate his subject by degrees, and sometimes lessens the first success by repeated emendations or modifications. It has been said of him that he paints few pictures, but never paints badly."

MINNEHAHA FALLS.

MINNEHAHA Falls, so famous in the song of LONGFELLOW, are located in Minnesota, where they are known to the practical settlers by the less euphonious name of "Brown's Falls." It has been said that the Indian name signifies "Laughing Water;" but this has been as positively denied, and so the beautiful falls have been robbed of name and significance. They are the outlet of several small lakes near FORT SNELLING, and are about fifty feet in height.

FALLS OF SNOQUALMIE RIVER.

THE Snoqualmie River is a small stream in King County, Washington Territory, and empties into Puget Sound. The falls, which we illustrate, are near its source in the Cascade Mountains, and are 270 feet in height. The bank is fifty feet above the falls, and the chasm into which we look down is therefore 220 feet in depth. This chasm is semicircular in shape. There is a constant cloud of mist about the falls, and magnificent rainbows are to be seen on every bright day.

MINNEHAHA FALLS, MINNESOTA.

FALLS OF SNOQUALMIE RIVER, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.—[PHOT. BY A. P. CASE.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.
RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER III.

THE prominent personage among the guests at the dinner-party I found to be Mr. Murthwaite.

On his appearance in England, some months since, society had been greatly interested in the traveler, as a man who had passed through many dangerous adventures, and who had escaped to tell the tale. He had now announced his intention of returning to the scene of his exploits, and of penetrating into regions left still unexplored. This magnificent indifference to presuming on his luck, and to placing his safety in peril for the second time, revived the flagging interest of the worshipers in the hero. The law of chances was clearly against his escaping on this occasion. It is not every day that we can meet an eminent person at dinner, and feel that there is a reasonable prospect of the news of his murder being the news that we hear of him next.

When the gentlemen were left by themselves in the dining-room, I found myself sitting next to Mr. Murthwaite. The guests present being all English, it is needless to say that, as usual, the wholesome check exercised by the presence of the ladies was removed, the conversation turned on politics as a necessary result.

In respect to this all-absorbing national topic, I happen to be one of the most un-English Englishmen living. As a general rule, political talk appears to me to be of all talk the most dreary and the most profitless. Glancing at Mr. Murthwaite, when the bottles had made their first round of the table, I found that he was apparently of my way of thinking. He was doing it very deservedly—with all possible consideration for the feelings of the host—but it is not the less certain that he was composing himself for a nap. It struck me as an experiment worth attempting, to try whether a judicious allusion to the subject of the Moonstone would keep him awake, and, if it did, to see if the thought of the last new complication in the Indian conspiracy, as revealed in the prosaic precincts of my office, would interest him.

"If I am not mistaken, Mr. Murthwaite," I began, "you were acquainted with the late Lady Verinder, and you took some interest in the strange succession of events which ended in the loss of the Moonstone?"

The eminent traveler did me the honor of waking up in an instant, and asking me who I was.

I informed him of my professional connection with the Herncastle family, not forgetting the curious position which I had occupied toward the Colonel and his Diamond in the by-gone time.

Mr. Murthwaite shifted round in his chair, so as to put the rest of the company behind him (Conservatives and Liberals alike), and concentrated his whole attention on plain Mr. Bruff, of Gray's Inn Square.

"Have you heard any thing lately of the Indians?" he asked.

"I have every reason to believe," I answered, "that one of them had an interview with me, in my office, yesterday."

Mr. Murthwaite was not an easy man to astonish; but that last answer of mine completely staggered him. I described what had happened to Mr. Luker, and what had happened to myself, exactly as I have described it here. "It is clear that the Indian's parting inquiry had an object," I added. "Why should he be so anxious to know the time as which a borrower of money is usually privileged to pay the money back?"

"Is it possible that you don't see his motive, Mr. Bruff?"

"I am ashamed of my stupidity, Mr. Murthwaite—but I certainly don't see it."

The great traveler became quite interested in sounding the immense vacuity of my dulness to its lowest depths.

"Let me ask you one question," he said. "In what position does the conspiracy to seize the Moonstone now stand?"

"I can't say," I answered. "The Indian plot is a mystery to me."

"The Indian plot, Mr. Bruff, can only be a mystery to you, because you have never seriously examined it. Shall we run it over together, from the time when you drew Colonel Herncastle's Will, to the time when the Indian called at your office? In your position, it may be of very serious importance to the interests of Miss Verinder that you should be able to take a clear view of this matter in case of need. Tell me, bearing that in mind, whether you will penetrate the Indian's motive for yourself? or whether you wish me to save you the trouble of making my inquiry into it?"

It is needless to say that I thoroughly appreciated the practical purpose which I now saw that he had in view, and that the first of the two alternatives was the alternative I chose.

"Very good," said Mr. Murthwaite. "We will take the question of the ages of the three Indians first. I can hardly persuade you to look much about the same age—and you can decide for yourself, whether the man whom you saw to-day, or not, in the prime of life. Not forty, you think? My idea too. We will say not forty. Now look back at the time when Colonel Herncastle came to England, and when you were concerned in the plan he adopted to preserve his life. I don't want you to count the years. I will only say, it is clear that those present Indians, at their age, must be the successors of three other Indians (high caste Brahmins all of them, Mr. Bruff, when they left their native country!) who followed the Colonel to these shores. Very well. These present men of ours have succeeded to the work which were here before them. If they had only done that, the matter would not have been worth inquiring into. But they have done more. They have succeeded to the organization which their predecessors established in this country. Don't start! The organization is a very trumpery affair, according to our ideas, I have no doubt. I should reckon it up as including the command of money; the services, when needed, of that shady sort of Englishman, who lives in the byways of foreign life in London; and, lastly, the secret sympathy of such few men of their own country and (formerly, at least) of their own religion, as happen to be employed in ministering to some of the multitudinous wants of this great city. Nothing very formidable, as you see! But worth notice at starting, because we may find occasion to refer to the modest little Indian organization as we go on. Having now cleared the ground, I am going to ask you a question; and I expect your experience to answer it. What was the event which gave the Indians their first chance of seizing the Diamond?"

I understood the allusion to my experience.

"The first chance they got," I replied, "was clearly offered to them by Colonel Herncastle's death. They would be aware of his death, I suppose, as a matter of course?"

"As a matter of course. And his death, as you say, gave them their first chance. Up to that time the Moonstone was safe in the strong room of the bank. You drew the Colonel's Will leaving his jewel to his niece; and the Will was proved in the usual way. As a lawyer, you can be at no loss to know what course the Indians would take (under English advice) after that."

"They would provide themselves with a copy of the Will from Doctors' Commons," I said.

"Exactly. One or other of those shady Englishmen to whom I have alluded, would get them the copy you have described. That copy would inform them that the Moonstone was bequeathed to the daughter of Lady Verinder, and that Mr. Blake the elder, or some person appointed by him, would place it in her hands. You will agree with me that the necessary information about persons in the position of Lady Verinder and Mr. Blake would be easily obtained by information to obtain. The one difficulty for the Indians would be to decide, whether they should make their attempt on the Diamond when it was in course of removal from the keeping of the bank, or whether they should wait until it was taken down to Yorkshire to Lady Verinder's house. The second way would be manifestly the safest way—and there you have the explanation of the appearance of the Indians at Frizinghall, disguised as jugglers, and waiting their time. In London, it is needless to say, they had their organization at their disposal to keep them informed of events. Two men would do it. One to follow any body who went from Mr. Blake's house to the bank. And one to treat the lower men-servants with beer, and to hear the news of the house. These commonplace precautions would readily inform them that Mr. Franklin Blake had been to the bank, and that Mr. Franklin Blake was the only person in the house who was going to visit Lady Verinder. What actually followed upon that discovery, you remember, no doubt, quite as correctly as I do."

I remembered that Franklin Blake had detected one of the spies, in the street—that he had, in consequence, advanced the time of his arrival in Yorkshire by some hours—and that (thanks to old Betteredge's excellent advice) he had lodged the Diamond in the bank at Frizinghall before the Indians were so much as prepared to see him in the neighborhood. All perfectly clear so far. But the Indians being ignorant of the precaution thus taken, how was it that they had made no attempt on Lady Verinder's house (in which they must have supposed the Diamond to be) through the whole of the interval that elapsed before Rachel's birthday?

In putting this difficulty to Mr. Murthwaite, I thought it right to add that I had heard of the little boy, and the drug of ink, and the rest of it, and that my explanation was based on the theory of clairvoyance was an explanation which would carry no conviction whatever with it to my mind.

"Nor to mine either," said Mr. Murthwaite. "The clairvoyance in this case is simply a development of the romantic side of the Indian character. It would be a refreshment and an encouragement to those men—quite inconceivable, I grant you, to the English mind—to surround their wearisome and perilous errand in this country with a certain halo of the marvelous and the supernatural. Your boy is unquestionably a sensitive subject to the mesmeric influence—and, under that influence, he has no doubt reflected what was already in the mind of the person mesmerizing him. I have tested the theory of clairvoyance—and I have never found the manifestations get beyond that point. The Indians don't investigate the matter in this way; the Indians look upon their boy as a Seer of things invisible to their eyes—and, I repeat, in that marvel, they find the source of a new interest in the purpose that unites them. I only notice this as offering a curious view of human character, which must be quite new to you. We have nothing whatever to do with clairvoyance, or with mesmerism, or with any thing else that is hard of belief to a practical man, in the inquiry that we are now pursuing. My object in following the Indian plot, step by step, is to trace results back, by rational means, to natural causes. Have I succeeded to your satisfaction, so far?"

"Not a doubt of it, Mr. Murthwaite! I am waiting, however, with some anxiety, to hear the rational explanation of the difficulty which I have just had the honor of submitting to you."

Mr. Murthwaite smiled. "It's the easiest difficulty to deal with of all," he said. "I permit me to begin by admitting your statement of the case as a perfectly correct one. The Indians were undoubtedly not aware of what Mr. Franklin Blake had done with the Diamond—for we find them making their first mistake, on the first night of Mr. Blake's arrival at his aunt's house."

"Their first mistake?" I repeated.

"THE OLD MAN QUIETED THEM BY A WORD, AND THEN SHADED HIS FAILING EYES WITH HIS HAND," ETC.

"Certainly! The mistake of allowing themselves to be surprised, lurking about the terrace at night, by Gabriel Betteredge. However, they had the merit of seeing for themselves that they had taken a false step—for, as you say, again, with plenty of time at their disposal, they never came near the house for week afterward."

"Why, Mr. Murthwaite? That's what I want to know! Why?"

"Because the Indian, Mr. Bruff, ever runs an unnecessary risk. The clause you drew in Colonel Herncastle's Will, informed them (didn't it?) that the Moonstone was to pass absolutely into Miss Verinder's possession on her birthday. Very well. Tell me which was the safest course for a man in their position? To make their attempt on the Diamond while it was under the control of Mr. Franklin Blake, who had shown already that he could suspect and outwit them? Or to wait till the Diamond was at the disposal of a young girl, who would innocently delight in wearing the magnificent jewel at every possible opportunity? Perhaps you want a proof that my theory is correct? Take the evidence of the Indians themselves as the proof. They appeared at the house, after waiting all those weeks, on Miss Verinder's birthday; and they were rewarded for the patient accuracy of their calculations by seeing the Moonstone in the bosom of her dress! When I heard the story of the Colonel and the Diamond, later in the evening, I felt so sure about the risk Mr. Franklin Blake had run (they would have certainly attempted it, if he had not happened to ride back to Lady Verinder's in the company of other people); and I was so strongly confirmed in the view which I still in store for Miss Verinder, that I recommended following the Colonel's plan, and destroying the interest of the gem by having it cut into separate stones. How its extraordinary disappearance, that night, made my advice useless, and utterly defeated the Hindoo plot—and how all further action on the part of the Indians was paralyzed the next day by their confinement in prison as rogues and vagabonds—you know as well as I do. The first act in the conspiracy closes there. Before we go on to the second, may I ask whether I have met your difficulty, with an explanation which is satisfactory to the mind of a practical man?"

It was impossible to deny that he had met my difficulty fairly; thanks to his superior knowledge of the Indian character—and thanks to his not having hundreds of other Wills to think of since Colonel Herncastle's time!

"So far, so good," resumed Mr. Murthwaite. "The first chance the Indians had of seizing the Diamond was a chance lost, on the day when they were committed to the prison at Frizinghall. When did the second chance offer itself? The second chance offered itself—as I am in a position to prove—while they were still in confinement."

He took out his pocket-book, and opened it at a particular leaf, before he went on.

"I was staying," he resumed, "with some friends at Frizinghall, at the time. A day or two before the Indians were set free (on a Monday, I think), the governor of the prison came to me with a letter. It had been left for the Indians by one Mrs. Macnaughten, of whom they had hired the lodging in which they lived; and it had been delivered at Mrs. Macnaughten's door, in ordinary course of post, on the previous morning. The prison authorities had noticed that the post-mark was 'Lambeth,' and that the address on the outside, though expressed in correct English, was, in form, oddly at variance with the customary method of directing a letter. On opening it, they had found the contents to be written in a foreign language, which they rightly guessed at as Hindustani. Their object in coming to me was, of course, to have the letter translated to them. I took a copy in my pocket-book of the original, and of my translation—and there they are at your service."

He handed me the open pocket-book. The address on the letter was the first thing copied. It was all written in one paragraph, without any attempt at punctuation, thus: "To the three Indian men living with the lady called Macnee at Frizinghall in Yorkshire." The Hindoo characters followed; and the English translation appeared at the end, expressed in these mysterious words:

"In the name of the Regent of the Night, whose seat is on the Antelope, whose eyes embrace the four corners of the earth. ✡

"Brothers, turn your faces to the south, and come to me in the street of many noises, which leads down to the muddy river.

"The reason is this.

"I have seen—and you see it."

There the letter ended, without either date or signature. I handed it back to Mr. Murthwaite, and owned that this curious specimen of Hindoo correspondence rather puzzled me.

"I can explain the first sentence to you," he said; "and the conduct of the Indians themselves will explain the rest. The god of the moon is represented, in the Hindoo mythology, as a four-armed deity, seated on an antelope; and one of his titles is the regent of the night. Here, then, to begin with, is something which looks suspiciously like an indirect reference to the Moonstone. Now, let us see what the Indians did, after the prison authorities had allowed them to receive their letter. On the very day when they were set free they went at once to the river-side, and took their places in the first train that started for London. We all thought it a pity at Frizinghall that their proceedings were so privately watched. But, after Lady Verinder had dismissed the police-officer, and had stopped all further inquiry into the loss of the Diamond, no one else could presume to stir in the matter. The Indians were free to go to London if they pleased—and they went. What was the next news we heard of them, Mr. Bruff?"

"They were annoying Mr. Luker," I answered, "by loitering about his house in Lombard-street."

"Did you read the report of Mr. Luker's application to the magistrate?"

"Yes."

"In the course of his statement he referred, if you remember, to a foreign workman in his employment, whom he had just discharged on suspicion of attempted theft, and whom he also distrusted as possibly acting in collusion with the Indians who had annoyed him. The reference is pretty plain, Mr. Bruff, as to who wrote that letter which puzzled you just now, and as to which of the Three Oriental treasures the workman had attempted to steal."

The inference (as I hastened to acknowledge) was too plain to require pointing out. I had never doubted that the Moonstone had found its way into Mr. Luker's hands, at the time to which Mr. Murthwaite alluded. My only question had been, How had the Indians discovered the circumstance? This question (the most difficult to deal with of all, as I had thought) had now received its answer, like the rest. Lawyer as I was, I began to think that I might trust Mr. Murthwaite to lead me blindfold through the last windings of the labyrinth, along which he had guided me so far. I paid him the compliment of telling him this, and found my little concession very graciously received.

"You shall give me a piece of information in your turn before we go on," he said. "Somebody must have taken the Moonstone from Yorkshire to London—and somebody must have raised money on it, or it would never have been in Mr. Luker's possession. Has there been any discovery made of who that person was?"

"None that I know of."

"There was a story (was there not?) about Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite. I am told he is an eminent philanthropist—which is decidedly against him, to begin with."

I hastily agreed in this with Mr. Murthwaite. At the same time I felt bound to inform him (without, however, any wish to say anything hurtful to Lady Verinder's name) that Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite had been cleared of all suspicion, on evidence which I could answer for as entirely beyond dispute.

"Very well," said Mr. Murthwaite, quietly. "Let us leave it now to clear itself in time, or, In the mean while, Mr. Bruff, we must get back again to the Indians, on your account. Their journey to London simply ended in their becoming the victims of another defeat. The loss of their second chance of seizing the Diamond is made irretrievable, as I think, to the patience and foresight of Mr. Luker—who doesn't stand at the top of the prosperous and ancient profession of usury for nothing. By the prompt dismissal of the man in his employment, he deprived the Indians of the assistance which their confederate would have given them in getting into the house. By the prompt transport of the Moonstone to his banker's, he took the conspirators by surprise before they were prepared with a new plan for robbing him. How the Indians, in this latter case, suspected what he had done, and how they contrived to possess themselves of his banker's receipt, are events too recent to need dwelling on. I shall only remark to say that they knew the Moonstone to be once more out of their reach; deposited (under the general description of 'a valuable article') in a banker's strong-room. Now, Mr. Bruff, what is their third chance of seizing the Diamond? and when will it come?"

As the question passed his lips, I penetrated the motive of the Indian's visit to my office at last!

"I see it!" I exclaimed. "The Indians take it for granted, as we do, that the Moonstone has been pledged; and they want to be certainly informed of the earliest period at which the pledge can be redeemed—because that will be the earliest period at which the Diamond can be removed from the safe-keeping of the bank!"

"I told you you would find it out for yourself, Mr. Bruff, if I only gave you a fair chance. In a year from the time when the Moonstone was pledged, the Indians will be on the watch for their third chance. Mr. Luker's own lips have told them how long they will have to wait, and your respectable authority has satisfied them that Mr. Luker has spoken the truth. When do we suppose, at a rough guess, that the Diamond will find its way into Lady Verinder's hands?"

"Toward the end of last June," I answered, "as well as I can reckon it."

"And we are now in the year forty-eight. Very good. If the unknown person who has pledged the Moonstone can redeem it in a year, the jewel will be in that person's possession again at the end of June, forty-nine. I shall be thousands of miles away from England and English news at that time. But I may possibly have a while to take a note of it, and to arrange to be in London at the time."

"What is there remaining serious will happen?" I said.

"I think I shall be safer," he answered, "among the fiercest fanatics of Central Asia than I should be if I crossed the door of the bank with the Moonstone in my pocket. The Indians have been watching their opportunities, Mr. Bruff. It's my firm belief that they won't be defeated a third time."

These were the last words he said on the subject. The coffee came in; the guests rose, and gradually thereafter separated in groups—and I joined the ladies of the dinner-party up stairs.

I made a note of the date, and it may not be amiss if I close my narrative by repeating that note here:

June, forty-nine. Expect news of the Indians, toward the end of the month.

And that done, I hand the pen, which I have now no further claim to use, to the writer who follows me next.

THIRD NARRATIVE.
Contributed by Franklin Blake.

CHAPTER I.

IN the spring of the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine I was wandering in the East, and had there already altered the traveling plans which I had laid out some months before, and which I had communicated to my lawyer and my bankers in England.

This change made it necessary for me to send one of my servants to obtain my letters and remittances from the Consul in a certain city, which was no longer included as one of my resting-places in my new traveling scheme. The man was to join me in Egypt at a certain distance and time. An accident, for which he was not responsible, delayed him on his errand. For a week I waited for him, and then pressed on the borders of a desert. At the end of that time the missing man made his appearance, with the money and the letters. He explained the cause of delay.

"I am afraid I bring you bad news, Sir," he said, and pointed to one of the letters, which had a mourning border. It was from my solicitor, on which was in the handwriting of Mr. Bruff.

I knew nothing, in case of this kind, so unendurable as suspense. I broke the seal of the mourning border was the letter that I opened first.

It informed me that my father was dead, and that I was heir to his great fortune. The wealth which had thus fallen into my hands brought its responsibilities with it. My self-will was not averse to me to lose no time in returning to England.

By daybreak the next morning I was on my way back to my own country.

The picture presented of me by my old friend Betteredge, at the time of my departure from England, is (as I think) a little overdrawn. He has, in his own quaint way, described me precisely one of his young mistress's many satirical references to my foreign education; and his perpetual assertion that my manners, my habits, French, German, and Italian sides to my character, which my lively cousin only professed to discover in jest, and which never had any real existence, except in our good Betteredge's own brain. But barring the drawback, I am bound to own that he has stated my case fairly enough in representing me as wounded to the heart by Rachel's treatment, and as leaving England in the first keenness of my resentment at her inherent disappointment of my life.

I went abroad, resolved—if change and absence could help me—to forget her. It is, I am persuaded, no true view of human nature which denies that a man may recover from the pain under these circumstances: they force his attention away from the exclusive contemplation of his own personal sufferings; they bring a feeling of remembrance lost its worst bitterness, little by little, as time, distance, and novelty interposed themselves more and more effectually between Rachel and me.

On the other hand, it is no less certain that, with the act of leaving England, the only effort which had gained its ground so steadily, began now, just as steadily, to drop back. The nearer I drew to the country which Rachel inhabited, and to the prospect of seeing her again, the more irresistibly her influence began to recover its hold on me. On leaving England, she was the last person in the world whose name I would have suffered to pass my lips. On returning to England, she was the first person I inquired after when Mr. Bruff and I met again.

I was informed, of course, of all that had happened in my absence: in other words, of all that has been related here in continuation of Betteredge's narrative—one circumstance only being excepted. Mr. Bruff did not, at that time, feel himself at liberty to inform me of the motives which had privately influenced Rachel and Godfrey Ablewhite, in recalling the marriage promise, on either side. I troubled him with no embarrassing questions on this delicate subject. It was relief enough to me, after the jealous doubt I underwent caused by hearing that she had ever contemplated being Godfrey's wife, to know that reflection had conquered her of acting upon a feeling that she had effected her own release from her marriage engagement.

Having heard the story of the past, my next inquiries (still inquiries after Rachel!) advanced naturally to the present time. Under whose care had she been placed after leaving Mr. Bruff's house? and where was she living now?

She was living under the care of a widowed sister of the late Sir John Verinder—now Mrs. Merrider—whom her mother's executors had requested to act as guardian, and who had accepted the trust. They were reported to me, as getting on together admirably well, and as being now established, for the season, in Mrs. Merrider's house in Portland Place.

Half an hour after receiving this information I was on my way to Portland Place—without having had his courage to own it to Mr. Bruff.

The man who answered the door was not sure whether Miss Verinder was at home or not. I sent him up stairs with my card, as the speediest way of setting the question at rest. The man came down again with an impenetrable face, and announced me into Miss Verinder was out. I might have suspected other people of purposely denying themselves to me. But it was impossible to suspect Rachel. I left word that I would call again at six o'clock that evening.

At six o'clock I returned, for the second time, that Miss Verinder was not at home. And any message been left for me? No message had been left for me. Had Miss Verinder not received my card? The servant begged my pardon—Miss Verinder had received it.

The door was closed in my face.

On my side I declined to be treated in this way without resenting the attempt, at least, to discover a reason for it. I sent up my name to Mrs. Merrider, and requested her to favor me with a personal interview, at any hour which it might be most convenient to her to name.

Mrs. Merrider made no difficulty about receiving me. I was shown into a very comfortable little sitting-room, and found myself in the presence of a comfortable little elderly lady. She was good-nature itself, great regret and much surprise, entirely on my account. She was at the same time, however, not in a position to offer me any explanation. She knew Rachel on a matter which appeared to relate to a question of private feeling alone. This was said over and over again, in a polite pretence that nothing could tire; and this was all I gained by applying to Mrs. Merrider.

My last chance was to write to Rachel. My servant took a letter to her the next day, with strict instructions to wait for an answer.

The answer came back, literally in one sentence.

"Miss Verinder begs to decline entering into any correspondence with Mr. Franklin Blake."

Fond as I was of her, I felt indignantly the insult offered to me in that reply. Mr. Bruff came in to speak on the business before the recovered possession of myself. I dismissed the business on the spot, and laid the whole case before him. He proved to be as incapable of enlightening me as Mrs. Merrider herself. I asked him if any slander had been spoken of me in Rachel's hearing? He said he was not aware of any slander of which I was the object. Had she referred to me in any way while she was staying under Mr. Bruff's roof? Never. Had she not so much as asked, during all my long absence, what had become of me? No such question had ever passed her lips.

I took out of my pocket-book the letter which poor Lady Verinder had written to me from Frizinghall, on the day when I left her house in Yorkshire. And I pointed Mr. Bruff's attention to those two sentences in it:

"The valuable assistance which you rendered to the inquiry after the lost jewel is still an unparalleled topic of conversation in the present circle of Rachel's mind. Moving blindfold in this matter, you have added to the many services which she has rendered me by innocently involving her secret with discovery through your exertions."

"It is possible," I asked, "that the feeling toward me which is there described is still as bitter as ever against me now?"

Mr. Bruff looked exceedingly distressed.

"If you insist on an answer," he said, "I own I can place no other interpretation on her conduct than that."

I rang the bell, and directed my servant to pack my portmanteau, and to send out for a railway guide. Mr. Bruff asked, in astonishment, what I was going to do.

"I am going to Yorkshire," I answered, "by the next train."

"May I ask for what purpose?"

"For the purpose of assistance I innocently rendered to the inquiry after the Diamond was an unparalleled offense in Rachel's mind, nearly a year since. I propose to atone an unpardoned offense still. I won't accept that position! I am determined to find out the secret of her silence toward her mother, and her enmity toward me. If time, pains, and money can do it, I will lay my hand on the thief who took the Moonstone!"

The worthy old gentleman attempted to remonstrate—to induce me to listen to reason—to do his duty toward me, in short. I was deaf to every thing but the bold quip. No earthly consideration would, at that moment, have shaken the resolution that was in me.

"I shall take up the inquiry again," I went on, "at the point where I dropped it: and I shall follow it onward, step by step, till I come to the present time. There are missing links in the evidence, as I left it, which Gabriel Betteredge and I would go and seek him myself.

I walked round by the familiar paths and passages, and looked in at the open gate of the yard.

There he was—the dear old friend of the happy days that were never to come again—these he was in the left corner, on the grass-plot before the chair, with his pipe in his mouth, and his Robinson Crusoe on his lap, and his two friends, the dogs, kissing on either side of him. The only position in which I stood my shadow was projected in front of me by the last slanting rays of the sun. Either the dogs saw it, or their keen scent informed them of my approach. They started up with a growl. Starting in his turn, the old man crushed them by a word, and looked round his failing eyes with his hand, and looked inquiringly at the figure at the gate.

My own eyes were full of tears. I was obliged to wait for a moment before I could trust myself to speak to him.

A COUNTRY DOCTOR'S LIFE.

JOHN CORDY JEAFFERSON, the author of several pleasant novels, lately found that he had not all the leisure which the profession of a "Book about Lawyers" and "Book about Doctors;" and he has written a novel called "A Noble Woman," evidently for the purpose of correcting that defect by using up his surplus material. Naturally he does not make a very good novel in assuming such a plan, but he has written a very readable book of gossip. One of his characters—and the real character of the book—is a country doctor of the north of England. He has put into this hero's mouth a description of the pleasures of a country doctor's life, which will be appreciated by American physicians and American patients as well as if the scene were laid here, and it forms such pleasant reading that we are tempted to quote it longer than it is. We do:

"There is," says Stapleton, the doctor, "a satisfaction—that stirs my heart and warms it as good wine does—in thinking that my medicines have been doctors here ever since Charles the First's time. When I look at the grave-stones of the old doctors in the church, and at the church yonder, father and son, and father and son, and father and son, ending with my dear father, who was a very man, it is as good as reading a poem to imagine all the scenes of domestic joy and domestic suffering and heroism, in which they played their parts among the men and women whose descendants are the men and women whom I do my best to comfort in sickness and to exercise in dejection. As I drive about the country, along windy uplands, or over purple moors, through rain or sleet or cheery sunshine, it makes me feel the honor of my business to reflect—how, for hundreds of years and more, we Stapletons have been in the thick of the fight whenever and wherever disease has broken out in these parts; how the spirit of the old Border villages, when fever has been raging in their dwellings, have listened for our wheels or the beat of our horses' feet, and hailed us, as we came into their streets with cries of joy, as though we were saviors able to pluck them from the jaws of death! And, as I cross the threshold of a big county house, and am brought face to face with grand people who don't distinguish much between me and a apothecary's lad, I cheerily forget, it puts pluck into my heart and nerve into my hand to think—Ah! my Lord So-and-so, I am the doctor, and know more about the secrets of your house than you know yourself; and if it had not been for my father, or grandfather, or great-grandfather, in the case of Lady —, you'd never have come into the world to own these broad acres and this grand hall, and be a leading man in the county, mayhap. I like to look at my business in this way that I wouldn't have my son have any other man, but feel that it will be quite good enough for me and for him to my doubtless to be able to say that I have done my duty in the same line of labor, as zealously, if not as well, as my forefathers.

"The roughness is the beauty of it. In the summer, when the sun deserts the poor folk, and during harvest, when farm people haven't time to be ill, my life is more holiday, and no fit occupation for an able-bodied man. I declare at such times I grow quite ashamed of myself as I slip about the Border in my saddle, spinning out the little I have to do, and wishing I had to persuade myself that I am not an idler. It's in the rough seasons, when the rough work comes, that I am happiest. And sometimes I have the roughest of rough. People who aren't in the run don't know, can't imagine what the sport is. 'How hard it is, doctor, that you must leave us before you've had so much as a piece of fish,' ladies say to me when I am called away from a dinner-party. But it isn't hard at all. It's far better than six courses and a bottle of '15 to know that the world can't get on without laying it into you hard and sharp. You feel you are of some use in the world when you're pulled in six different directions to six different cases, lying wide apart, with plenty of hail-storm and thunder between them. It puts the soldier into you, and brings the soldier out of you, to be up night after night, knowing that you haven't slept out of your boots for ten days, and feeling sure that ten days more must pass before you'll spend eight hours off in your own feather-bed. It puts the soldier into your tow to turn out of your warm blankets somewhere in the small hours of a winter's morning in answer to a ring at your night-bell, and make your way for eight miles in the teeth of a northeast wind over heath and common, when it is so dark that you can't see your own fingers, and have no choice but to give your horse his head, and put your trust in Providence and the animal's eyesight. Ay, and it puts the soldier into you to come home after a day's march in a dark shop, hungry as a hunter, and licking your lips over anticipations of a hot dinner, and before you've entered your house to be met with a notice that you must start again for a house just two miles beyond the farthest point from which you've just come on your homeward journey: in which case there is nothing for it but to bolt your provender like a beast of prey, write out your prescriptions for your dispensary, change your wet coat for a damp one, and turn out once more, with a fresh horse and your best gig-lamps. That's the kind of time, my lad, when you see the worst side of your own temper, and learn the use of a light sulky, a double-caped over-coat, and nap that can trot sixteen miles an hour.

"Sometimes, no doubt, we get good wages, and taking the year through we manage to fare as well as our neighbors; but on occasions the pay is wretched bad—ay, far worse than you can suppose. Many a day the girls, looking out of their window in the High Street in the morning, say, 'There's the doctor off into the country,' and eight hours after, when they see me return, they think all the more. Here he is back again: he has been out all day. What a fortune he is making! Bless me! perhaps six out of the eight fees have been spent by the bedside of a pauper's wife. Six hours in a workman's stuffy chamber, the sweat rolling down your face as if you were a nigger in a sugar factory, and death all the time grinning at you over the grimy cover of the poor creature's hard mattress, all the paperers—ten shillings and sixpence from the union! And there's worse paid work than that for me—work done for honest struggling mortals: so poor that they can barely keep the wolf from the door, and yet so proud that they'd die from starvation rather than call on the parish. They're the sort of folk for whom I feel, 'There, I'll do my best, and if I've ever seen you for a pence of your narrow means, may I turn a maniac and die eating my own flesh!' But then the man who has his duty by the poor gets something better than money for his wages. The reward comes when he sees the women of the villages out at their cottage doors as the noise of his wheels, to courtesy and stare after him with grateful eyes; when he hears the children raise a cheer at the school-house for the doctor who pulled them out of the bad fever; when the men in white smocks smile at him from their teeth to their eyelids, and they put their horny hands to their forelocks. And I am inclined to think that not the least part of his reward comes when the grateful tenants of the village hamlet and glen to see him lowered to his last resting-place, and to matter simple prayers and rude blessings over his open grave."

RIDDLES.

It seldom time the riddle was often allied to apologue and fable; and therefore, if for no other reason, its birth-place was probably the East. It certainly seems to have been known to the Egyptians; for it is not quite right with them. That the Jews were well acquainted with it must be clear to any one familiar with the Bible. Nor do we find the Greeks even one of the unwise, Josephus tells us how great was Solomon both at making and solving riddles, and how he once won a sum of money from Hiram, King of Tyre, in a riddle contest, and afterward lost it in a similar way to one of Hiram's subjects—nay, the question which the wisdom of Solomon put to Solomon, it has been thought, were posers of the riddle kind. But other peoples of the East, besides the Jews, have cultivated the riddle largely—figures in the Koran as well as in the Bible; and even whole books of riddles, we are told, are to be found in the old Persian.

Then, again, we know that among the Greeks and Romans the riddle was very common. Its dead, if Plutarch is to be believed, Homer died of one that he could not solve. Chagrin at his failure killed the poor old bard. Nor during the Dark or Middle Ages do we find that riddles had lost their influence. On the contrary, they were much cultivated, and our forefathers found great amusement in them.

Specimens of what these riddles were may be met with in English, French, and German, but be most easily found in a dainty old book like that which was printed by Wynkin de Worde as early as 1511, and which bore the title of "Demaundes Joyeus." Some of these demands, like the age, were very coarse, and some were very simple. When we get nearer to our own times, the Reformation somewhat put a stop to the merry-making and riddle-making that used to go together, yet the love of riddle kept up pretty well on the Continent as in England. In France a learned Jesuit wrote a treatise on the subject, and about the time of Louis Quatorze the making of riddles grew quite fashionable. Those literary big-wigs, Rousseau and Voltaire, tried their hands at riddle-making. After their time the Mercure de France became a regular vehicle for riddles, and to solve one, it is even said, made the solver free of the city. In Germany Bürger built up the riddle to what it had scarcely been before. Its conception became a poetical one. With him it grew to be a thing of beauty, and invested with charms that only poetry can give. He made it possess an interest and meaning that lay beyond its mere solution. As treated by him, it gives one an idea of what it might have been of old, and of his having gone back to the time of the Sibyls, and learned the art of making riddles from them.

Here is one by Schiller which has force and spirit:

In a house of stone I sleep,
Where I hidden and deep;
But, steel weapon summoned by,
Forth I start, leap, and fly.
Faint, weak, small, at first, a breath
Might overcome me with death.
Whelm me might a rain-drop then:
Yet doth strength from weakness stem.
Joined by my strong sister, lo!
The world's dread conq'ror grow.

In England and in this country we have always shown a love for riddles as great perhaps as that of any other country, and more moreso than in the present day, to judge by the collections made of them, and by what we almost daily see or hear. But most of these are properly conundrums—a mere playing upon words. A taste for this kind of thing may be indulged in till it grows to be a very frivolous one; but it is worthy of note how many English names among the illustrious in every walk of life belong to those who, in some form or other, have tried their hand at riddle-making.

To begin with statesmen—Fox tried his command, and was a riddle—of her which was hardly fair from him. It is not bad; but a better one is that which he contrived about a bed:

Formed long ago, yet made to-day,
And most employed when others sleep;
What few require will ne'er be seen,
And none would wish to keep.

Not less good is that by Canning on the word Kaces, which, as the reader will be suggested, but which, it is to be hoped, his domestic life in that case might find a sadly answer to. It is not so well known that he was the author of it here:

A noun there is of plural number,
Foe to peace and tranquil slumber:
Now any other noun take,
By adding a you plural make,
But if you add a one, lo! A cry!
Strange is the metamorphosis:
From a plural now see one rise,
And sweet what bitter was before.

God has been made into something very good, and has rather left the door of charity's door, but he never had any thing to do with it. The supposition, however, that he had—perhaps, even more than its excellence—was laid to the cutting off many a head and tail that folks can make neither head nor tail of. Here is one:

Cut off my head, and I have horns to gore you;
Cut off my tail, and I'm a thing of use;
Cut off both head and tail, I still may bore you,
Though you may turn me over a dozen times in a cry!

What are my head and tail cut off? Effects.
If rightly you answer, my name you'll know:
Following but where his pleasure man connects
With following me, and not kind Nature's laws.

One more:

Cut off my head, you bring a king to life!
Cut off my tail, and lo! no less you see;
Cut off both head and tail, a queen you rife
You find me now, tho' naught you make of me.

What are my parts? Tell me, all ye who dwell
Or Royalty deposed for having spared
Those who with sovereign power have other palms,
If they went further, certainly worse fared!

The riddles of Praed—or rather the charades—are remarkable for their force and spirit, and their singular aptness to the subject. They are the only ones to oppose to those of Schiller, though they are written in a very different vein from his. Schiller's are those of a poetical recluse, and have a Sibylline beauty about them. Praed's are those of a man of the world, but of one who exerted something of the poet too, and the philosopher also, into it. They seem written not so much for the sake of the enigma as for that they may be his own poetic fancy. They are none of them very hard to guess; and yet there is a certain originality about every whole. Not a little noise in the world (though not by any means his best), as no one had been able to find the answer to it.

The term Charade is said to be French, and derived from the name of him who invented it. At any rate, the word seems to be the origin of given of what a true charade should be may be found in the dictionary of the French Academy, as "Mi parle d'une chose, et dit le tout sans le nommer." The answer is, "Chien-dent, or dog-grass." But we shall look in vain for any charades that have left behind them the spirit of Schiller, or the elegance, his force and spirit, his play of fancy, his true poetic feeling. As it is very short, and elegant besides, we will quote one of the only two riddles, properly so called, that he wrote:

Is other days, when hope was bright,
Ye spake to me with fairy tongue,
Of endless spring, and cloudless weather,
And heaven that shone for ever and ever!

But now ye tell another tale:
That life is brief, and beauty dies,
That joy is dead, and grief is mighty,
And hearts that dated disunited!

Away! Ye grieve, and grieve in vain,
In one sinful, unfeeling voice:
And yet, like every fiend below,
Are hollow in your joy and woe!

If we leave the politicians for the poets, we find a beautiful riddle which Goethe might have been suggested to the amiable bard by some such sweet lips as prompted Johnny Gilpin:

I am just two and two, I am worn. I am cold.
And the parent of numbers that can not be told:
I am lawful, unlawful—am duty, a fault,
I am often sold dear, good for nothing when bought.
An extraordinary boon, and a matter of course,
And yielded with pleasure when taken by force.

Two or three of Moore's political squibs were in the form of riddles. Here is one that was all the rage in its day:

Why is a pump like Viscount Castlereagh?

Answer:

Because it is a slender thing of wood,
Which up and down its awkward arm doth sway,
And coolly sucks, and spouts, and spouts away
In one weak, washy, everlasting flood!

Among novelists who have been guilty of riddle-making was Mrs. Opie, and one that was very well known in its day; but when we get among scholars and divines the guilt grows more common, and of deeper dye! Is not Porson charged with Latin charades; and, worse still, the late Archbishop Whately with conundrums? The last Master of Trinity has the credit of a riddle to add to the list of great names already quoted, and one of a very original kind. I will not vouch for his being the author, but I know that his friends heard it very often from him, and that he took as much interest in it as if it were his own. It is this:

U O a O, but I O thee,
U O a O, I O U O.
Then let not my O a O go,
But give thy O O I O thee so.

You sigh for a riddle—but I sigh for thee,
O sigh for no cipher, but O sigh for me:
Then let not my sigh for a cipher go,
But give sigh for sigh for I sigh for thee so.

This sighing riddle was much admired by Dr. Whewell, but is it much more ingenious than this old one?

Stand take to tailings,
Now my
I understand
A Frenchman
To overthrow
My undertakings,

or than this:

If the B m t put:
The B m t will make a.

If the grate be empty, put coal on:
When the coal on burns, make a full stop.

To add one more illustrious name to the list of those already mentioned, Sir Francis Denison De Morgan's for the following capital riddle: "How do you know that there is no danger of a famine in the desert? Because of the sand which is (sandwiches) there. And how do you know you will get sandwiches there? Because Ham went into the desert, and his descendants breed (bread) and mustered (mustard.)

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AGRICULTURE is recognized as the basis of our national prosperity, and every contribution to the establishment of agricultural science on the sure foundation of experiment, and not of mere theory, is worthy the special consideration of those who cultivate the soil, and the hearty approval of all wise citizens. So long ago as 1785 a "Society for Promoting Agriculture" was formed in Philadelphia by gentlemen in various walks in life, who met for the purpose of improvement in this branch of industry. General Washington was an honorary member, and Dr. Franklin was a corresponding member. Societies similar to that in Philadelphia were soon formed in several of the States, and they were ably rebodied by practical farmers; but being found positively useful popular sentiment in favor of agriculture began to increase sprung up in every part of the Union. And when, in 1862, a Department of Agriculture was established in Washington, by Act of Congress, many rejoiced that the national government thus recognized that branch of public industry as entitled to its special care.

Topics of great practical utility to farmers throughout the country are investigated by this Department; and its reports, which are now annually printed in the regular series of agricultural reports: new and valuable seeds are distributed to those really desirous of cultivating them, and who will report the results; plants are sent thereby; a propagating garden is in successful operation on the warm and sandy fertility of the small farm; and distributed, and in which seeds of foreign growth are tested prior to their distribution. Much information is made by the entomologist in regard to insects which are destructive to the products of the soil; and noble and valuable discoveries are analyzed by the chemist. Information in regard to numerous other matters pertaining to agriculture is conveyed through this Department; as, for example, of improvements in farm implements, in the cultivation of the grape, in bee-culture, in wool-growing. All these topics are of great general interest, since the most elegant cultivation of the soil and stock would make labor more remunerative, products cheaper, and the wealth of the country greater.

The Patent-office of Washington is located in the basement story of the Patent-office. A very interesting collection of agricultural models is there found, though not advantageously arranged, since it is crowded into two rooms quite inadequate to the purpose. Nevertheless, the best possible use is made of what space there is, and the visitor is amply repaid by the time and trouble bestowed, and by the explanations which are cordially given in regard to them. The Patent-office building is commodious enough when completed there will be ample accommodations for the museum, and room to carry on all useful operations to advantage.

A new explosive is announced called "Dynamid," or "Giant Powder." It is said to fill all ordinary blows and the most violent agitation do not affect it; but when it is fired, either by percussion or by the fulminating mercury, is put into a loose mass, its explosive is immense. A table-spoonful of it exploded on a board covered with a brick, blew the brick into dust and shattered the stone into kernels. In some mines a charge exploded in a hole through one end of a balanced two-inch plank, on which it had been gently placed, threw the plank into the air. Its greatest power is seen when used in the toughest kind of rock.

A sufficient portion of the new Hudson River Railroad Depôt, on the ground formerly occupied by St. John's Park, is now completed, to give some idea of what the enormous structure will be when completed. It is better constructed in its size and nature will be obtained by a personal visit than by mere facts and figures. The front of the building on Hudson Street is to be 429 feet, having the same length rearward on Varick Street; the depth on Laight and Beach streets is 400 feet. Brick, granite, and iron are the materials used in its construction, it being a leading idea to make the depôt fire-proof and substantial. There will be ample accommodations for storage, and every arrangement for the convenience of the express department. The depôt will probably be completed about January next.

Some accounts are reported of persons thinking they had swallowed their false teeth, becoming seriously sick in consequence, but recovering on finding the missing treaties safe in their barrels drawer or waistcoat pocket. A stranger instance was lately given of a man who really swallowed a set of false teeth while in an epileptic fit. But perhaps the strangest "swallowing case" on record is that of a youth about eighteen years old, who was partially insane. He swallowed an old-fashioned clock key, with two right angles in its bars, a common silver tea-spoon, and a pair of steel-bowed spectacles. Having mentioned incidentally to his mother how he had disposed of these articles, a post mortem examination was made, and it was found that they had spoken truly. The Reports of the New York State Medical Society contain the details of this almost incredible case.

The St. Cloud Hotel, corner of Fourteenth Street and Broadway, has lately been opened to the public. It is constructed of brick with white stone dressings, and is in the modern French style of architecture. All the apartments are heated by steam, and contain hot and cold water. The whole work throughout the house is of oiled chestnut, no paint being used in any of the rooms. The staircases are of iron, and an elevator conveys the guests to the upper floors. It is intended to conduct the establishment on the European plan.

A gentleman who for several years had resided in the suburbs of Boston had succeeded in gathering quite a collection of ancient coins. About a year ago he moved into town, and placing his treasure in a box deposited them in a closet. Not long since he had occasion to go to his coin-box and very much to his surprise found it empty. Upon appealing to his wife for an explanation he learned that she (not knowing their value) had been cultivating her taste for music by feeding the instrument upon organ-grinders. Moral—Gentlemen indulging in artistic (or other) specialties should inform their wives of it.

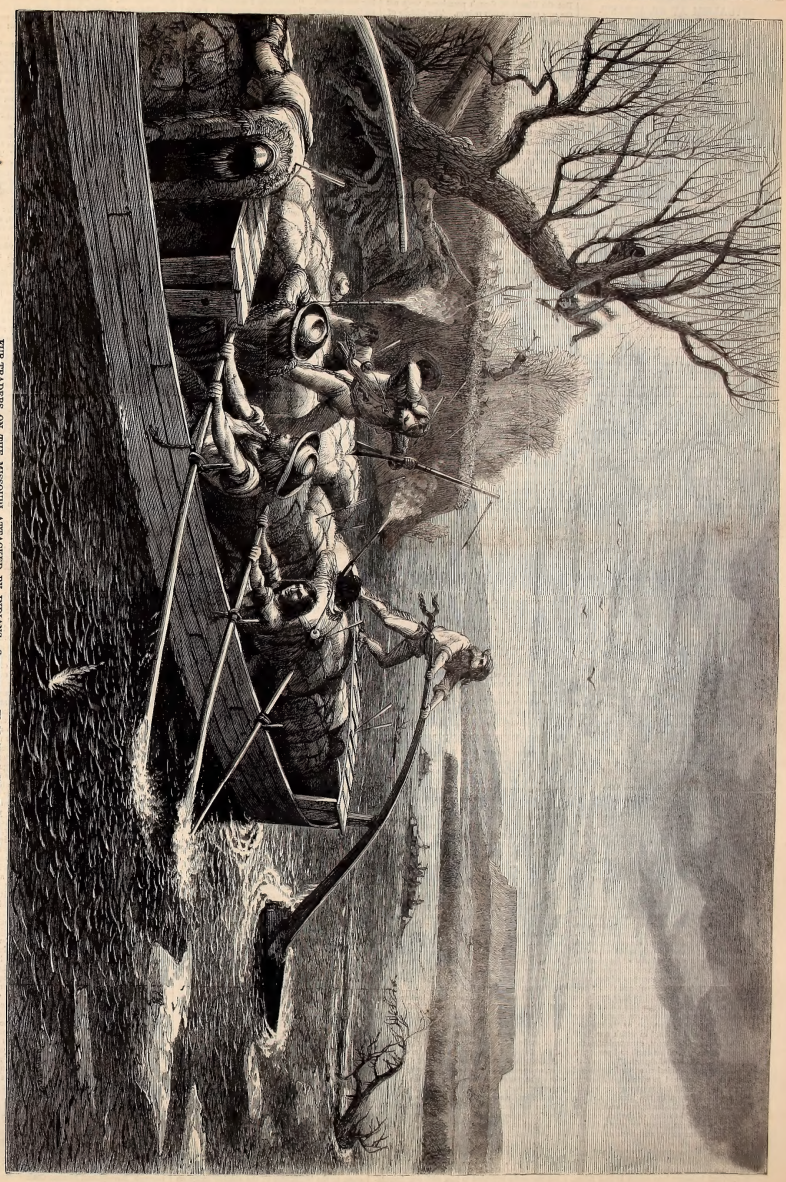
The following curious calculation has been made of the number of changes of which the skeleidoscope is capable. Supposing the instrument to contain twenty pieces of glass, etc., and that you make ten changes in each minute, it will take the inconceivable space of 462,888,899,726 years and 360 days to go through the immense variety of changes it is capable of producing. Communicate this piece to our frail friend (in matters of things) to an eternity. Or, if you take only twelve changes in a minute, and make no change in a minute, it will then take 83,364 days, or 91 years and 49 days, to exhaust the combinations.

The authorities say that the word "flirt" originated in the time of Louis the Fourteenth. The gallants of the court carried in a habit of adjusting the girls' frizzes a "la fleurette," or "my little flower." The noun "flirt" finally grew into a verb, and the term "fleurette une demoiselle" was used in speaking of attentions paid to a beauty. Under the importation of "fleurette" to England it degenerated to "fleuret," and finally to "flirt."

A Democrat in Kansas, much excited, excited by the election, demanded on opponent thus: "Ye needn't talk to me! I'll bet if you try ten years you can't find a nigger, as he's a nigger, in the whole U. S." The point was visible.

A novel architectural invention comes from Paris, called "the house-elevator" or house in the air. The leading idea of the projector is to unbox streets and build houses over the tops of the stories high. In the upper stories will be gained by means of "rifts," each of the new stories will take the place of cellars, and the buildings will be of iron, and, of course, the lower stories at least will be two or three times as strong as is now the case now. In large blocks, occupying rectangles, there will be a terrace about ten feet broad on the top of the building, the projection of one building above another. The upper one is the accustomed to the lower, and will be a favorite walk for shops, offices, etc.; these above the terrace would be inhabited by the people connected with the establishment below. The inhabitants of the aerodomes may communicate with each other by means of bridges thrown from one house to terrace. Each aerodome, it is calculated, will contain one thousand or more people, and by consequence would create a vast atmosphere, and abundance of light; while the streets below will be light and airy. Building over city or town or either is certainly an experiment the success of which must be determined by future events. What quality the terrace is to afforded the occupants of the lower stories is questionable; and it would seem that a dire covering in such a terrace would be inconvenient to life.

Some disbelievers in woman's secretiveness respectfully indicate the following "true anecdote" to the sex as a forcible illustration of their faculty of keeping secrets. Long—a pretty, vivacious young lass, the idol of her father, and the spoiled child of her mother, had a body-servant, a mulatto girl named Rosetta, and all love her for her frankness and open heart. One day she was walking with a friend, who had asked her to marry her friend to tell her something which was not proper to be universally circulated. Her friend answered, "Yes, Mary." Mary replied, "Then I have no such a thing—you never kept any thing twenty-four hours in your life." Mary, who had just married her friend's back in a very convincing manner, and exclaimed, "Miss X——, I can keep a secret!" to which Miss X—— replied, "Rosetta!" to the amusement of the company.



An ingenious Parisian makes an attack on the cotton among composers of giving the name of a singer to a piece. He has published a dictionary of music as applied to love, in which he says: "It may be demonstrated, scientifically, that an intimate connection exists between the gravity of the voice and that intensity of blood which the circumstances of love determines vehemence of sentiment. To imitate nature, the part of the lover should necessarily be assigned to the tenor voice. It is notorious that nature has endowed with more generous traits the creatures who have been condemned to the sacrifice of their sinful and high are generally dangerous and perfidious. Compare the bass and baritone (the tiger and the cat falsetto), and say whether you would rather be shut up in a cage with a duck (baritone) or with a serpent (soprano)."

At a recent auction sale of rare and curious American books, the Indian Bible of John Eliot was sold for the astonishing price of $1150. It was purchased for a private library. This is the second edition of 1663: the first was printing, which was done at Cambridge, Massachusetts, was commenced in 1658, and finished in 1660, in the reign of Charles II. It was the very first Bible in any language ever printed in America.

The latest example of grammatical comparison comes from a student traveler who had just made a tour through the mines of California: "Positive, mine: comparative, miner: superlative, miner!" This is almost equal to the "parings" of a bright-eyed little fellow at a primary school. The word "waif" occurred in the lesson, and he puzzled over it a few moments, when, as if suddenly struck with a new light, he burst out with, "I can parse it. Positive, waif; comparative, waifer; superlative, scaling-wax!"

RITUALISM AT ST. ALBAN'S, NEW YORK—ORDER OF PROCESSION AT THE HIGH CELEBRATION ON EASTER-DAY.—SKETCHED BY W. D. WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 330.]

FUR-TRADERS ON THE MISSOURI ATTACKED BY INDIANS.—SKETCHED BY W. M. CARY.—[SEE PAGE 330.]

RITUALISM AT ST. ALBAN'S.

In this country we are scarcely able to appreciate the real significance of the Ritualistic movement. It arose within the Anglican Church a generation ago under the leadership of the Tractarians, with Dr. Pusey at their head. In England, therefore, it had its main field of operation; and there it has excited the most violent controversy which has ever divided the Established Church. In America, where that Church has no connection with the State, and no predominance in point of numbers over other Christian organizations, the subject awakens comparatively little interest—far less than it really deserves on its own account, and by reason of its decidedly anti-Protestant tendencies.

Still the question is eagerly asked by many, "What really is Ritualism? What are its innovations? What its tendencies?" We have on page 328 given an illustration of the Ritualistic High Celebration at St. Alban's last Easter morn, or rather of the procession inaugurating that service. In connection with this engraving we purpose to say a few words touching the ceremonial, the peculiar doctrines, and the professed objects of the Ritualists.

We have obtained from Father Morrill—the Rector of St. Alban's—the following description of the order of the procession represented in our illustration:

"1. The Crucifer, vested in violet cassock and cotta.
"2. Choristers (boys) vested in blue cassocks and cottas.
"3. Boys bearing the Banner of St. Alban's.
"4. Choristers (men) in surplices.
"5. Banner of the Blessed Sacrament.
"6. Deacon and Sub-Deacon, vested respectively in Dalmatic and Tunicle.
"7. The Celebrant in chasuble, etc.
"When the Thurifer (incense-bearer) reaches the position in the centre of the chancel shown in the drawing, he remains standing, bowing reverently, while the choristers, etc., file on either side and occupy the stalls." Then follows the celebration, which is an impressive ceremonial.

We need not remind our readers that this is not the ordinary custom observed in the celebration of Easter service in the Episcopal Church. It is the revival, more or less perfect, of the ancient Anglo-Catholic custom. "These practices of ours," say the Ritualists, alluding in general to all the changes recently introduced in their mode of worship, "are the really ancient, tried, lawful, reverent usages of the Church of England during a thousand years, and the customs we seek to drive out are modern innovations, only some three hundred years old." But these three hundred years constitute the Protestant era of the Church. The new movement is a deliberate and undisguised attempt to revive the Anglo-Catholic ceremonial, to "un-Protestantize" the Church, to restore that period in which arose the magnificent cathedrals of Europe—those matchless temples of medieval religion—and when it was the firm belief of Christians that it is the revealed will of God that He should be worshiped with ceremonial splendor. It is the same belief which leads the Ritualists to drape their churches in the deepest mourning during Lent, of which sombre drapery they are at Easter divested, its place being taken by the most costly adornments which the enthusiasm of the congregations prompt or their wealth can provide.

One of the most palpable features of this revived ceremonial is its elaborate symbolism. Every portion of it involves a "sacred secret, full of grave intentions, as setting forth a precious truth, or symbolizing a divine attribute." Thus the incense represents the merits of Christ's atonement. The alb—a long white linen robe, girded round the waist—indicates the purity of the priestly character. The altar-lights symbolize the Light of the World. The chasuble (worn as we have seen by the celebrant in the St. Alban's Easter service), a broad garment covering the entire person except the head, represents charity, covering all human infirmities; the dalmatic, white, with purple, signifies by its broad sleeves breadth of liberality; the silk stoles (sold to the Ritualists in sets, white, red, violet, and green) denote the yoke of Christ and the cord that bound Him; while the octangular baptismal font signifies the seven days of the old creation and the new creation of regeneration.

The approach toward Rome is still more evident in the peculiar doctrines of the Ritualists than in their ceremonial, especially those involved in the revived usages of confession, priestly absolution, and vows of celibacy. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which among Protestants is a memorial service, a communion, is among the Ritualists the celebration of a sacrifice. In one of the private prayers at the close of the mass (for even the Romish name is revived), the priest implores that the sacrifice which he has offered "may be acceptable unto God and propitiatory for himself, and all for whom he has offered it." This is in accordance with the papal doctrine "that the sacrifice of the mass benefits more than the receiver, and that it may be offered for quick and dead to have remission of pain and guilt." Compare this with the description of the communion given in one of the Ritualistic manuals of devotion, as "a sacrifice of praise and propitiation," in which our Lord "through his own presence, communicates the virtues of his most precious death and passion to all his faithful, living and departed." The doctrines of Transubstantiation and of Baptismal Regeneration, in regard to which the Anglican Church has tolerated the most varying beliefs, are now insisted upon by the Ritualists. The papal doctrine that the traditional authority of the Church is equal to that of the Scriptures is revived in its full force. Here we have a distinct renunciation of the very corner-stone of Protestantism.

The Ritualistic movement, it must be conceded, originated about thirty years ago, in connection with a revival of the Anglican Church from the spiritual lethargy into which it had fallen. But the Ritualists, though prominent, were not the sole movers in this reform. The Bishop of Oxford has truly remarked that where "the movement itself had been deepest these Ritualistic extravagances had the least appeared." Others carried on this spiritual revival in accordance with the grand argument of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century—they sought to revive Apostolic Christianity; the Ritualists, on the other hand, not only protested against the spiritual torpidity of the times but against Protestantism itself; they sought, and still seek, to revive Medieval Christianity. The Rev. R. H. Froude—father of the historian, and a disciple of Dr. Pusey—distinctly announced his desire "to un-Protestantize the Church."

The most remarkable feature of the Ritualistic movement is the reassertion, already alluded to, of the traditional authority of the Church. It was upon this authority that all the abuses and corruptions and superstitions of the Medieval Church rested; upon it was based also their intolerant persecution of heretics; and it was against this authority that the Reformers protested. The concession of this authority would be a retrogression of Christianity—a leap backward over three centuries of progress—a restoration of the Papal Church and the Papal Priesthood. Such a Church and such a Priesthood are advocated in a recent sermon delivered by the Rev. Morgan Dix, in Trinity Chapel. The Priesthood of the Church, he claimed, is endowed with supernatural powers, as were Moses, Aaron, and Elijah. A priest is a man sent from God not merely to preach the Gospel to other men, and to endeavor to lead them in the way of salvation, but he is endowed with powers which other men do not possess. The Church is not, he said, a mere voluntary association, but a supernatural and divine system, and we have no more right to alter any of its laws, ordinances, or sacraments, than we have to choose another Redeemer.

The argument of the Ritualists may be summed up thus: Protestantism, with its assertion of the right of individual interpretation, and its consequent tolerance of varying beliefs so far as they are not contrary to Evangelical doctrine; with its Church divested of medieval corruptions; with its Christ as the sole mediator between God and man; with its Bible as a self-sufficing rule of faith and practice; with its worship, which contents itself with being a worship "in spirit and in truth"—has proved a failure both as a development of faith and as a means of preserving the Church against infidel opposition. It must therefore be surrendered; and its vulnerable armor must be laid aside for the armor and weapons of the Papal Church, whose claim to infallibility, whose splendid ritual, and whose peculiar doctrines have been found necessary to the true development of Christianity amidst a world of perturbations, and against the attacks of unbelievers.

Well, the antagonism between the claims of two systems of faith, which have for three centuries divided Christendom, will still go on, even if the Ritualists, even if the entire Anglican Church, should go over to Rome. If Protestantism is stronger it will stand the test, and prevail; if weaker, as the Ritualists claim, then surely it ought to be, then surely it will be defeated. Christendom and all the interests of Christendom are committed to the conflict. Evidently there is no compromise; evidently also there must come a time for the absolute surrender of one side or of the other. Will it be of Rome to Christ, or of Christ to Rome?

FUR-TRADERS ON THE MISSOURI.

Our engraving on page 329 represents the Mackinaw boats of a fur company, loaded with bales of buffalo and other skins, attacked by Indians while descending the Missouri River to St. Louis. This is a scene to be frequently witnessed in the spring. The boats leave the upper frontier forts as soon as the ice breaks up, thus obtaining the advantage of the early spring floods. These floods render the Missouri very swift, and the boats are often enabled thereby to make the trip from Fort Benton to St. Louis, a distance of 3700 miles, in two weeks.

THE WORLD'S WAGES.

AN HUNGARIAN FABLE.

In the hot mid-day sunshine a poor countryman was making his way homeward to his native village, wearied and bent under the ponderous burden he was bringing from the neighboring town. He knew well that a scolding awaited him (as usual) from his ill-tempered wife, who had been expecting him with no little impatience, and every step seemed to tire him more and to make his load heavier, as it brought him nearer to her rattling, wrangling tongue. He felt so wholly exhausted that he was glad to stagger to the boundary-stone of an adjacent field, upon which he sat himself down to rest for a short quarter of an hour.

Under the stone, however, in a rut which had been made by a water-course, or by the result of some accident which had caused the displacement of the stone, an enormous snake was hidden, and scarcely was the countryman seated ere the snake put out her head, and, with a loud but agonized hiss, thus spoke: "Welcome, welcome, friendly stranger! Take pity on me, and release me from the weight of this monstrous stone, which every instant threatens to crush me. It is more and more unbearable; and if you will not save me, I must perish."

The countryman doubted whether he ought to assist a reptile of such known and hereditary enmity to man. He felt, however, some pity, though he hesitated to draw nearer to the snake; but the snake appealed to him with ever-increasing earnestness. "I implore, I conjure you, by all that is merciful! Save me! save me! I will reward you with every recompense that man pays to man for his good deeds—but save me!" The countryman could not resist the repeated piteous appeals. He mustered all his strength, turned over the stone, and released the prisoner.

What was his astonishment, what his fright, when the monster, full of fury, moved toward him, spitting poison and menacing destruction. He could scarcely find breath to ask, while pale and trembling he staggered away, "Is this the reward, the promised reward to thy deliverer!" The snake coldly replied, "Such are the world's wages for benefit; and I promised thee nothing more."

The words only increased the countryman's alarm. He saw no way of escape, and no helper was at hand. Finding no hope of deliverance, his heart beating with horror, his cheeks streaming with tears, he thus addressed the terrible reptile: "I am in thy power, at thy mercy. I have neither strength nor courage to resist, and yet I can not understand the meaning of thy discourse. I am a poor simple countryman, ignorant of the ways of the world. I know not whether its wages are such as you propose to pay. Enlighten me on this matter, or at least let some just judge decide between us."

"So be it," answered the snake. "'Tis a reasonable proposal. On that dry heath there is an ancient war-horse, a far nobler beast than I may have appeared to thee. Let us hasten to him; he shall be the judge."

No sooner said than done. The countryman moved tremblingly over the fields, and his venomous companion crept slowly behind him. They reached the burnt and grassless heather, and, behold, a gray horse stood before them—a ragged steed, a mere skeleton—whose nostrils were exploring the barren heath in search of a few scattered blades of grass. The snake broke the silence, and began to question the poor broken-down beast: "What dost thou here on this wild waste, while there is such a supply of rich fodder in the master's stables? What brought thy noble loins to such a wretched skeleton which thy rough hide scarcely covers?" Neighing woefully, the horse replied: "Know you not that these are the common wages of the world, and it is thus that friendly services are rewarded? For thirty weary years I bore a valiant warrior on my back; I obeyed his every wink; I turned at his every touch of my bridle. Seven times I saved him in the battle tempest from fetters and from death. Now, worn out by toil and time, no longer able to serve, he has delivered me over to the knacker, and soon my hide is to be severed from my bones."

"Ha! ha!" said the snake to the countryman. "Dost thou hear? Prepare for death, for that is thy doom." He spoke, coiled himself up, and was about to spring furiously upon the doomed one, but he threw himself down humbly on his knees between the horse and the snake, and thus put forward his petition: "Spare me, spare me but a little while. I have a wife and children at home. Who will provide for them if you destroy me? Oh let us appeal to another judge—the life of man hangs upon the award; and if he confirms the sentence given, I will prepare myself for death."

"Agreed," said the crafty creature. "I grant also this to thee of my great grace." And they crossed the heather over to a thicket in which the snake had seen the form of an animal in the distance; and as they approached they found a very old hunting-dog fastened with a cord to the trunk of a willow-tree, lean and wretched, and utterly unable to protect himself from the swarms of flies that tormented him dreadfully.

"And who brought thee, Squire Harehunt, to this willow trunk—to this forlorn condition? Why, it was but the other day I saw thee joyfully and bravely following the game over the country. What does it all mean?" inquired the snake. The poor dog set up a bitter howl, and thus replied, "Such are the world's wages, such the recompense of friendly deeds. Six years I served my master with diligence and fidelity—served him in house and field—and deserved the name I bore; I was a terror to the hares, known and feared by their whole army; and now I am bound to this willow trunk, condemned to die, and only waiting the arrival of the keeper to dispatch me."

The countryman shuddered body and soul. He saw the snake wreathing her folds in self-gratulation, and preparing to revel in the success of her machinations. All hope of delivery had vanished, and the poor countryman began to prepare himself for death, and to recommend himself to the keeping of God before drinking the bitter cup. But, lo! suddenly a fox sprung forward from the wood where he had been hidden, quickly took his place between the countryman and the snake, and very courteously asked what was the subject of their quarrel. He winked at the countryman, while the snake watched all his movements, and offered the poor man his patronage if he would help him to a good supply from the poultry-yard. "Yes! yes!" said the countryman, upon which the fox said he would institute a proper inquiry into the whole affair.

And to the countryman's great astonishment, the snake gave her consent, and they conducted the wondering fellow back to the very boundary from which he had witnessed the beginning of his strange adventure.

When they reached the spot the fox betook himself to silent and thoughtful musings. He looked at the stone around, above, and below, poked with his nose, brushed with his tail, and began an eloquent harangue: "Beloved, beautiful, and accomplished snake! I can no more doubt or deny your right than I can add another charm to the grace of your body; nay, I am as sensible of the justice of your claims as is this stone to the brightness of the shining scales on your back, but I am somewhat perplexed with the question as to how your stately form could have been confined in this small hole. In order that I should form a righteous judgment the whole matter must be made clear."

"I will answer then at once," said the snake, and suddenly crept into the very hole where she had been before concealed. The fox gave a sharp wink to the countryman, who so suddenly and dextrously turned over the stone upon the snake that it was almost impossible for her to stretch out her head. "And couldst thou indeed breathe?" inquired the fox, with affected wonderment; "couldst thou indeed breathe in this narrow, uncomfortable place?" "Uncomfortable, indeed," said the snake, "very uncomfortable—the stone is so very heavy—let me out, let me out, or I shall be pressed to death." The last words were feebly uttered from the squeezed throat of the snake, but the countryman gayly answered: "No! no! my lady snake! remain where yet thou art!" and he and his cunning deliverer wended their way homeward.

They had not proceeded far when the fox reminded the countryman of his engagement, and the countryman promised that on the very next morning he would have six noble cocks ready for breakfast, to which he invited him, whereupon the fox bade him heartily farewell, and slipped away into a vineyard that was near.

The countryman hurried back to his village as fast as his legs would carry him, but reached it only late in the evening; but before he perceived his cottage he heard in the distance the noisy shoutings of his impatient wife, and he had scarcely crossed the threshold ere she set upon him with all the fury of a wild beast as if she would destroy him. It was in vain he narrated to her the fearful adventures which had delayed his return, it was in vain he lauded the kindness of the benevolent fox which had been his deliverer, she only raved and scolded the more till the stream of her desperation was exhausted, and her poor husband was enabled to insinuate a word.

He told her of the promise he had made to the fox, and said that on its fulfillment her life and his own depended; but she burst out more furiously than ever, and swore that she would rather sacrifice him than surrender a single cock from her poultry-yard; and before the appearance of the morning-star she stood armed with a sharp heavy hatchet behind the wicket-door, and as the unsuspecting guest entered to partake of the proffered hospitality and had just stretched his head over the threshold she struck his neck with a mortal blow.

The countryman hearing the death-cry of the wounded fox hurried out of his chamber hoping to warn and to save him. It was too late. The dying fox was bathed in his own blood, and perished with the exclamation: "The world's reward for well-doing!"

CORNELIUS KILDERBEE'S JOKE.

Cornelius Kilderbee, in his day wine-merchant of Carlton Cross, and leader of the radicals throughout the Border, has been dead and buried more that a quarter of a century; but his name still lives in the memory of men who knew him while he still remained a political power, and on the lips of many other denizens of the three counties to whom his virtues and eccentricities, his failings and powers, are only matters of tradition. Posthumous fame in the case of an inferior celebrity is so short-lived, that the man who is much spoken of five-and-twenty years after his funeral may be fairly credited with having been a person of no common mark while his sands were still running—at least while his strength was in its prime. A few representative men of the first order excepted, what do we remember of the notabilities of George the Third's time—ay, of the notabilities whose names appear in "memoirs," and whose acts are abundantly chronicled in the literature of their contemporaries? Of the able men who won distinction in the coteries, and who, after years of honorable exertion in letters or science, in arms or art, in Parliament or the courts, died somewhere about the day when Queen Victoria made her first cry, not one in ten is known beyond the domestic circle of his descendants. Some forty years since a publisher, producing a work that he no doubt thought would be a permanent landmark in literary history, put forth a dictionary of contemporary authors, and it may be safely affirmed that an ordinary educated Englishman of this present day, turning over the leaves of that record of writers, who nearly all entertained at some time or other an ambition for enduring popularity, will not come upon fifty names that are familiar or in any degree known to him. In this respect ignominy and honor fare much alike, the minor criminals, like the minor benefactors of our species, being equally forgotten. A generation after your interment, my most illustrious reader, what will your countrymen know about your state-craft and speeches in the senate, about the flatteries that blind you to your own littleness, and the applause that makes you deaf to the solemn monitions of fate? Fortunate—supposing posthumous fame a thing to be desired by wise men—will you be if five-and-twenty years after your heir's accession the scene of your ambitious labors and peculiar triumphs shall resound your name as often as the market-hall of Carlton Cross hears mention made of Cornel Kilderbee.

Proverbs and pithy aphorisms without number are fastened upon his reputation, and few matters pertaining to the social life of the Border more deeply impress the stranger than the frequency with which these sayings are repeated, with keen relish and manifest gusto, by the gentry and yeomen, the traders and workmen of the region. At the market ordinaries of the old borough, farmers and blanket dealers wrangling over unsettled bargains, or clacking current news over rum-punch or red port, may be heard spicing their talk in this fashion:

"Ah! he lost his temper, did he? Then that accounts for it. As Cornel Kilderbee said, 'Catch a wise man in a rage and you've a fool in your power!'"

"A pretty sample of sour beer he is. Cornel Kilderbee was not far wrong when he said, 'A dirty fellow's money is the dirtiest stuff about him!'"

"Come, come, don't be hard on an old customer, but remember Cornel Kilderbee's rule: 'A good tradesman buys like a Jew and sells like a gentleman!'"

"All's fair with a gaunt, but you can't be too gentle with a dwarf!' as Cornel Kilderbee said to the county member."

"He had with the fight is on, and when it's over don't bear spite!' that was old Cornel's rule."

"He ought to drink less and work more, and think on Cornel's words, 'The man who's his own enemy is in a fair way to be no one's friend!'"

"Help a neighbor when he's out of luck, too, remember old Kilderbee's saying, 'A poor man's blessing travels farther than a rich man's curse!'"

"A slow should leave a mark!' that was old Cornel's way."

"A man should know how to swear without losing his temper!' that's what Cornel would say if he was here now."

"You are a smart fellow at a bargain; so was Cornel Kilderbee—but then he would always help a man to get a living."

"Don't be after keeping too many irons in the fire. The only Carlton Green man who could do four things in really tip-top style was Cornel Kilderbee. He could make money, crack jokes, brew punch, and play the fiddle; but then he had a cork leg."

"So you're like Cornel Kilderbee, and have an ugly tongue with a rough side to it, have you? But his tongue had a smooth side for those who wished him well."

In like manner the stranger, paying his first visit to the Border, does not pass many days in Carlton Cross without coming upon conclusive testimony that this pungent speaker of homely wisdom loved his practical joke.

It may be that turning gaze at the "Cat and Gridiron," the old head-quarters of the Border radicals, the stranger, on eating his first dinner in the chief parlor of that antique hostelry, will ask the meaning of a remarkable picture that hangs over the fire-place of the aromatic and not luxurious room.

The picture represents two middle-aged men, sitting on slight and unstable chairs, in the middle of a chamber the proportions of which are indicated by lines that declare the artist's manly disregard for the laws of perspective. Each of the middle-aged men deserves attention—that on the agriculturalist of florid complexion and extensive girth, being chiefly remarkable, so far as costume is concerned, for the abundance of the patch-chain and seals that dangle from his fob; the other, dressed in a high-collared, brass-buttoned, swallow-tailed blue coat; tights, and buckled shoes, being noticeable for the depth and amplitude of his white neck-tie, the uncompromising size of his pigtail, and the expression of gleeful smartness that pervades his sharp, thin features. But the most remarkable point in this picture is that—while the blue-coated gentleman has his right foot in a keeler of boiling water, the exhilarant condition of the fluid being indicated by a puff of vapor upon the canvas, and seems equally to enjoy the heat—the agriculturalist sits upon his high chair, doubled up with agony caused by a vain endeavor to imitate his friend and place his bootless foot in the steaming tub. The reader's imagination must furnish the details of the picture.

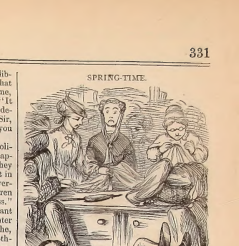
The "Cat and Gridiron" has a landlord of jolly aspect and rubicund visage—about the last host of the ruddy, jovial, over-eaten, cold-fashioned type of inn-keepers who have become merely traditional characters in the England of these abstemious times; and if any stranger should ask the "Cat and Gridiron's" host for the particulars of the incident commemorated in this work of art, that fat and laughter-loving entertainer of men with purses in their pockets will do his best to satisfy a not unreasonable curiosity. He will, many chuckles and boisterous guffaws, as though he had never told the story before—indeed, as though he were not telling the story himself, but were hearing it for the first time from the lips of another man—will answer in this wise:

"That gentleman, Sir, with the big watch-seals and rather more stomach than he knows how to carry, is Mr. Pratt, of Homerton Grange; heastwise, it was him, only as he's been dead these thirty year—died of a plexy;—t carn't exactly be said to be him now. But he was a great man in his day, and did a sort in politics, as he did, Sir. His was all to nothing the best breed in these parts; and it is to still, although there's a fashion come up for shorter stems. Sir, Mr. Pratt's father genelman was a rare man, Mr. Cornel Kilderbee: that's how he was always dressed—Lor' bless you, I remember him well enough. Blue coat, brass buttons, pigtail, gaiters in winter, stockings in summer, black tights the whole year round. There's a sort nowadays like the like of him a Guy nowadays, but he was a proper gentleman, he was, none more so. And, Lor', what a man he was for doing things! he did every thing! he used to sing songs, play the fiddle, make speeches, and keep things lively. Well, Sir, Mr. Pratt, of Homerton Grange, was a great man for pigs, but not much else in the way of intellect: now Mr. Kilderbee was at the top of the wine trade in these parts, and knew the length of every man he clapt eyes upon. Mr. Kilderbee was always going up to town on business, about wine and what not; and one day he returned to Carlton Cross after he'd been away for a many weeks. Mind, Sir, I'm speaking now of what I can't remember, for I wasn't born when Mr. Kilderbee returned after a many weeks. I tell it to you as I have heard it from my father, who was landlord of the 'Cat and Gridiron' before ever I was born. At the first market-supper after his return Mr. Kilderbee got talking with Mr. Pratt, of Homerton. Mr. Pratt was given to carry things rather high, on account of his pigs; and Mr. Kilderbee owed him a turn for something he'd said at Market Cross. So the long and short of it was, having got to high words in the presence of a full company, Mr. Pratt offered to fight Mr. Kilderbee; at which Mr. Kilderbee says, 'No, Pratt,' says he, 'I won't fight, for it's against my principles to fight; but, to show you I'm not afraid to bear pain, and can bear pain better than you, I'll tell what I'll do. We'll have a tub of boiling water a-piece in this room, and each of us shall put his right foot in it, sitting together side by side; and I'll bet you twenty guineas that, for all your brag and your courage, you'll take your foot out of the water before I do.' Now Mr. Pratt, of Homerton, was a good one for a bet, and, what's more, his blood was up. So he says 'done,' and Mr. Kilderbee says 'done;' and they jine hands. In another five minutes the cab of boiling water is put down in the middle of the market-room, which was extra crowded by people who had heard what was up, and of course walked to see the end of the wager. The feeling ran against Mr. Pratt, of Homerton, for he was apt to be rather high and mighty among his pigs. 'I'll be goes my shoe,' says Mr. Kilderbee, putting it in. 'And you?' says Mr. Pratt, up with all the while there sat Mr. Kilderbee, all calm and quiet, and enjoying himself. 'Landlord, says he to my father, with a smile, 'put the room more boiling water. What's in this tub seems rather chilly.' 'Cornel Kilderbee,' roars Mr. Pratt, wholly scared out of his senses, and quite purple with rage, 'you're bewitched!—you're an imp of hell!—it's done by nekoromancy!—you're in league with the devil!' 'Not a bit of it, no; not quite so bad as that,' says Mr. Kilderbee, softly and mocking-like, still keeping his foot in the water—'I am not in league with the devil, but I've got a cork leg!' By gorms, Sir, how all the market-room busted and roared with laughter, and how Mr. Pratt, of Homerton, swore and rowe, just for all the world like a Bedlamite in a coal-cellar. And, the more he swore and rove, the more the whole room busted and roared. And, Sir, what Mr. Kilderbee said was just the truth. I told you as how he had been a goodish while in France, and learnt how to fight on this wager came off. Now, while he was in London he had met with an accident in being knocked down by a cart while looking at a play; and after that the surgeons had cut off his leg below the knee, they fixed him up with a cork leg and foot, made wonderfully neat, that when he wore his stockings and buckled shoes, no one could see any difference between the natteral and the compo limb. You see, he hadn't wrote home any thing about his mishap, and so there was the blessed fool in the market-room that could make out how it was that he bore the hot water without even a-flinching. But you may believe me, Sir, the market-room lauded and roared; and Mr. Pratt, of Homerton, didn't show again in the market-room until he had been set up once more by his pigs getting a sort more prices."

SOCIABLE SILENCE.

THERE is a silence which is felt to be sociable, when the silent associates are tried and trusty friends. Where there is no fear, no implicit confidence, and an underlying sense of general sympathy, it is often a relief to be able to hold one's peace without any risk of misapprehension. Whereas, with a comparative stranger, one puts on company manners, and is keen to use the shuttle-cock of colloquial inanity with all one's battle-door might. Every body who has friends must have felt this: and the half-hour, because the feeling is a common one, it may be interesting to show by examples how it has been expressed in books and poetry.

Old friends, remarks Horace Walpole, in one of his letters, are the great blessing of one's later years—half a word conveys a meaning. He makes this remark in reference to the loss of his intimate friend Mr. Chute, whom he used to see oftener than any one, and to whom he had recourse in every difficulty. "And him I loved to have here, as our friendship was so entire, and we knew one another so entirely, that he alone was never the least constraint to me. We passed many hours together without saying a syllable to each other; for we knew both above speaking."



For those who have managed that things shall run smoothly over the domestic rug, says the author of "Over Farm," there is a prodigious time of life than the long candle-light hours of home and silence. Over the domestic rug, says the author of "Over Farm," there is a prodigious time of life than the long candle-light hours of home and silence. Over the domestic rug, says the author of "Over Farm," there is another element of satisfaction is necessary. The fact that is felt is enough for peace."

One thinks of Dr. Johnson in his last illness, visited by Malone, and proving so unusually silent that the visitor rose to leave, believing him to be in pain, or incommoded by company. "Pray, Sir, be seated," Johnson said. "I can not talk, but I like to see you there." Indeed, great talker in every sense as the doctor had been in his prime, he was never insensible to the value of sympathetic silence. During his tour to the Hebrides, his companion, Boswell, took the liberty one evening of remarking to Johnson that he very often sat quite silent for a long time, even when in company with a single friend. "It is true, Sir," replied Johnson. "Tom Tyers described me the best. He once said to me, 'Sir, you are like a ghost; you never speak till you are spoken to.'"

Klin accounts that to be but an imperfect solitude which a man enjoys by himself, and applauds the sense of the first hermits when they retired into Egyptian solitudes, not singly, but in twos, "to enjoy one another's want of conversation. The Carthusian is bound to his brethren by this agreeing spirit of incommunicativeness." In another sentence, Klin adds, what so pleased him, the manner or the wondrous will remain by the side of his best friend, in the one case on the ocean, in the other deep in the forest, without speaking a single word. But as the two entertain the same train of ideas—as their silence has been no more than a long tacit communion with nature, "You will be astonished to find that, at the proper moment, they have but to exchange a word, a gesture, or a look, and they will have communicated more to each other by this word, this gesture, or glance of the eye, than others could have done in a long discourse."

Mr. Shirley Brooks, in his last and best novel, says: "It is a happy time when a man and a woman can be long silent together, and love one another the better that neither speaks of love. A few years later, and silence is perhaps thought to mean either sorrow or sulks."

The young lover in Mr. Disraeli's "Love Story," expressly so called, apologizes to Henrietta Temple for a long term of stagnant silence with the candid avowal that he's afraid he's very stupid. "Because you are silent?" she asks. "Is not that a sufficient reason?" he submits. "Nay, I think not," replies Miss Temple; "I think I am rather fond of silent people myself. I can not bear to live with a person who feels compelled to talk because he is my companion. The wisest human beings sometimes without pain and myself exchanging fifty words; yet I am very happy; I do not feel that we are dull.

SPRING-TIME.

1. Shopping brisk. Utter prostration of the Dry-goods Clerk.

2. Religion buds forth afresh with the flowers of May: or is it those Spring Bonnets?

3. Crusty Individual.—"Snow and mud so sooner out of the streets than worse nuisances get into them!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MAN passing through a gateway in the dark hit his nose against the post. "I wish that post was in h—l," said he. "Better wish it somewhere else," said a bystander; "you might run against it again."

A minister of Indianapolis proposes that hereafter, instead of saying, "Let us sing the Doxology," the singular say, "Let us put on our over-coats, mufflers, fur, slip on gloves, grab our hats, look to the Lord, and be thankful."

TO BE A FARMER'S WIFE.

I am a wild and laughing girl, just turned of sweet seventeen,
As full of mischief and of fun as ever you have seen,
And when I am a woman grown, no city born for me;
If ever I marry in my life, a farmer's wife I'll be.

I love a country life: I love the joyous breeze;
I love to hear the singing bird among the leafy trees;
The lowing herds, the bleating flocks, make music sweet for me;
If ever I marry in my life, a farmer's wife I'll be.

I love to see the chickens skip. I love to milk the cows;
I love to see my mother's love a-twinkling at the plows;
And fields of corn and waving grain are pleasant sights to me;
If ever I marry in my life, a farmer's wife I'll be.

Let other girls, who love it best, enjoy the gloomy town;
Mid dusky walls and dusky streets to ramble up and down;
But flowery banks, and shady woods, and sunny skies for me;
If ever I marry in my life, a farmer's wife I'll be.

A Connecticut farmer's wife, who was noted for a close eye to the financial, on being told by her husband, as he came home from church meeting, that he had seen strawberries a dollar a quart, eagerly inquired: "But how much money will you get by it?"

CUSTOMER. "A slight mourning hat-band, if you please!"
FASHIONABLE HATTER. "What relation, Sir?"
CUSTOMER. "Wife's uncle."
HATTER. "Favorite uncle, Sir?"
CUSTOMER. "Favorite? No—no!"
HATTER. "Mentioned in the will, Sir?"
CUSTOMER (tartly). "Do you think so?"
HATTER (to his clerk, briskly). "Couple o' inches, Thomas."

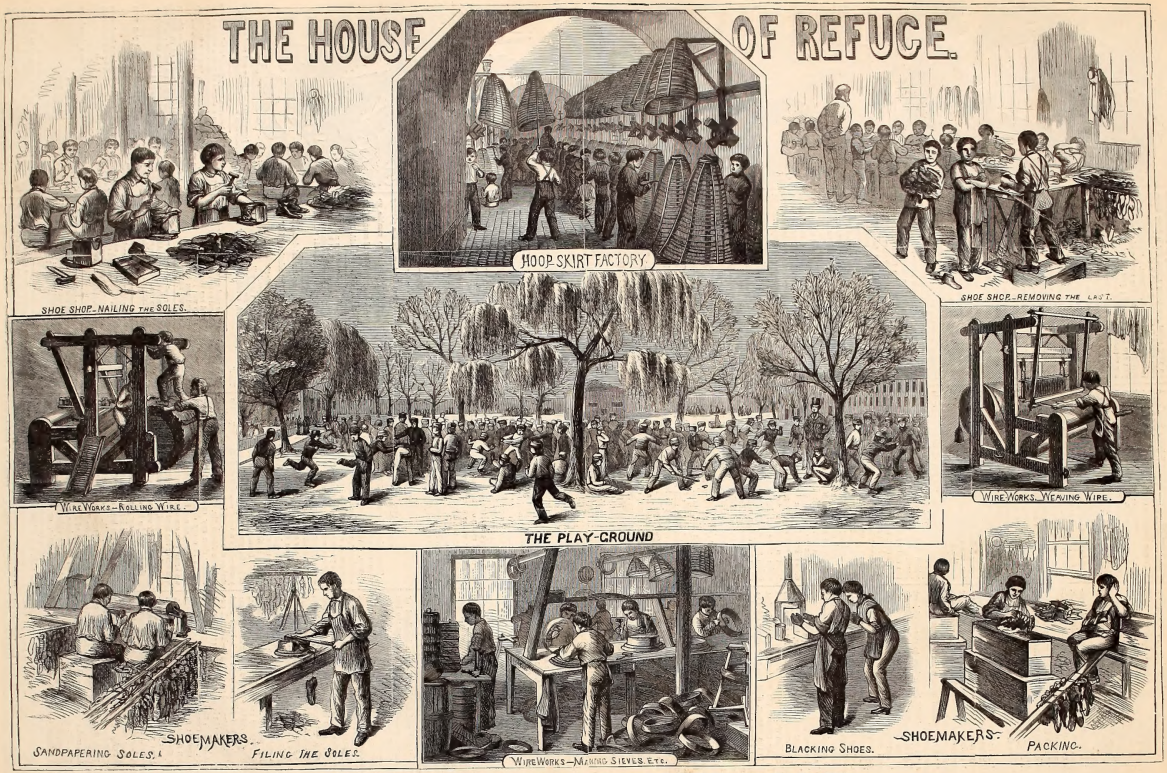
The following can be read so as to make sense, but it takes a cute individual to find out how. Just try it:

I thee now, and what I see
Love is up will I have
Not that and you have you'll
One and downs and you if.



A letter was recently received at the Boston Post-office, the address upon which gave considerable trouble to the clerks. Finally it was deciphered as "Jeremy Bluine" (Jamaica Plain), and it was forwarded to its place.

"I stand," said a Western stump orator, "on the platform of 'Over Farm,' there is more honor and justice in my arm if I desert 'em." "You stand on nothing of the kind," replied a disgusted shoemaker in the crowd; "you stand in my boots, that you never paid for, and I want the money."

The following is the negro's definition of a gentleman: "Mones make de black man workee—make de horse workee—make de ox workee—make cherry ting workee, only de hog—he no workee: he eat, he drink he walk 'bout, he go to sleep when he please—he lif like a gentleman."

An old lady, reading an account of a distinguished old lawyer who was said to be the father of the New York bar, exclaimed: "Poor man! he had a dreadful set of children!"

A little girl, just past her fifth year, while chattering about the stars, which she visited two or three nights in the same house of more mature age, being asked, "What do you mean by beans, Annie?" replied, "Why, I mean men that have not got much sense."

NEW YORK HOUSE OF REFUGE ON RANDALL'S ISLAND.—Sketched by W. H. Davenport.—[See Page 333.]

THE CROWN PRINCE OF ITALY AND HIS BRIDE.

HOUSE OF REFUGE ON RANDALL'S ISLAND.

We have before given in this journal articles and engravings illustrating the several organized charities of this city which have for their purpose the assistance of children. One of the principal and most beneficial of these has for its aim also the reformation of children who have by circumstances, more than inclination, been led into a career of crime. The House of Refuge on Randall's Island, which we illustrate opposite, is sustained by the city, and its occupants are the boys and girls who are arrested as criminals, and sent here instead of to the Penitentiary, at the discretion of the judge, who may take their youth and other extenuating circumstances into consideration.

Once in the House of Refuge they are put to work for the term of their sentence. The shoe shops employ the majority of the boys, and our engraving illustrates a number of them at work. The smaller boys work in the hoop-skirt factory under female supervision, and in the wire shops, where they grow skillful in weaving sieves, traps, strainers, etc., etc.

There are now about one thousand children in the House, and the numbers are on the increase. The Report of the Commissioners of Public Charities and Corrections shows that, during the year 1866, 12,890 prisoners were sent to the Island, and most of these to the House of Refuge, but for short terms only.

The contracted space is to be enlarged, and it is proposed that a school-ship should be established, in which the boys might be trained for the merchant navy.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE IN ITALY.

The marriage of the Crown Prince Humbert of Italy, eldest son of King Victor Emanuel, to his first cousin, Princess Margaret of Savoy, daughter of the King's brother, the late Duke of

PRIMITIVE STYLE OF THRESHING WHEAT IN ITALY IN 1868.—[See Page 334.]

Genoa, took place on April 22. The virtues and accomplishments of the bride have greatly endeared her to the people of her native Piedmont. She is the daughter of her father, in 1855, which was a severe affliction to VICTOR EMANUEL, happening at the same time with the deaths of his wife and mother, this young Princess has been educated in retirement at Stress, on the Lago Maggiore, under the care of her mother, the widowed Duchess of Genoa, who some time after ward entered into a second marriage, espousing as one of extreme rank, the Marquis de RAPALLO, a Piedmontese nobleman, formerly aide-de-camp to her first husband. The Duchess of Genoa, it may be remarked, is a daughter of the present King JOHN of SAXONY. A taste for intellectual and literary pursuits seems to be hereditary in this family, and one of the best German translations of DANTE is the work of the King of Saxony. The mental culture of his grand-daughter, whose father, the late Duke of Genoa, was likewise a good scholar, has been worthy of her future position as the Queen of Italy. She passed all the early autumn of last year at Dresden. The bridegroom, PRINCE HUMBERT, or, as the Italians write his name, UMBERTO, is a young man of promising disposition, who behaved with signal courage in the battle of Custoza. It may be remembered that he was the brave recruit, since the peace with Austria, the Archduchess MATILDA, a niece of the Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH, has been the object of that young lady, by her dress accidentally catching fire, which happened about a twelvemonth ago, prevented the matrimonial plans on his behalf from being put in execution.

It may be interesting to our lady readers to know that one of the Queen's dresses is white, low-necked, with berthe crossed and the apron and sash now the style, a white silver-starred veil flowing round the back hair, arranged in tight chignon curls about her head. They will also be delighted to read the following description of a portion of a toilet-case presented to her by the city of Turin: "It is a real bijou, composed of 14,000 drachms of finest gold, 880 of lapis lazuli, and 1276 precious stones. The casket is in open-work, executed in the sixteenth century style, and is in gold. The cover is set with a slight convex, small mettres in height. In the centre of each of the four sides is the Cross of Savoy in turquoise; c e the cross is formed of pearls on a red ground of rubies, encircled by a gold rim. Around these crests are various compartments—eight heads, oak-leaves, and a ribbon with the letters E. F. E. F. T., to indicate the old knightly order of the Annonciata; also three helmets, crowns, and garlands, to denote the gradual progress of the House of Savoy from the year 1000 up to the present time. Between the medallions and the angles of the casket are 24 stars of lapis lazuli, set in a sort of running ribbon which twines round the casket, and in the midst of exquisite mosaic is studded with 352 pearls and 4 large emeralds, on the rounded corners are rosettes of gems, pearls, and diamonds, and 4 Oriental sapphires."

THRESHING WHEAT IN ITALY.

IT is almost incredible that the engraving on page 333, showing the mode of threshing wheat as practiced in Italy, is taken from a photograph of an actual scene in the year of grace 1868. However, the statement is the case, and in this date the wheat of all Italy is threshed in the primitive manner there pictured. Nothing we could say in words would so graphically describe the benighted condition of Italy, and, indeed, that of a great number of the European States where Catholic rule. The lack of enterprise and invention, as well as the lax morality and general ignorance of all Catholic countries of the Old World, can be readily traced to the prevailing religion and the blighting influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood.

THE MOST INTELLECTUAL CITY OF EUROPE.

KONIGSBERG—the Amber City—capital of Eastern Prussia—the city of contradictions—home of the Teutonic Knights and of the modern descendants of the Amber Prize and of Immanuel Kant—cradle of religious enterprise and of philosophical utilitarianism—scene of the coronation of the Prussian Fredericks—centre of the old Prussia and of the new Germany—is a city of peculiar situation and peculiar genius. The first fact about it is that it is a seaport in an extraordinary isolation. An old saying puts the case that the Amber City should be to its people all in all, since it has, not only out of Germany, but out of the world. "A good place for wolves," was Father Ertz's verdict on the royal and sacred city in which he came to be crowned.

Konigsberg has been called the Venice of the North—a name not only wide of the mark, but far wider from the mark than is usual in such comparisons. It is, in fact, absurd. Venice is a city of gold and marble, of domes, and palaces, and campaniles; a city which is warm in tone, and high in color; a city washed by the sea; a city girdled by the green sun by day, and glowing under southern stars by night. Konigsberg lies in a realm of mist, through which, for half the year at least, neither sun nor star can pierce.

"Eight months of mud, four months of moths," was a neat description given of the climate of Ost Preussen by one who knew it only too well. The city stands on the banks of a stream—the Pregel—which soaks and slips into the place by two main channels, wielding and widening into breadths and marshes of frozen sea. When it is not river it is pond. One-sixth of the whole city, within the walls, is water; the surface of which is covered with broken and floating ice for nearly half the year. Much snow comes down, and the warmer hir from the Baltic melts this snow into slush. In Konigsberg, "a friendly mother," we have our seven winters. First we have rain and hail; then we have snow and mud; next we have sleet and slush; this brings us to our comfortable mid-winter, when the mercury sinks to forty degrees of frost: the country gets open, and we can sledge from the Lang Gasse to Pillau by the firm ice of the Frische Haf.' In these bright days of winter-frost the city is seen at its best. The streets are free from mud, the quays are silent, and the ships are locked in ice. A layer of frozen snow lies on the ground, and over which the sledges glide with their muffled drivers and their silvery bells. At night the stars come out in clusters, as they do in a northern zone. In their red light, as in that of the moon, the Gothic spires and towers of the city gain a touch of beauty to which the beauty is not that of the luminous and artistic city on the sea.

Konigsberg is a city of bridges, water-ways, and ships of narrow draft—the Ashbel Brotts; but here again the resemblance ends. Every street has its own quaintness, every bridge its own story. Here a spire, there a gable, makes a picture. In one place a narrow alley stops the way, and round the corner a broad expanse of water reaches the eye. Now you have wharves and masts, anon you come suddenly on fountains and flower-beds. Open places abound with statues of Prussian worthies, while of enormous sweep, embatted with tower and bastion, surround the city. A third of the city within these walls is gentle, frail and genial. Those who are native to the province find it so pleasant and picturesque (as compared against the country round it) that they have no desire to do more than describe it to a stranger as a paradise on earth.

Beyond all question Konigsberg is a city of much intellectual activity. Otherwise, it would hardly be flattery to say it is the most intellectual place in Europe, since it is the head-quarters of Philistinism. Every one here is more or less a scholar. The children of a brewer in Konigsberg are brought up with the children of a state councilor in Berlin. In this city all the young people seem to be going to school; girls no less than boys. In no part of Germany, said a medical professor, "we shall put the girls in line with the boys; teach them the same things; give them the same degrees. Our young women are better grounded than their sisters in any part of Germany." Konigsberg is full of institutions learned institutions, official institutions, popular institutions. It has its university, three gymnasia (colleges); several high schools; a normal school; a school for boys and girls; and a great number of private schools; so many that there seem to be two or three schools in every street.

THE BEST AMERICAN ORGAN TO BE GIVEN FOR THE BEST AMERICAN STORY.—The Publishers of the new Parlor Organ Monthly Magazine offer the above prize for the best moral story, one of S. D. & H. W. SMITH'S American Organs, valued at three hundred and twenty-five dollars.

The generous award will be made by a Committee of literary gentlemen.

Authors will address "PEATT BROTHERS, Publishers, 37 Cornhill, Boston," for particulars.

We are assured that the firm of EASTMAN & KENDALL, 60 Hanover St., Boston, Mass., advertised six our columns, is trustworthy and reliable. For 10 cents they send a patent pen fountain, and a check describing their goods. The Eastman & Kendall system of selling goods is becoming quite popular, particularly with the ladies. It is worthy of a trial.—Buffalo Gazette.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH PATCHES FRECKLES AND TAN. The only reliable Remedy for these Brown Discolorations on the face is PERRY'S MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by all druggists. Depot, 49 BOND ST., 6 Bond St., New York. $2.00 Sold every where.

FOR THOSE DISFIGURING DISEASES, Black Or Worm and Pimples on the Face, see PERRY'S COMEDONE and Pimple Remedy. Order from Druggist, or send to Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

S. T. 1860. X.

A GETLEMAN of great medical knowledge says that a more genial, wholesome, and efficient tonic and aperient than Dr. Drake's Plantation Bitters has never discovered. He recommends it for Dyspepsia, for Liver Complaints, for Exhaustion, Weakness, for a Want of Appetite, and for Mental Depression. It is an agreeable stimulant, and is equally adapted to young and old. Persons of sedentary habits, like clergymen, lawyers, merchants, and delicate females, are particularly benefited by its use.

MAGNOLIA WATER—A delightful toilet article —superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Railroads.

ACCORDEONS. The new improved Tube Accordeon, with ten keys and one tremolo stop, sent to any address, with instruction book, on receipt of $10, $12, and $15, or C.O.D. I. SANGER & CO., Manufacturers, 295 Bowery, New York.

Don't Use Dull Scissors. Jacob's Patent Scissors Sharpener, the staple sharpener for family use. Samples, postpaid, 25c. Circulars free. Great inducements to agents. Southwick & Hastings, Worcester, Mass.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN, MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN, and all eruptions of the skin effectually removed by

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION" renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION

SOFT, FAIR, AND BLOOMING.

This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for removing the above blemishes that has been established 29 years.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance. For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"

for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

WANTED AGENTS, combined SQUARE, LEVEL, and BEVEL. The most inducements offered. County rights for sale on most liberal terms. For particulars, address

W. S. RATCHELDER & CO., Pittsburg, Pa.

A POCKET TIME-KEEPER sent free to every subscriber to the NEW YORK WEEKLY. Terms 75 cents, on receipt of which the Novelette and Time-Keeper will be sent by return mail. Address "The Novelette," Box 745, Albany, N. Y.

2,500,000 Customers in Four Years.

Patronize the Best.

Having the largest capital, most experienced buyers, and extensive trade of any concern in the Dollar Sale business.

GUARANTEE SATISFACTION

to every customer, and also the best selection of goods ever offered at

ONE DOLLAR EACH.

No other concern can buy, nay also whatever our agents are selling. Our motto, "Prompt and Reliable." Male and female wanted in city and country.

THE LADIES

are particularly requested to try our popular club system of selling Dollar Sale Goods, and FANCY GOODS, DRESS PATTERNS, COTTON CLOTH, CASTORS, SILVER-PLATED SPOONS, and JEWELRY. (Established 1864.) A patent pen fountain and a check describing what it is to be sold for a dollar, 10 cents; 20 for $2; 40 for $4; 60 for $6; 100 for $10; sent by mail. Free premium to getter up, (worth 50 per cent more than those sent by any other concern), according to size of club. Send for a trial club, or if not do not fail to send for a circular.

Please take should NOT be classed with New York dollar jewelry sales or bogus "Tea Companies," as it is entirely legitimate.

EASTMAN & KENDALL,
45 Hanover Street, Boston, Mass.

A sample of Prof. ROBB'S CURLIQUE will be sent free to any address. The CURLIQUE will curl the straightest hair into ringlets by application (without injury) in soft, luxuriant, beautiful, flowing curls.

Address, with stamp,

Prof. B. R. ROBB, Parkman, Ohio.

What we Love a Woman for;

The Secret of Success: That Horrid Little Fright. How to prevent Baldness. How to make Stockings Leave; Potichomanie; Effects of Tea on the System; The Sergeant's Bride; THE RAFFLE FOR A PIANO, for May. Only 25 cents a year. Send Subscriptions to O. A. BOGERAUS, Troy, Rensselaer Street, New York.

$25 PER DAY, AGENTS WANTED, Male and Female, Local and Travelling. Business never steady-needs no capital required. Address REEVES & CO., 78 Nassau St., New York.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 859 Broadway, N. Y., Sewing Machines, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the lowest-priced reliable Machines. Examine different styles, or send stamp for circular. 859 Broadway, N. Y.

A GENTS WANTED—FOR THE best and most reliable LIFE OF GRANT, by HON. J. T. HEADLEY. Now Ready. In one large octavo Vol. 75.00. Also just issued THE NATIONAL HANDBOOK of Facts and Figures from the foundation of the Government to the present time. 401 pages $1.50. Sent Post paid. E. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y

CONCERTINAS. A splendid Concertina, with 20 keys, tremolo, and 2 stops, tuner, with a complete instruction book, sent to any address on receipt of $6, $7, and $8, or C.O.D. I. SANGER & CO., Manufacturers, 295 Bowery, New York.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an excellent Game. Sent, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents, by W. HERBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

Presidential Campaign Opened for 1868.

Five different kinds of Elegant Grant Campaign Medals and Pins now ready. Each of the five kinds sent to agents for sample, on receipt of $1 00. Agents wanted every where. Address B. W. HITCHCOCK, Beadquarters Jewelry Goods, 76 Spring St., under the St. Nicholas Hotel, New York.

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE MIRROR AND PARMER, a weekly paper published at Manchester, N. H., is the leading FARMING AND FAMILY PAPER in the Eastern States. It is a quarto, about the size of the New York Weekly Tribune. Specimen copies sent free upon receipt of a two-cent stamp to prepay postage. Terms of advertising: Ten Cents for a line of space each insertion. Twelve lines make an inch long. Twenty Dollars per column single insertion.

JOHN B. CLARKE, Editor and Proprietor.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE
Novelty Iron Works,
Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

EMPLOYMENT. $15 00 to $30 00 a day guaranteed. Male or Female Agents wanted in every town—downright workers. Address JAMES G. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

HOOSEY & CO'S
CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. Complete ORATORIOS and MASSES in vocal score, with organ or piano-forte accompaniment; TUTORS for all INSTRUMENTS; and THE MUSICAL CABINET—a complete Library of Vocal, Piano-forte, and Dance Music in 40 volumes—all 50 cents each. Other important publications equally cheap. Catalogues mailed free. HOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, New York, and Holles street, London.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Ready:

I.
BELLOWS'S OLD WORLD. The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

II.
LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. With Illustrations of the Storm Tubes. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and author of a "Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $2 00.

III.
KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Scripture History and the Book of Psalms. By FREDERICK WILLIAM KRUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite," &c. Translated under the express Sanction of the Author by the Rev. M. G. KYLE, M.A. With a Letter from the Translator to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.
WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A., Ph.D. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.
HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in French, German, Spanish, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to supersede "Hoppe and Meadows's Book for Travellers." By W. PFEIFFER-FETRIDGE, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book." Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

VI.
MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. 1584-1609. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L. Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Complete in Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

VII.
BARNES'S THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS. History of the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States. By WILLIAM H. BARNES, M.A., Author of "The Body Politic," &c. With Eighteen Steel Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

VIII.
DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1862. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

IX.
QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal, giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, in Company with Prince Albert. Edited by QUEEN VICTORIA. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

Uniform with Queen Victoria's Memoir of the Prince Consort.

X.
SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

XI.
BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

BRAKESPEARE; or, The Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

POOR HUMANITY. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Christie's Faith," "Mattie: a Story," "Carry's Confession," "No Man's Friend," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c., &c. The Sequel to "Birds of Prey." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SOONER OR LATER. By SHIRLEY BROOKS, Author of "The Silver Cord," &c. Illustrated by DU MAURIER. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

MY HUSBAND'S CRIME. Illustrated by GASTON FAY. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ONE OF THE FAMILY. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

BROWNLOWS. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes" "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIOIDE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIOIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, which for durability, gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never equaled by watches costing five times their price. Each watch is also warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, and one that will be good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $3 to $9. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bill can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in order to obtain customers for their goods. The Oroide Watch originated with us, and we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained directly from us.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the New York Independent.

Our readers have probably observed in our paper the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which is said to have gold hunting cases without gold. And in a case which is ornamental and durable, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in every community of society who can not afford to pay a price of $60 or $80 for a first-class silver watch, nor $125 to $175 for a gold one, yet would like a handsome hunting watch, setting off the dress. The Oroide Watch appears to suit their tastes exactly.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: WEST BARNON, December 3, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I have received the watch you sent per the Adams Express, and like it very well. It keeps good time, and is of a handsome appearance. I have disposed of it to a friend of mine, and now wish you to send me one of the same kind by the first express, and charge the amount to my account. When you send it, direct it to Havre de Grace, Md., as that is the nearest point for me to get it. Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, yours, &c.,

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: YORK, PA., December 10, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—I received the Watch to-day, and I am very much pleased with it. You will please send me another, as you advertise. There are five persons who will send for the same watch in a few days. Yours respectfully,

JOSEPH ZIEGLAND.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: OFFICE MERCHANTS' UNION EXPRESS CO., Buffalo, N. Y., December 5, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—Please send me a half dozen Oroide Watches—small, medium, and large sizes. The watch you sent me in October and November is all right, and keeps time as well as any watch I ever had in my pocket. Please send me samples of your chains. I am going to keep two or three men travelling all the time. Very truly yours,

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: GREENWOOD, Nov. 28, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—Received and three others wish you to send four of your Imitation Gold Watches, one of the gentlemen's size, and receive payment on delivery. Address Green-wood Farms, Marquette County, Lake Superior, Michigan. Please to send by Northern Express Co., Michael Co. Agent, Marquette, Mich. Yours truly —all of Greenwood. Your watches stand in great esteem here. Yours, &c., MICHAEL LYDON.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: KANSAS CITY, MO., December 10, 1867.

SIRS,—I am glad to say that the watch for my friend gave entire satisfaction. I am ready for another, you may expect further orders; and, as we put confidence in you, we will forward the money by mail, having it registered, to save it paying expenses back on the money. Please send by express. Yours truly, JAMES A. RUSSELL, HARRISON CORNELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: WEST NEWTON, January 15, 1868.

GENTLEMEN,—Please send me, C. O. D., two of your Oroide Watches, gent's watch with dial letters, exact as plain a case as you have, the other one curved. Also two of your two-dollar chains. Send to Lima, Ally Co., Ohio, by Merchants Express. Respectfully yours, H. C. KEYSER.

P. S.—The Ladies' Watch you sent me was all that I could ask for the money. It keeps good time, and is a splendid article. H. C. K.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: POST HENRY, N. Y., January 18, 1868.

Please send me per express two watches, gents' size; and if they prove to be as good as the one you sent me, I think I will want more. D. A. WASSON.

BITTERS.

The human stomach seems to require a tonic stimulant. From time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, tonic bitters have been used. Formerly men took their own bitters, and left the art of eating breakfast without first taking their "tonic." Those were days, however, when prohibitory laws were unknown, and, in consequence, liquors were pure. Dealers could then afford to be honest, and sell nothing but the unadulterated. Now, however, what with government tax and court fines, poke-berry juice and alcohol are the base material for "Old Rye" and "Pure Bourbon." People have come to fear poisoning more than malarial diseases, and dropped their "tonic." The result here is what HOSTETTER & SMITH, of Pittsburg, have proved beneficent. Years ago they commenced the manufacture of laying it down as a rule that has since been conscientiously followed, to use nothing but the purest liquors, manufactured expressly for them. By strict adherence to this rule they have won public confidence, and reaped their reward in a large, profitable, and growing business. Their BITTERS is known all over the country. They are the pioneers of the business, and have the largest manufactory in the world. As the success in their case, as in too many instances, rendered them careless: their Bitters are not now what they to-day as was the first distillation. We heartily recommend them as a tonic.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

As a specific for dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, nervousness, general debility, and remittent and intermittent fevers, its efficacy has never been questioned.

There are many worthless imitations: we earnestly caution the public against them.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much money and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Fifteen book of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.

DAVID WATSON, Jr., Adams Express Co.'s Office,
26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

Curls! Curls! Curls!

A sample of Prof. Butler's Magnetic CURLIQUE sent to any address free. Beautiful, luxuriant, flowing curls produced on the first application. Invisible to the Hair. This is the only reliable and harmless Hair Curler. All others are worthless imitations. Sample by mail, JAMES S. BUTLER, No. 923 Broadway, New York City.

THE DOLLAR WATCH.—The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, handsome case, glass crystal, white dial, steel and metal works, watch size, good order; will denote correct time. Warranted for two years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Sent by mail for $1; $ for $2, or by Express, C.O.D., on receipt of order. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Short-Hand without a Master, price 25 cts.; Ventriloquism without a Master, price 15 cts. Sent postpaid, by O. A. ROORBACH, 162 Nassau St., N. Y.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., best $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 50c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 00, best $1 25 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 30c., 32c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in their article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 60c. to $1 60 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 10 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties who have clubs ask us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Then get the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark on the outside of each, with the club, so that there will be no confusion in their distribution —each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the party ordered cannot call, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will make a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $20.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending direct to the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name in either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or indirectos. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

New Spring Goods

FOR GENTLEMEN

AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway.

516 ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

Selpho's Patent are the best. They are light, strong and durable, and are sold at the lowest fact of any, and contain latest improvements. Pamphlets free. Address SELPHO & SON, 516 Broadway, New York.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!

Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in both MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us, with certainty and despatch, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and SPECIMENS sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & BUHR, Clothing Warehouse, 154 Fulton St., and 98 Nassau St., N. Y.

PARIS, 1867. Cheap, Useful, and Elegant.

"IMPROVED ORIOIDE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES."

(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, coupled with its low cost, to induce us to receive and "ROSKOFF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."

The Improved Bronze Aluminum of which my watches are made is a metal different from any that ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men for years, and elicited forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties. It has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by Secretary of His Majesty Napoleon III., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.

The qualities of this metal are so great that it surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of its value. Further, I will say, further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-cased—one size of ladies or fob watch for pants. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skillful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods have been manufactured in my own factory. I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $10 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.

Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges. Not responsible for money sent enclosed in letters. Address JULES D. ROCHEVAT VUILLEMIN, No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made: 3 New Patents received.

MARTINDALE'S IMPROVED SHEET BUTTONS, SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross.
BILLIARD BALLS also CUES and TIPS.
CHECKS, $8, $10, and $12 per 100.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $13 to $150 per gross pair.
WM. M. WELLING, 271 Broadway, New York.

THE BEST MUSICAL COMPOSERS.

Beethoven's Sonatas in 2 Vols., each $7 50. Mozart's Sonatas, $7 50. Chopin's Nocturnes and Waltzes, $5 00. Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, $3 00. Large paper, gilt edge, $4 00. Thalberg's Don Giovanni, $3 00. Gems of 40 Pieces, $7 50. Mailed postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston. CHARLES H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED

For a new, splendidly illustrated, and very popular book, of special value and interest to every body engaged in commerce or trade. Liberal terms and exclusive territory given. Address, at once, D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers, New York, for terms and particulars.

SCHAW'S CHEMICAL ELECTRO, SILVER-PLATING FLUID makes worn-out plated ware as good as new. Samples sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents to pay for packing and postage. Address J. SHAW, Chemist, 20 Elm Street, Bridgeport, Conn.

☞ Agents wanted every where.

SOMETHING NEW.

THE RALLARD BREECH-LOADING SHOT-GUN. This gun is now ready for delivery. Is now ready for delivery. Price, $30 00. Sent, securely packed, on receipt of price. Also the well-known RALLARD RIFLES, the Southerner Pistols, Eagle Revolvers. American Metallic Ammunition, all sizes. Superior quality. Send for circular. Address MERWIN, TAYLOR, & SIMPKINS, Sole Agents, 302 Broadway, New York. After May 1st, 395 Broadway.

P. S.—A full assortment of all goods in our line.

The Great New England Remedy.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having for many years proved the test of thirteen years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

The White Pine Compound cures Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Complaints generally. It is a reliable remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Pain in the Back, the Kidneys and Bladder, Gravel, and other complaints.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces. Prepared at the NEW ENGLAND BOTANICAL DEPOT, Boston, Mass. JOHN W. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio; O. BURNHAM and VAN SCHAACK, Ill.—General Agents for the West.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Prime Minister," a New Novel of Modern Society, by JOSEPH CHALE, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Southerner," a Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in Harper's Weekly form a permanent feature of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Card and Crease," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, well deserves the success the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each; or six copies for $20 00. Postage free.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for SIX Months, will be furnished for $2 00 each. A Volume of the WEEKLY, containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $5 25. Freight at the expense of Publishers.

Cloth Cases, for binding, for the Volumes of the MAGAZINE (4 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR (8 cents a year), will be sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the price where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each period is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new address must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft, payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $110; Quarter Page, $60—each Insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

THE POPE'S NEW HOBBY.

"An Italian Paper—the Examinatore—recently declared, in a passage which has been widely copied, that the Roman Court expected soon to control the American Republic, and the writer added: 'The populous City of New York even now, in fact, is governed by the Roman Court, through the cunning of the Papal Hierarchy, and their universal subjection of religious interests to those which are politico-ecclesiastical.'"—Tribune, May 1.

TRY THE PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue. Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat box. Price 10 and 20 cts. Sold by all Grocers and by Plymouth (ider Co. (C. T. Reynolds & Co.,) 116 & 118 Fulton St., New York.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED to introduce our NEW STAR SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. We will contract permanently with a responsible parties, and pay a monthly salary. Full particulars and sample stitch furnished on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., St. Louis, Mo.; Cleveland, Ohio; or Boston, Mass.

BROWN'S
Ladies' Paper COLLARS.
Splendid imitations of Linen Embroidery and New Patterns in great variety, two and world by mailed every where. We will send a dozen of either of the above, or of all of them, by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price. Try them. Address
Wm. P. Lyon & Son, P.O. Box 4461, N.Y.
N.B.—Merchants will be supplied on very liberal terms. Samples and Price-list by mail when desired.

I. E. WALRAVEN,
IMPORTER AND DEALER IN
Curtain Materials, Linens, Upholstery Goods, and Window Shades.
686 BROADWAY, NEW YORK;
710 CHESTNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!
Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-plated Ware, Tinware, Utensils.
CHINA AND GLASS WARE,
at greatly reduced prices.
B. ASSFORD'S,
Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

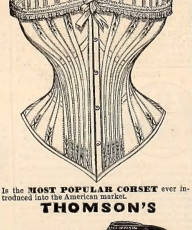
(LOCKE'S PATENTS.)
SELF-LIGHTING GAS BURNER
TURN THE KEY, AND THE GAS IS LIGHTED.
Applied to any Gas Fixtures without alteration.
NO ESCAPE—NO FRICTION—NO MATCHES
Price $1 each. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1. Liberal discount to the trade.
New York and Brooklyn Agency,
P. S. SANDERSON, Manager,
No. 681 Broadway, opp. Bond St., N. Y. City.

KENNEDY'S
Scrofula Ointment
Cures Old Sores;
Cures Ulcerated Sore Legs;
Cures Scrofulous Sores on the Neck;
Cures Blackheads, or Pimples, on the Face;
Cures Scurvy Sores;
Cures Cancerous Ulcers.
Price $1 00 per Bottle.
MANUFACTURED BY DONALD KENNEDY,
ROXBURY, MASS.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

THE BRUEN MANUFACTURING CO'S
NEW CLOTH PLATE
for the WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE. By substituting Cloth Plate for the old one, three distinct and different stitches can be made, viz, the Lock stitch and Double-Loop Elastic or so-called Grover & Baker, and the newly-patented Three-Tiered Embroidery Stitch. Price of Plate, $10 00.
The Bruen Manufacturing Co.,
371 Broadway, New York.

Steel Collars, enamelled white, undetected by the closest scrutiny, only equal of $1. Billon & Foggan, Mfrs., 78 Nassau St., N. Y.

One Ounce of Gold
Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. Babbitt's Lime Cream." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a One Dollar Greenback. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory,
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.



C. O. D.
American (WALTHAM) Watches,
NOW UNIVERSALLY ACKNOWLEDGED THE BEST AND CHEAPEST WATCH IN THE WORLD.
I will send to any address, by Express, a genuine WALTHAM WATCH, Chronometer Balance, Extra Jewelled, and in fine Silver Case, for $25, to be paid Express Company, examination of it to be in all respects as represented. THIS IS A RIVER TO HAVE PRIVILEGE OF EXAMINATION BEFORE THE PURCHASER OF EXPRESS COMPANY. THE PURCHASER IS reminded that the price named is only a small advance on that asked for the named is only a small advance on that asked for the base metal watch represented as an imitation of gold, of no real value, and dear at any price, and unlikely to be purchased by unprincipled parties, to be sold again to persons not acquainted with its spurious character.
Name and address must be distinctly written. Buyer to pay Express charges. Address
EUGENE BADGELEY, 157 Fulton St., N.Y.

LAWN, SWISS, LINEN, and CAMBRIC
IN FOUR (QUADRUPLE),
FIVE (QUINTUPLE), and
EIGHT (OCTUPLE) ROWS,
TRADE-MARK. For making and trimming
Ladies' and Children's Wear.
PATENT. WARRANTED TO WASH and retain its original BEAUTY AND FULLNESS.
For Sale by the Fancy and Dry Goods Houses throughout the country.

TRY
B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,
MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.
Cures Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.
If your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

Thomson's Patent 'Glove-Fitting'

Is the MOST POPULAR CORSET ever introduced into the American market.
THOMSON'S

LACE IMPERIAL.
Is the CHEAPEST, LIGHTEST, and MOST DURABLE COVERED BELT ever made, and the only one which, when soiled, can be washed without injury without removing the spring.
THOMSON, LANGDON & CO.,
591 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use.
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

DRUNKENNESS CURED
By Upham's Antidote. Sent by mail for $1 25 by S. C. Upham, 18 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,
An Imported for N. Y. Union Club.
TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway,
Publisher and Importer of
SCIENTIFIC WORKS,
has just issued a new General Catalogue of Books, 48 pages, octavo. Sent by mail on application.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed free by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

F. BLUME,
1125 BROADWAY, HAS JUST PUBLISHED:
The Eye that Brightens when I Come (for Piano).30c.
Pulling Hard Against the Stream.....30c.
Nellie's Gone Forever.....30c.
Have You Seen Her Lately? (comic).....30c.
"Dandy Pat," and "Paddy's the Boy," each.....35c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Music mailed.

AGENTS WANTED.
PEOPLE in want of, and AGENTS who are selling all kinds of Sewing Machines, are requested to address me (with stamp) for greatly reduced prices and terms. J. K. Pearson, box 8, Charlestown, Mass.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.
Wanted Agents for the New Volume of the ANNUAL CYCLOPÆDIA, an indispensable volume for every Merchant, Farmer, or Mechanic. It contains an account of every thing which has occurred throughout the world during 1867, affording a complete Cyclopædia of Reference, as important to every intelligent person as an almanac. "An enterprise of immense value to the public." Book Agents will find the sale rapid and profitable. Address D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers, New York.

Pollak & Son, Manuf'rs of Meerschaum goods. Store: 405 Broadway, near Broome St., & 27 John St., near Nassau. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5346.

500 Photographs for 10 Cents. Address A. SEYMOUR & CO., Box 27, Station A, N. Y. City.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT
"Causeless Depression." One often hears this phrase. It is ridiculous. All depression of spirits has a cause. If there is no moral reason for it, it is a symptom of physical disease, and in that case may be quickly relieved by the exhilarating, purifying, and renovating operation of Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient. Sold by all Druggists.

ASK FOR A
WALTHAM WATCH.
It is the Best. It is the Cheapest.
T. B. BYRNES, No. 189 Broadway, New York.

WARD'S SHIRTS
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars, sent free everywhere. Full assortment on hand. Call to Express Company on receipt of goods. Cor. Broadway and Union Square; also 387 Broadway, N. Y.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN.

One Forward and two Backward Arches, ensuring great strength, well balanced elasticity, evenness of point, and smoothness of action. Sold by all Stationers. One gross in twelve contains a box of Gold Pens. One Gross (Steel Pens assorted points) and Patent Ink-retaining Penholder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. D. Sarrs & Co., 151 and 153 William St., N.Y.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

MERCHANTS' BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 63 Broadway.

Agents Wanted.
FOUNTAIN PEN. Non-corrosive; Durable; Warranted. Writes 300 pages with one supply. Sells quick. $10 a day. Sample Box, 15 Pens, for 25 cents or 12 Boxes for $2. Address MORSE'S FOUNTAIN PEN CO., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WARD'S
CLOTH LINED PAPER COLLARS AND CUFFS
TO BE HAD EVERYWHERE.
RETAIL: Corner of Union Square and Broadway. Also, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL: 387 Broadway, New York.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.
Its Effects are Magical.
Sutphen's TIC DOULOUREUX OR Universal Neuralgia PILL.
Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents; six do., $5.00, postage 36 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 48 cts. Sold by all druggists.
TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 596.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

COLUMBUS EXPLAINING HIS DISCOVERY OF AMERICA TO KING FERDINAND AND QUEEN ISABELLA.—DRAWN BY JOHN GILBERT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

WE give on the preceding page an engraving from the pencil of the celebrated artist, JOHN GILBERT, of "COLUMBUS explaining his discovery of America to KING FERDINAND and Queen ISABELLA of Spain." The story of COLUMBUS is, of course, familiar to all the readers of the Weekly, and any explanation of the picture is therefore unnecessary. The scene chosen by Mr. GILBERT for illustration is that famous one in history which took place at the palace of FERDINAND on the return of COLUMBUS after his first voyage, which he displayed with his charts and diagrams, and completely confounded the astronomers whom he had astonished by his views previous to sailing.

AN OLD SOLDIER'S OPINION.

I'm a plain old soldier who fought in the ranks,
Give arm gone and this ugly scar;
With nothing except my country's thanks,
Nor a crust, a shelter or a bar;
Though I fought as well as most of 'em did,
Loaded, and fired with as true an aim;
But then, you see, the fact of it is,'
We are not all of us born to fame.

An army of captains would hardly do,
With all to command and none to obey;
I'm proud of wearing the army blue—
Proud of it now to this very day.
Though the civil war is over and done,
And I've laid aside my soldier-dress,
Trust in the right is what I say.
My love for our cause is none the less.

Think you, of men who have fought and bled
On common ground that is dear to each,
Where fair with fair have join staff and shod,
That of itself should widen the breach?
My notion is, and I think I'm right,
There seldom was cause of quarrel yet,
Since the time of Noah, betwixt man and man,
That one or both of 'em couldn't forget.

I may be wrong; but that's not the point
With a little patience I'll soon get at;
My tongue, like the times, is out of joint,
And wags a little this way and that.
The point is this—now the country's saved,
Who is the man, of all, to-day,
Fitted the best to take the chair?
To get the ship in a plain, straight way.

We've many among us, good men and true,
Civilian and soldier, that I'll own;
But he fact is plain to both me and you,
There is always one, in the world has known—
Always one more than all the rest;
Some model, you see, of the human race,
Moulded by Nature, the mother of all,
Fashioned and fitted for some high place.

There was Washington—take for example him:
And old Napoleon, the hoast of France;
England's Wellington, stern and grim—
Men not made by a freak of chance,
But to come right down to the present day,
There's Grant, for instance, now where can you find
A man for President fitter than he?
Or so is seems at least to my mind.

When the war had lasted for four long years,
With little hope of a speedy end,
And thousands of eyes were wet with tears
For the loss of a husband, brother, or friend—
While the town of Richmond still held out,
Publishing wide our sore disgrace,
From the glorious West he took command,
And proved himself the man for the place.

Now that's the drift of my talk, do you see?
If I'm not quite clear it's my fault, that's all:
For every one has their needs'mus be
One man, the right one, to answer the call.
Here we have him in Grant, as we had before,
And it's my opinion he can't well miss;
The people are for him, he's their choice,
So what better proof could there be than this?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1868.

☞ HARPER'S PERIODICALS will be delivered to City Subscribers without extra charge.

PARTY TERRORISM.

A THOUSAND-FOLD more important to the welfare of this country and to the liberty than the removal of any President, for any offence whatever, is the conscientious discharge of duty by Senators. Every spirit, inflamed into ferocity, lost to reason and the moral sense, is the perpetual menace of free institutions. We are at this moment seeing it in its worst aspect. The spirit of national interest and concern has suddenly changed. It is not whether the President shall be removed—it is whether public order can be found.

Our history has given us the most fearful and memorable example of the perils of party-spirit in the career of the Democratic party, beginning with the idea of the rights of man, and ending in a desperate struggle to overthrow the best of governments for the purpose of perpetuating human slavery. The party hatred was the only rule of action allowed, and the party order was issued by the most unscrupulous of party leaders. "I would vote," said one of the Democratic orators, "for the Devil himself if he were the regular nominee." The party drill was marvelous. The rule of the Democratic party became almost a tradition. There were those who really supposed that any effort to throw off its supremacy was hopeless. In 1856 Mr. SEWARD made a speech at Detroit, one of the few that he made during the FREMONT campaign, in which he showed in startling detail the absolute possession of every part of the Government by the Democratic party and its policy. Every little rural Northern and Western Post-office was an outpost of Slavery, which was then the Democratic party policy. Every Custom-house both was a point of advantage for it. Every contest for both Houses of Congress was controlled by it. Unquestioning fidelity to it was the tenure of national office every where. All the patronage, and prestige, and habit of the Government were with the Democratic party and its policy. Men, it was reluctantly thought by many, must always as a mass be ignorant, and their moral sense must be stupid. Trade also is timid, and we are an enormously trading and prosperous people. Moreover, there are constitutional doubts and technicalities, and what on earth can you do with millions of foreign and degraded slaves? So the Democratic party and its policy of Slavery seemed to be as firmly fastened upon the country as the Old Man of the Sea upon Sinbad's shoulders.

But in 1848 the break had begun. Democrats of strong conviction grew restive under the party position. They would not be yoked to fetch and carry for slavery, and protested that they would not submit to a party rule that preferred the mere interests and the interested whims of certain leaders to honest independence of thought. These men left the party, and took with them its hereditary prestige. From that moment the party policy became even more violent, and unreasonable, and inhuman. The extreme Southern leaders prescribed a still more violent party policy, and the party which, in 1856, was in supreme possession of the Government, in 1860 was thrown out of power, and for four years was engaged in a war of malignant fury upon the Government and its principles; the Southern wing in arms, and the Northern wing embarrassing in every way, as a party, the methods pursued by the Government for its defence.

Any party which is so abandoned to party-spirit as to ostracise and slander those of its friends who honestly differ with it upon point of detail and method, while they sympathize with the great party aims, will necessarily fall to pieces. Parties undoubtedly are essential in a free Government, but nothing every party man must make his choice between one or the other. But there are times when party-spirit is so fierce, and the party leaders so destructive of moral confidence, that a man cannot heartily with neither. And when there are many men who feel so the formation of a new party is at hand.

It is a profound and perilous mistake, made by many citizens, that they must support their party under all circumstances lest the party should lose ground and be beaten. The truth is often the best possible event that can occur. For we must remember that under our system we are in the hands of certain party managers who presume, upon the theory that the best nominations will be supported in any case, to nominate bad and unworthy men. Now, no Government is safe, indeed, where party-spirit is safe, in the hands of bad and unworthy men. And the only way in which the party managers can learn that truth, and understand that honest men will not be driven or cajoled, is to suffer the dishonest men of our own party to be beaten. And what is true of honesty is true of policy. An unwise policy must be criticised in the same way. Otherwise the party leaders will dictate their crude, or furious, or corrupt will as the party policy, and depend upon whipping in the voters by slander, denunciation, and vituperation.

Of course it is often difficult to say what really is the party policy, because there is no universally recognized moral party authority. It is generally held in this country that the platform of a national convention is the standard of party faith. But between the assembly of such conventions there is generally no authoritative policy which is accepted as a party measure. Such, for instance, were the Civil Rights Bill and the Reconstruction Bill. Not even ever the authority may be the tone of the party can be maintained only by the individual independence of the members. For them only such measures as are sure to command the assent of the whole are likely to be proposed, and only such men are honest and capable to be nominated. It was said of Lord CHATHAM that it could not count upon its own members in a pinch, and that it had no daring. This was scarcely to say that it was partly composed of men who valued conscience and country more than party. You could not count upon such men if the Devil were the regular nominee, and party managers did not dare to propose what might be repugnant to many partisans. In a certain way the charge of timidity was true. The Whigs did not dare to adopt a strong anti-slavery policy, and went to pieces. But the Democrats did dare to adopt a strong slavery policy, and were equally destroyed. Mere daring is cheap. The important point is not to dare to do, but to dare to do right.

This country is now undergoing one of its severest trials in the effort to break the individual conscience by party terrorism. But as we show elsewhere there are enough sagacious and influential members of the party to protest against so fatal a course, and to prevent the party of liberty from destroying by general consent the most sacred and essential rights of free citizens of a free nation.

THE DECISION.

THE vote upon the eleventh article shows that the President will be acquitted. The adjournment until after the Chicago Convention was doubtless for the purpose of obtaining a solemn demand of the people from the authorized representatives of the party throughout the country assembled in Chicago. If this were the purpose, it seems at present to fail.

Suppose it to be successful. Suppose the Chicago Convention to insinuate, with the Tribune, that the Republican Senators who vote according to their convictions are infamous scoundrels who have been bought with money; or with the Philadelphia "boys in blue," to resolve that "JAMES W. GRIMES, WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN, and LYMAN TRUMBULL, purporting to represent the loyal people of the United States, as well as Iowa, Maine, and Illinois, prompted by malice, jealousy, and Democratic zeal, perhaps baser motives which we blush to name, have conspired together to place the Government, which we have saved from her armed foes, absolutely at the mercy of its rebel enemies; that such a crime is far more heinous than the surrender of an outpost to the enemy, and no punishment would be adequate to their detestation of the three recreants who are to-day branded with an infamous notoriety: and that it is far better to have died, as Senator HOWARD was willing to do, than to have survived in the countenance thus to live a degraded outcast and friendless like JAMES W. GRIMES, WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN, and LYMAN TRUMBULL." Suppose this kind of resolution passed by the Chicago Convention and sent to each Republican Senator. Suppose that thereupon Senators GRIMES, TRUMBULL, FESSENDEN, HENDERSON, VAN WINKLE, and FOWLER vote for conviction upon every article, and the President consequently to be removed. Would the decision have any moral force? Would the Republican Party have strengthened itself? Would the Senators mentioned be more worthy of respect, or would they be more respected than they are now? Would such a decision justly excite the admiration of the world and the contempt of history?

Or suppose that, refusing to perjure themselves directly, these Senators resign and withdraw, thus securing the conviction of the President, what is that but a shrinking from duty which is really indirect perjury? They have sworn to do justice according to conscientiously, and they recoil from it because of intimidation, and recoil in a manner which, by their action, procures a result which they believe to be contrary to law and subversive of justice. Can they escape their own condemnation or hope to elude that of those who look to them to stand fast at all costs for the sacred freedom of the Senate, and for judicial integrity?

We observe that EX-GOVERNOR ISRAEL WASHBURNE, of Maine, at a meeting in Portland, in speaking of the impeachment, asked—with perfect courtesy, however—whether it might not be possible that one man was wrong and seven-by-five thousand men right? Surely Mr. WASHBURNE upon reflection will see that he has not fairly stated the situation. Is Mr. FESSENDEN the mouth-piece of seventy-five thousand men of Maine, or is he sworn judge in a particular case? Is he merely in this matter a representative of the men of Maine who are hostile to the President, or is he a representative of the States under oath to decide according to the evidence? Does not Mr. WASHBURNE see that when we resolved to resort to impeachment we announced that the guilt of the President as a political or party measure, and aimed to accomplish it by judicial methods? We engaged ourselves in honor to abide by those methods; and, if, fearing that they may prove successful, we attempt to coerce the court, we degrade our cause and rob our success of all its meaning.

The Chicago Convention will have adjourned when this paper is issued. The pressure upon it will be enormous to put the party in a false position. But we believe that there will be good men enough among its members to reflect that some victories cost too dear. A verdict extorted by a pistol held at the head of the judge is not very valuable. Should this truth be forgotten in the heat of the crisis, should the counsel of passionate rather than of sensible men prevail, and the Convention pass a resolution of censure upon the Republican Senators, who are unable to believe that Mr. STANTON stands within the Tenure-of-Office Act, we shall regard it as the expression of a momentary frenzy which the party themselves will some day most profoundly regret, and which will not be justified by the feeling of the most truly intelligent and earnest Republicans.

But the duty of the Senators, with whom we indeed differ, will be only the plainer. They must follow their sincere convictions, conscious that in so doing they maintain the only permanent principle of a free government; and their task will be the more difficult because they will maintain it against the cry of the party which is its natural protector.

THE OATH AND THE EVIDENCE.

DURING the unparalleled excitement over the result of the Impeachment it has been asserted that true statesmanship requires the removal of the President, and that true statesmen would not go mousing about to see exactly what their oaths demand. Impeachment, it is said, and the word is used as meaning conviction and removal, is not only constitutionally just and peace. So it is, if it be lawfully accomplished, not otherwise. The assertion as made assumes one thing, that when a President is obnoxious to the party in power and a majority of a vote of two-thirds, he should be removed. This may be advisable. The liberties of the citizen are, no doubt, safer under such a system as they are under ours. But that is not the question. It is not our system, and it can not be made so without the destruction of the peculiar safeguards which are in great measure the excellence of our system.

We have been earnest advocates of Impeachment. It seems to us that the President has deliberately violated the law, and under the circumstances it is clear to us that no good intention can be inferred. The precedent of his offense is perilous, and we think that the necessary facts are established that the President has committed the offense which the Constitution contemplates in providing for impeachment, and that he ought therefore to be removed.

But we are not the official judges—our party is not the official judge—and still less are the official accusers the judges. The Constitution provides the judges, and they take an especial oath. But they do not sit as judges upon the President's political conduct. Their oath expressly forbids them to do that by binding them to render a judgment according to the evidence offered upon specific charges. If those charges are loosely drawn, or if they are drawn so that, if they are unsupported by evidence, it is the accusers not the judges who are responsible. If the accusers have been too hasty, if they have taken counsel of passion instead of reason, it is they, not the judges, who have been in error.

That ANDREW JOHNSON has betrayed the party that elected him, that he has shamefully perplexed and delayed reconstruction, that he is virtually in alliance with those who hope to defeat the legitimate consequences of the war, and is, therefore, an enemy to the peace of the Union, we have never doubted, and have always steadily maintained. But the intelligence of the Republican party, though acknowledging all this, yet held that impeachment upon the general fact of his delaying and perplexing reconstruction was inexpedient. The House of Representatives, by an immense Republican majority, ratified this view. But when the President attempted the removal of Mr. STANTON it was felt that he had now committed such an act as would justify the solemnity of Impeachment, and the same House, by a unanimous vote of the party, impeached.

But why did not this wait until this particular action? Because they knew that there was but one constitutional method of removing the President, and that was by a judicial investigation of specific charges to be accepted by evidence; the Managers, upon the part of the House, being the prosecuting counsel; the President's lawyers, the defence; and the Senate, with the Chief Justice presiding, "impartial as truly" the impeachment. It is not the Senate, as a legislative or political body, that so sits, but the Senate as a court of judicature specially sworn to decide upon certain charges according to the evidence; not according to "statesmanship," not according to its conviction of the political offence of the President, not according to its view of party exigencies or of political necessities, but according to the evidence. If, in the judgment of the Senators, the evidence be insufficient, if the specific charges are not honestly proved, they are bound by every consideration of justice and honor and the public peace to vote for acquittal accordingly. If they should decide that although the evidence, according to which they were sworn to judge, was insufficient, yet that they would find it in the President's party because it was bad enough to have done what was charged, they would be guilty of the plainest perjury, and every public person would see as much impeached in their hands as in those of the President, whom they would convict against their oaths.

The theory that impeachment or conviction is statesmanship, and not law, condemns that perjury is a virtue. The removal of the President may, indeed, be justice and peace, but his removal by conviction is neither justice, and his exclusion by a false verdict is not peace. A Senator who is sworn to find according to the evidence, but who disregards the evidence and convicts upon a general dissatisfaction with the President, renders a false verdict, and removes him by unjust means; and if he yields to the clamor of his party, and deliberately prostitutes his sincere conviction to popular dictation, he not only fatally disgraces himself, and demoralizes the public conscience, but he becomes a false citizen.

If the Constitution meant that a two-thirds vote of the Senate should remove the President, it would say so. But when it provides that he shall be removed only after proper trial and the presentation of evidence upon distinct charges against which he may defend himself, it forbids his removal in any other manner whatever. The moment, therefore, that party coercion of the Senate is attempted, every man who believes that our system is in nothing wiser than in this very point, will resist the attempt to overthrow it. The process of Impeachment is a foolish and cumbrous farce if the Senate may remove the President without proved charges; and if it can not, although party threats and the vilest vituperation may rain a Senator politically, and may even hurl him by the mental strength to which they subject him, yet they can not make the evidence more conclusive, and they can not absolve him from his oath to decide according to the evidence alone.

POLITICS AND STOCK SPECULATIONS.

Most brokers and stock-jobbers have promised themselves an unusual amount of business the coming season, to grow out of fluctuations in the market occasioned by the excitement of the Presidential canvass and other disturbing causes. They allotted upon the decision of the High Court of Impeachment to create no little speculative activity; and they now turn their eyes anxiously toward the Republican Convention at Chicago, to catch, if possible, some inkling of the results to follow its deliberations. All the vital questions of finance and political economy depend so nearly upon the decisions of that august representative body that they can not remain unaffected by its action. Then there is some anxiety to know what course President Johnson will pursue—whether his administration, during the brief remainder of his term, will be more in accord with the common sentiment of Congress and the country, or whether he will attempt to provoke new issues, to the great public detriment; whether he will retain his present Cabinet, or appoint new, reliable, and more acceptable advisers, in whom all parties may have confidence.

Besides these queries, which naturally occupy the minds of those whose pockets are especially sensitive to disturbing influences, there are minor questions which are equally potent to affect the gold and stock markets. It is important to know whether or not Secretary McCulloch will be a successful seceder, and whether his policy is to be changed; whether or not there is to be any further inflation of the currency or extensive sales of gold; what is to result from the caprice of the two mighty Railroad Kings who have combined their forces and now hold powerful sway on Change; what the cliques are to do who are holding stocks at inordinate and fictitious prices; what, in a word, is to come of the thousand and one supposable cases that may happen in the course of the summer to turn the price of gold, or direct the golden tide that alternately flows from purse to purse.

We don't think the mercantile world is as nervous upon these points as the brokers are. Hitherto, general trade has not been greatly interfered with by the quarrel between Congress and the President, and we see no reason to regard to the result of the impeachment trial. The summer season is always dull, and the one approaching will not differ materially from its predecessors. Experiment has taught us not to gather too much alarm from the threatening attitude of mere politicians. We are not to apprehend war on the Fisheries question, nor repudiation, nor factious strife, nor any of those evils which are so often presaged by political birds of ill omen. There must arise causes less superficial than now appear if we are to suffer serious calamity. The banks are in position of tolerable strength; and the money-market is comparatively easy, with the prospect of greater ease before the middle of summer. Nor do we think that the brokers and stock speculators are to reap any richer harvests than the mercantile community. They may succeed in taking enough money to buy a square meal daily, which is as much as they have done for three years, save when the spirits of Drew or Vanderbilt came down in pity to stir up the "pools" around which the halt and the maimed continually hover. But their chances for realizing large sums are very difficult. Their calculations failed on the impeachment question, and will probably do so in other instances.

It is true that the acquittal of President Johnson has created a profound sensation both at home and abroad; but its effect has been rather to quiet the country than disturb it. It appears to be soon accepted with favor by all parties except the extreme Radicals. What the country needs is rest and peace. It is better to allow strife time to unnecessarily create grounds for strife. We wish to be relieved of this long-continued and unbearable suspense. We wish to see such a platform adopted at Chicago as will put at rest forever the vexed questions of suffrage, tariff, repudiation, reconstruction, and the rest. We wish to see some definite policy adopted, upon which all loyal and conservative men can harmoniously unite —something looking more to the best interests of the country than those of mere party. If such a platform could be drawn up, it would not only elect the Republican candidate by a large majority, but insure a return of prosperity and business activity, with large profits not only to the brokers of Wall Street but to all departments of trade and commerce. As for merely speculative gains, which grow out of popular mistrust and general derangement, we hope and believe that the day for them has passed. If peace will only spread her wings over the land, we can not how much stock-gambling will carry with the vexation of disappointment.

PARTY GOOD SENSE.

We are very glad to record that there are many of the most influential of the Republican journals which condemn the late mean effort at partisan dictation of the verdict in the Impeachment trial.

The Providence Journal, speaking for the Rhode Island Senators, said, "They will alike scorn with indignation the base imputation implied in the telegram quoted above [General Sherman's] that they are capable of prostituting the tempting justice to which they are solemnly pledged, under any amount of pressure from 'resolutions, letters, and delegations.'"

The Chicago Tribune declared with perfect truth: "A party can always afford to take the consequences of the conscientious performance of a judicial duty."

The Boston Advertiser said of Mr. Fessenden: "We are bound to concede his right to judge for himself, and to respect his exercise of the right."

The Hartford Courant, edited by Ex-Governor Hawley, one of the truest of Republicans, said: "When such lawyers, men of honor, and sound Republicans as Sherman and Fessenden, pronounce against the articles as they are drafted, and under a law whose construction admits of doubt, we are not going to join in denouncing them as traitors to their party. The Chicago Post remarks: "The effect of his impeachment and deposit, if secured by partisan effort, would be a greater calamity than any that he can inflict. No man can calculate the consequences of such a blow at the permanence of our institutions."

The Bridgeport (Connecticut) Standard says: "Not only are we prepared to receive with entire equanimity that verdict whatever it may be, but we trust that when it is recorded, for the information and benefit of ourselves and of future years, the record may be an everlasting witness that full and impartial justice has been done."

The Cincinnati Commercial also very truly remarks: "The Republican party is strong; but it can not afford to drive out as traitors all who disagree with the opinions that are most noisily expressed by the most excitable of its members."

It is a matter of congratulation also, that the Union League Club of New York again exposed themselves to the peril of public denunciation by Mr. Greeley as "blockheads and dunces," by refusing to pass resolutions denouncing eminent Republican Senators as Benedict Arnolds and Judas Iscariots because they faithfully observed their oath as judges. The President, they say, in their resolutions for its wisdom and temper and very pregnant allusion, remarked that "those, who, during the three years' anti-Slavery struggle, have contended with Milton for 'the right to know, to utter, and to argue freely above all liberties,' are not likely to deny to others, especially when acting under the sanction of an oath, an equal freedom."

These are all indications that the sober sense of the party condemns as strongly as a flagrant offense against common decency, but as a serious blunder in party tactics, such attempts as that of General Sherman's telegram of the New York Tribune, and of Senator Sherman's Secretary's resolutions to overawe the Senate of the United States in the discharge of a judicial duty.

RESTORATION.

By a vote of 108 yeas to 35 nays the House of Representatives has admitted the States of North and South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama, to representation in Congress upon condition that their Legislatures ratify the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and that there shall never be any discrimination in the right of voting in those States for the loyal any citizen or class of citizens of the United States. The representatives are to be admitted whenever the President shall proclaim the adoption of the amendment by the State Legislatures, and it is made his duty to do it within ten days after receiving official information of the fact. There was a motion to except Alabama from this bill upon the ground that she had not conformed to the act of March 2, 1867, as the preamble states. But the motion was defeated, and although the Constitution of Alabama has not received a vote of a majority of the registered voters, it is now the fundamental law of the State. The requirement of such a majority was undoubtedly a mistake. But it was nevertheless a condition of the law, and to declare that it has been observed is no less a mistake. It is an unnecessary untruth.

With that exception there is no doubt that the Constitutions of the States in question are more truly Republican, and are adopted by a more general consent of the people, than any Constitutions these States have ever had. They are not widely different, as we have heretofore shown, from the Constitutions of most of the States; and with resolute determination the people of the lately disorganized part of the country may rapidly establish their prosperity. The main condition of this result must be their conviction that the principle of reconstruction is settled, and that the whole subject is not to be reopened. Nor can any thing secure this conviction so surely as the election of General Grant by an overwhelming majority. Just as the re-election of Lincoln in 1864 was the condition of a real peace, so is the election of Grant in 1868. Had the Democrats been able to carry the country four years ago, the national disaster would have been unspeakable. Could they succeed now, the calamity would be immeasurable. All the elements of hostility to the Union, or equal rights, to the national honor; all the instincts of ignorance, of the hatred of race, and of class privilege, are combined under the name of Democracy. The candidate of the Democratic Convention of 1868 will bear the standard of a most perilous reaction.

If we would enable the States, that after their desperate struggle by arms are now restored to the Union, to become safe and thrifty members of the family, we must show them by the triumphant election of Grant that war, not peace, prevailed, and that their "cause" is not only a lost, but a hopelessly lost cause.

MURDER IN A MASK.

We have so seldom of late found occasion to praise the action of the Secretary of State that we observe with peculiar pleasure that he has asked the recall of the two attachés of the Foreign Legation who were concerned in the murder of Mr. Lamarche, the Minister of the United States to Costa Rica; and we understand that he has also signified to that gentleman that his resignation would be promptly accepted. It is quite time that the Government should express in its special action the better feeling in regard to the barbarism of dueling. The code which prevails in this country under the shade of the peculiar views of social honor that spring from the system of slavery. But the same code practiced in Europe removed it, in the light of our intelligence and civilization, very little from murder. The possible advantage of a system of summary and possibly fatal retribution against an unbridled tongue is more than overborne by the folly of a system which gives the worst of men the right of calling the best to an ordeal which determines nothing but skill in deadly weapons.

It is shameful that this practice has not long ago wholly disappeared before the universal reprobation of intelligent and sensible men, and that the foolish youth who are inclined to resort to it as a settlement of quarrels have not been expelled from honorable society. Pray, if it be unlawful to challenge a man, why is it not also graceful for a man who is a good shot to tweak the nose of one who is not, knowing that a duel is the result? Why should a scoundrel who is a sure shot be allowed to give the lie at his pleasure to one who is not? Yet the practice of dueling gives him that immunity. It is a practice which prevails most among men of the least true honor, and one to which, if intelligent men condescend, they feel it necessary to explain and defend their conduct. It is very properly made a penal offense by modern civilized law, and in requiring the resignation of an officer of the Government who has violated this law, and who may not be a murderer in fact, but is legally guilty of a murder in subject him to legal penalties, the Secretary of State pays a proper tribute to the good sense and moral sentiment of the country.

POLITE LETTERS.

Two or three weeks since, when the World was lecturing the Tribune upon the courtesy of its pages, we quoted from the World its Washington correspondent's personal description of General Butler as an illustration of the practice of a paper that preached so loudly. But the correspondent to say that the Tribune's Washington correspondent has surpassed that of the World in his own direction. In speaking of the appearance of Secretary Stanton on the day after the postponement, the correspondent says:

"Turbuell, Fessenden, and Grimes, 'poor Grimes!' were more conspicuous than ever before. The 'conquering authority' which they had obtained made every stranger ask to have them pointed out to him. They sat alone in their seats. Nobody who had the slightest claim to gentlemanly manners went near them. Can one touch pitch and not be defiled? seemed to be the unanimous sentiment. Grimes curled himself up on his seat, as mean, repulsive, and noxious as a hedgehog in the cage of a traveling menagerie: and so they sat, the target of scoffs, while five hundred longcoates were scanning their faces for some indication in their facial lines of the deep, dark treachery of their hearts. Trumbull smiled, but it was against his look down the of the light, fresh boy—his son it may be—whom he caressed. Fessenden buried himself with his correspondence. Indignant New Englanders asked, What has New England done that she should have such a representative?"

Nothing could be more disgraceful to the character of the press, and nothing, therefore, more fatal to its influence than the manner in which the World has recently spoken of General Butler and the Tribune of the Republican Senators who would not violate their oath. No newspaper deserves to have influence, and among honorable men it will not have it, which personally maligns its political opponents. Sarcasm and ridicule are legitimate weapons. But charges of corruption are not sarcasm, and personal contempt in a grave political debate merely makes him who stoops to it contemptible.

DOMESTIC RESERVE.

"There should be no secrets between man and wife" may be a good general law, but, like many laws, it admits of exceptions. There is a great deal of daily household occurrence which wives who desire—and what good wives do not?—to promote the comfort of their husbands should keep to themselves.

Fagged with the day's work in the bank, the counting-house, the law-office, and the shop, the husband returns to his boiled mutton and turnips, and expects, as he requires, refreshment for body and mind. It is accordingly no little disappointment to him, on entering his kitchen and entering the hall, to meet a sobbing wife, and hear her lugubriously exclaiming, "Oh! my dear! what d'ye think, Bridget has dropped the pan upon the floor?" "Sarve the cook, has burnt a hole in the sauce-pan," or "Anne Eliza, the little wretch, has spiled the lids for the best dress," or "Bonny has burst his trowsers," or "Baby, the darling, was choked until he was black in the face while sapping his pap." These more or less inevitable incidences of every household are not beyond the philosophy of any ordinary wife to bear and her capacity to remedy. Mrs. Smith can not, it might be supposed, expect the sympathy of Mr. Smith to assuage her grief for the rupture of Bobby's trowsers, or his aid or advice in applying the necessary patch. Why should she trouble him with the minutiæ of all the details of the occurrence? He is irritable, perhaps, as most fatigued and hungry men at 6 o'clock are too, are during their very trying half hour before dinner, and wishing a thousand times Mrs. Smith's mournful communications to the ——, finally says so. Here Every one knows, thence that scene and crying, with all other incidents of the usual "domestic scene." Mr. S. faced by Mrs. S. in a perpetual cloud, of course loses all appetite for the mutton and turnips, and next day makes sure of a dinner by taking it at Delmonico's, and don't come home till morning. This soon becomes a habit, and Mrs. S. has at last a real cause for sorrow, about which, however, she is apt to be less communicative. The happiness of a household has often been thus destroyed. It is some frivolous thing which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred is the original cause of domestic anarchy. It would be well for wives to use a little more reserve, and keep the petty annoyances of their homes to themselves. It will be said, of course, that husbands should not be worried by such trifles. Granted; but they are. Until they become wiser the fact will remain, and be worthy of serious consideration.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

The House, on May 14, by a vote of 108 yeas to 35 nays, voted to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Louisiana, and the bill to admit Arkansas are now before the Senate.

NEWS ITEMS.

Mr. Peter Cooper and others are organizing a society for the purpose of devising and executing means to elevate and protect the Indians of the United States and Territories.

Mr. Henry Bergh has been lecturing in favor of horse-flesh food. The Farmers' Club, before whom the lecture was made, while recognizing the old adage that "Every one to his taste," declined to recommending its use on the table of the Club.

The Mississippi Legislature has ratified the 14th article.

The elections are busily making for the tieing of another telegraph cable between Havana and Key West. The Atlantic Steam Ship Company Gettysburg is now engaged in sounding for a cable to connect Panama with the United States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Queen Victoria says she is willing to give up her interests in the Irish Church.

China is not the only Empire which is giving way to the influence of European and American civilization. In opening the British Council of Siam, Mr. Hall Siam said that the time had come when Turkish manners and customs must yield before said influence. The Americans visited.

We are likely to have trouble with Hayti. President Geffrard has fled on board from Cape Haytien and arrived in Port au Prince. He used violent threats to the American and other foreign Consuls, and many Americans were shot at and robbed, being finally compelled to seek shelter at the American Consulate. Some of the citizens were arrested and ordered to be shot. The American Consul sent to Hayti has an American man-of-war and to Jamaica for a British one. The Haytien gunboat Salnave has left for the British Government, immediately sailed from Jamaica to the insurgents. The revolution had spread all over the country, nearly the whole of which is now in actual rebellion against.

IMPEACHMENT—SCENE IN "NEWSPAPER ROW," WASHINGTON, ON THE NIGHT AFTER THE VOTE.—SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 350.]

IMPEACHMENT—REPORTERS AND CITIZENS IN THE SENATE LOBBY SEEKING INFORMATION DURING THE SECRET SESSION.—[SEE PAGE 350.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER II.

"Betteredge!" I said, pointing to the well-remembered book on his knee, "has Robinson Crusoe informed you, this evening, that you might expect to see Franklin Blake?"

"By the lord Harry, Mr. Franklin!" cried the old man, "that's exactly what Robinson Crusoe has done!"

He struggled to his feet with my assistance and stood for a moment, looking backward and forward between Robinson Crusoe and me, apparently at a loss to discover which of us had surprised him most. The verdict ended in favor of the book. Holding it open before him in both hands, he surveyed the wonderful volume with a stare of unutterable anticipation—as if he expected to see Robinson Crusoe himself walk out of the pages and favor us with a personal interview.

"Here's the bit, Mr. Franklin!" he said, as soon as he had recovered the use of his speech. "As I live by bread, Sir, here's the bit I was reading the moment before you came in! Page one hundred and fifty-six as follows:—'I stood like one Thunder-struck, or as if I had seen an Apparition.' If that isn't as much as to say: 'Expect the sudden appearance of Mr. Franklin Blake'—there's no meaning in the English language!" said Betteredge, closing the book with a bang, and getting one of his hands free at last to take the hand which I offered him.

I had expected him, naturally enough under the circumstances, to overwhelm me with questions. But no—the hospitable impulse was the uppermost impulse in the old servant's mind, when a member of the family appeared (no matter how!) as a visitor at the house.

"Walk in, Mr. Franklin," he said, opening the door behind him, with his quaint old-fashioned bow. "I'll ask what brings you here afterward—I must make you comfortable first. There have been sad changes since you went away. The house is shut up, and the servants are gone. Never mind that! I'll cook your dinner; and the gardener's wife will make your bed—and if there's a bottle of our famous Latour claret left in the cellar, down your throat, Mr. Franklin, that bottle shall go. I bid you welcome, Sir! I bid you heartily welcome!" said the poor old fellow, fighting manfully against the gloom of the deserted house, and receiving me with the sociable and courteous attention of the by-gone time.

It vexed me to disappoint him. But the house was Rachel's house now. Could I eat in it or sleep in it after what had happened in London? The commonest sense of self-respect forbade me—properly forbade me—to cross the threshold.

I took Betteredge by the arm and led him out into the garden. There was no help for it. I was obliged to tell him the truth. Between his attachment to Rachel and his attachment to me he was sorely puzzled and distressed at the turn that things had taken. His opinion, when he expressed it, was given in his usual downright manner, and was agreeably redolent of the most positive philosophy I know—the philosophy of the Betteredge school.

"Miss Rachel has her faults—I've never denied it," he began. "And riding the high horse, now and then, is one of them. She has been trying to ride over you—and you have put up with it. Lord, Mr. Franklin, don't you know women by this time better than that? You have heard me talk of the late Mrs. Betteredge?"

I had heard him talk of the late Mrs. Betteredge pretty often—invariably producing her as his one undeniable example of the inbred frailty and perversity of the other sex. In that capacity he exhibited her now.

"Very well, Mr. Franklin. Now listen to me. Different women have different ways of riding the high horse. The late Mrs. Betteredge took her exercise on that favorite female animal whenever I happened to deny her any thing that she had set her heart on. So sure as I came home from my work on these occasions, so sure was my wife to call to me up the kitchen stairs, and to say that, after my brutal treatment of her, she hadn't the heart to cook me my dinner. I put up with it for some time—just as you are putting up with it now from Miss Rachel. At last my patience wore out. I went down stairs, and I took Mrs. Betteredge—affectionately, you understand—up in my arms, and carried her, holus-bolus, into the best parlor, where she received her company. I said, 'That's the right place for you, my dear,' and so went back to the kitchen. I locked myself in, and took off my coat, and turned up my shirt-sleeves, and cooked my own dinner. When it was done I served it up in my best manner, and enjoyed it most heartily. I had my pipe and my drop of grog afterward; and then I cleared the table, and washed the crockery, and cleaned the knives and forks, and put the things away, and swept up the hearth. When things were as bright and clean again, as bright and clean could be, I opened the door and let Mrs. Betteredge in. 'I've had my dinner, my dear,' I said; 'and I hope you will find I have left the kitchen all that your fondest wishes can desire.' For the rest of that woman's life, Mr. Franklin, I never had to cook my dinner again! Moral: You have put up with Miss Rachel in London; don't put up with her in Yorkshire. Come back to the house."

Quite unanswerable! I could only assure my good friend that even his powers of persuasion were, in this case, thrown away on me.

"It's a lovely evening," I said. "I shall walk to Frizinghall, and stay at the hotel, and you must come to-morrow morning and breakfast with me. I have something to say to you."

Betteredge shook his head gravely.

"I'm heartily sorry for this," he said. "I had hoped, Mr. Franklin, to hear that things were all smooth and pleasant again between you and Miss Rachel. If you must have your own way, Sir," he continued, after a moment's reflection, "there is no need to go to Frizinghall to-night for a bed. It's to be had nearer than that. There's Hotherstone's Farm, barely two miles from here. You can hardly object to that on Miss Rachel's account," the old man added, slyly. "Hotherstone lives, Mr. Franklin, on his own freehold."

I remembered the place the moment Betteredge mentioned it. The farm-house stood in a sheltered inland valley, on the banks of the prettiest stream in that part of Yorkshire; and the farmer had a spare bedroom and parlor, which he was accustomed to let to artists, anglers, and tourists in general. A more agreeable place of abode, during my stay in the neighborhood, I could not have wished to find.

"Are the rooms to let?" I inquired.

"Mrs. Hotherstone herself, Sir, asked for my good word to recommend the rooms yesterday."

"I'll take them, Betteredge, with the greatest pleasure."

We went back to the yard, in which I had left my traveling bag. After putting a stick through the handle and swinging the bag over his shoulder Betteredge appeared to relapse into the bewilderment which my sudden appearance had caused, when I surprised him in the beehive chair. He looked incredulously at the house, and then he wheeled about, and looked more incredulously still at me.

"I've lived a goodish long time in the world," said this best and dearest of all old servants—"but the like of this I never did expect to see. There stands the house, and here stands Mr. Franklin Blake—and, Damme, if one of them isn't turning his back on the other, and going to sleep in a lodging!"

He led the way out, wagging his head and growling ominously. "There's only one more miracle that can happen," he said to me, over his shoulder. "The next thing you'll do, Mr. Franklin, will be to pay me back that seven-and-sixpence you borrowed of me when you were a boy."

This stroke of sarcasm put him in a better humor with himself and with me. We left the house, and passed through the lodge gates. Once clear of the grounds, the duties of hospitality (in Betteredge's code of morals) ceased, and the privileges of curiosity began.

He dropped back, so as to let me get on a level with him. "Fine evening for a walk, Mr. Franklin," he said, as if we had just accidentally encountered each other at that moment. "Supposing you had gone to the hotel at Frizinghall, Sir?"

"Yes?"

"I should have had the honor of breakfasting with you to-morrow morning."

"Come and breakfast with me at Hotherstone's Farm, instead."

"Much obliged to you for your kindness, Mr. Franklin. But it wasn't exactly breakfast that I was driving at. I think you mentioned that you had something to say to me? If it's no secret, Sir," said Betteredge, suddenly abandoning the crooked way, and taking the straight one, "I'm burning to know what's brought you down here, if you please, in this sudden way."

"What brought me here before?" I asked.

"The Moonstone, Mr. Franklin. But what brings you now, Sir?"

"The Moonstone again, Betteredge."

The old man suddenly stood still, and looked at me in the gray twilight as if he suspected his own ears of deceiving him.

"If that's a joke, Sir," he said, "I'm afraid I'm getting a little dull in my old age. I don't take it."

"It's no joke," I answered. "I have come here to take up the inquiry which was dropped when I left England. I have come here to do what nobody has done yet—to find out who took the Diamond."

"Let the Diamond be, Mr. Franklin! Take my advice, and let the Diamond be! That cursed Indian jewel has misguided every body who has come near it. Don't waste your money and your temper—in the fine spring-time of your life, Sir—by meddling with the Moonstone. How can you hope to succeed (saving your presence), when Sergeant Cuff himself made a mess of it? Sergeant Cuff!" repeated Betteredge, shaking his forefinger at me sternly. "The greatest policeman in England!"

"My mind is made up, my old friend. Even Sergeant Cuff doesn't daunt me.—By-the-by, I may want to speak to him, sooner or later. Have you heard any thing of him lately?"

"The Sergeant won't help you, Mr. Franklin."

"Why not?"

"There has been an event, Sir, in the police-circles, since you went away. The great Cuff has retired from business. He has got a little cottage at Dorking; and he's up to his eyes in the growing of roses. I have it in his own handwriting, Mr. Franklin. He has grown the white moss-rose, without budding it on the dog-rose first. And Mr. Begbie the gardener is to go to Dorking, and own that the Sergeant has beaten him at last."

"It doesn't much matter," I said. "I must do without Sergeant Cuff's help. And I must trust to you, at starting."

It is likely enough that I spoke rather carelessly. At any rate, Betteredge seemed to be piqued by something in the reply which I had just made to him. "You might trust to worse than me, Mr. Franklin—I can tell you that," he said, a little sharply.

The tone in which he retorted, and a certain disturbance, after he had spoken, which I detected in his manner, suggested to me that he was possessed of some information which he hesitated to communicate.

"I expect you to help me," I said, "in picking up the fragments of evidence which Sergeant Cuff has left behind him. I know you can do that. Can you do no more?"

"What more can you expect from me, Sir?" asked Betteredge, with an appearance of the utmost humility.

"I expect more—from what you said just now."

"Mere boasting, Mr. Franklin," returned the old man, obstinately. "Some people are born-boasters, and they never get over it to their dying day. I'm one of them."

There was only one way to take with him. I appealed to his interest in Rachel and his interest in me.

"Betteredge, would you be glad to hear that Rachel and I were good friends again?"

"I have served your family, Sir, to mighty little purpose, if you doubt it!"

"Do you remember how Rachel treated me before I left England?"

"As well as if it was yesterday! My lady herself wrote you a letter about it; and you were so good as to show the letter to me. It said that Miss Rachel was mortally offended with you for the part you had taken in trying to recover her jewel. And neither my lady, nor you, nor any body else could guess why."

"Quite true, Betteredge! And I come back from my travels, and find her mortally offended with me still. I knew that the Diamond was at the bottom of it last year; and I know that the Diamond is at the bottom of it now. I have tried to speak to her, and she won't see me. I have tried to write to her, and she won't answer me. How, in Heaven's name, am I to clear the matter up? The chance of searching into the loss of the Moonstone is the one chance of inquiry that Rachel herself has left me!"

Those words evidently put the case before him as he had not seen it yet. He asked a question which satisfied me that I had shaken him.

"There is no ill-feeling in this, Mr. Franklin, on your side—is there?"

"There was some anger," I answered, "when I left London. But that is all worn out now. I want to make Rachel come to an understanding with me—and I want nothing more."

"You don't feel any fear, Sir—supposing you make any discoveries—in regard to what you may find out about Miss Rachel?"

I understood the jealous belief in his young mistress which prompted those words.

"I am as certain of her as you are," I answered. "The fullest disclosure of her secret will reveal nothing that can alter her place in your estimation, or in mine."

Betteredge's last-left scruples vanished at that.

"If I am doing wrong to help you, Mr. Franklin," he exclaimed, "all I can say is—I am as innocent of seeing it as the babe unborn! I can put you on the road to discovery, if you can only go on by yourself. You remember that poor girl of ours—Rosanna Spearman?"

"Of course!"

"You always thought she had some sort of confession, in regard to this matter of the Moonstone, which she wanted to make to you?"

"I certainly couldn't account for her strange conduct in any other way."

"You may set that doubt at rest, Mr. Franklin, whenever you please."

It was my turn to come to a stand-still now. I tried vainly, in the gathering darkness, to see his face. In the surprise of the moment, I asked a little impatiently what he meant.

"Steady, Sir!" proceeded Betteredge. "I mean what I say. Rosanna Spearman left a sealed letter behind her—a letter addressed to you."

"Where is it?"

"In the possession of a friend of hers at

"'MR. BETTEREDGE,' SHE SAID, WITHOUT TAKING HER EYES OFF ME, 'MENTION HIS NAME AGAIN, IF YOU PLEASE.'"

Cobb's Hole. You must have heard tell, when you were here last, Sir, of Limping Lucy—a lame girl, wife a crutch."

"The fisherman's daughter?"

"The same, Mr. Franklin."

"Why wasn't the letter forwarded to me?"

"Limping Lucy has a will of her own, Sir. She wouldn't give it into any hands but yours. And you had left England before I could write to you."

"Let's go back, Betteredge, and get it at once!"

Too late, Sir, to-night. They're great savers of candles along our coast; and they go to bed early at Cobb's Hole."

"Nonsense! We might get there in half an hour."

"You might, Sir. And when you did get there you would find the door locked." He pointed to a light, glimmering below us, and at the same moment, I heard through the stillness of the evening the bubbling of a stream. "There's the Farm, Mr. Franklin! Make yourself comfortable for to-night, and come to me to-morrow morning—if you'll be so kind?"

"I will go with me to the fisherman's cottage?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Early?"

"As early, Mr. Franklin, as you like."

We descended the path that led to the Farm.

CHAPTER III.

I HAVE only the most indistinct recollection of what happened at Hotherstone's Farm.

I remember a hearty welcome; a prodigious supper, which would have fed a whole village in the East; a delightful clean bedroom, with nothing in it to regret but that detestable principle of the folly of our forefathers—a feather-bed; restless night, with much kindling of matches and many blowings of one little candle; and an immense sensation of relief when the sun rose and there was a prospect of getting up.

It had been arranged overnight with Betteredge that I was to call for him, on our way to Cobb's Hole, as early as I liked—which, interpreted by my impatience to get possession of the letter, meant as early as I could. Without waiting for breakfast at the Farm I took a crust of bread in my hand and set forth, in some doubt whether I should not surprise the excellent Betteredge in his bed. To my great relief he proved to be quite as excited about the coming event as I was. I found him ready and waiting for me, with his stick in his hand.

"How are you this morning, Betteredge?"

"Very poorly, Sir."

"Sorry to hear it. What do you complain of?"

"I complain of a new disease, Mr. Franklin, of my own inventing. I don't want to alarm you, but you're certain to catch it before the morning is over."

"The devil I am!"

"Do you mind an uncomfortable heat at the pit of your stomach, Sir? and a nasty thumping at the top of your head? Ah! not yet? It will by and by, when we get to Cobb's Hole, Mr. Franklin. I call it the detective-fever; and I first caught it in the company of Sergeant Cuff."

"Cuff!" I said, the echo in this instance of to open Rosanna Spearman's letter, I suppose? Come along, and let's get it!"

Early as it was, we found the fisherman's wife astir in her kitchen. On my presentation by Betteredge good Mrs. Yolland performed a social ceremony, which I observed (as I afterwards learned) for strangers of distinction. She put a bottle of Dutch gin and a soupçon of clean pipes on the table, and opened the conversation by saying:

"What news from London, Sir?"

Before I could find an answer to this immensely comprehensive question an apparition appeared toward me out of a dark corner of the kitchen. A wan, wild, haggard girl, with remarkably beautiful hair, and with a fierce keenness in her eyes, came limping up on a crutch to the table at which I was sitting, and looked at me as if I were an object of mingled interest and horror, which it quite fascinated her to see.

"Mr. Blake's nephew," she said, without taking her eyes off me, "I mention his name again, if you please."

"This gentleman's name," answered Betteredge (with a strong emphasis on gentleman), "is Mr. Franklin Blake."

The girl drew her hook on me and suddenly left the room. Good Mrs. Yolland, as I believe, made some apologies for her daughter's odd behavior, and Betteredge (probably) explained them into polite English. I speak of this in complete uncertainty. My attention was absorbed in following the sound of the girl's crutch. Thump-thump up the wooden stairs; thump-thump across the room above our heads; thump-thump down the stairs again—and the person stood the sparation at the open door, with a letter in his hand, beckoning me out!

I left my apologies in course of delivery behind me, and followed this strange creature—hopping on before me faster and faster—down the slope of the beach. She led me behind some boats, out of sight and hearing of the few people in the fishing-village, and then stopped and faced me for the first time.

"Stand there," she said. "I want to look at you."

There was no mistaking the expression on her face. I inspired her with the strongest emotions of abhorrence and disgust. Let me not be vain enough to say that no woman had ever looked at me in this manner before. I will only venture on the more modest assertion that no woman had ever let me perceive it yet. There is a limit to the length of the inspection which a man can endure, under certain circum-tances. I attempted to direct Limping Lucy's attention to some less revolting object than my face.

"I think you have got a letter to give me," I began.

"If it the letter mine in your hand?"

"Say that again," was the only answer I received.

I repeated the words, like a good child learning its lesson.

"No," said the girl, speaking to herself, but keeping her eyes still mercilessly fixed on me. "I can't find out what she saw in his face. I can't guess what she heard in his voice." She suddenly looked away from me, and rested her head wearily on the top of her crutch. "Oh my poor dear!" she said, in the first soft tones which had fallen from her in my hearing. "Oh my lost darling! what could you see in this man?" She lifted her head again fiercely, and looked at me once more. "Can you eat and drink?" she asked.

I did my best to preserve my gravity, and answered, "Yes."

"Can you sleep?"

"Yes."

"Then you see a poor girl in service do you feel no remorse?"

"Certainly not. Why should I?"

She abruptly thrust the letter (as the phrase is) into my face.

"Take it!" she exclaimed, furiously. "I never set eyes on you before. God Almighty forbid I should ever set eyes on you again.

With that parting wrong she turned away from me at the top of her speed. The one interpretation that I could put on her conduct has, to this moment, anticipated by every body. I could only suppose that she was mad.

Having reached that inevitable conclusion, I turned to the more interesting of the two objects upon which was presented to me by Rosanna Spearman's letter. The address was written as follows:—"For Mr. Franklin Blake. To be given into his own hands (and not to be trusted to any one else), by Lucy Yolland."

I broke the seal. The envelope contained a letter: and this, in its turn, contained a slip of paper. I read the letter first:

"SIR,—If you are curious to know the meaning of my behavior to you, while you were staying in the house of my employers, Mr. and Mrs. Verinder, do what you are told to do in the memorandum inclosed with this—and do it without any person being present to overlook you. To be mysterious, ROSANNA SPEARMAN."

I turned to the slip of paper next. Here is the literal copy of it, word for word:

"Memorandum:—To go to the Shivering Sand at the turn of the tide. To walk out on the South Spit, until I get the South Spit Beacon, and the flag-staff at the Coast-guard station above Cobb's Hole in a line. To take care to lay down on the rocks, a stick, or any straight thing to guide my hand, exactly in the line of the beacon and the flag-staff. To take care, in doing this, that one end of the stick shall be at the edge of the rocks, on the side of them which is farthest from the quicksand. To fasten to the stick, among the sea-weed (beginning from the end of the stick which points toward the beacon), the Chain. Then, to dig a hole and bury the Chain, when found, until I come to the part of it which reaches over the edge of the rocks, down into the quicksand. And then to finish the whole."

Just as I had read the last words—underlined in the original—I heard the voice of Betteredge behind me. The inventor of the detective-fever had completely succumbed to that irresistible malady. "I can't make it any longer, Mr. Franklin. What does her letter say? For mercy's sake, Sir, tell us what does her letter say?"

I handed him the letter and the memorandum. He read the first, with an appearing to be much interested in it. But the second—the memorandum—produced a strong impression on him.

"Stop here, Sir, if you please," he said, faintly. "From first to last, Sir, the Sergeant said she had got a memorandum of the hiding-place. And here it is! I'm sure I feel as if I was going, Sir, in the secret that puzzled every body, from the great Cuff downward, ready and waiting, as one may say, to make myself to you. Not that I ask you, Sir, as any body may see for themselves. How long will it be till the turn of the tide?" He looked up, at the rocks, and at the sky, at some little distance from us, mending a net. "Torn mie Bright!" he shouted, at the top of his voice. "I hear you!" Torn shouted back.

"When's the turn of the tide?"

"In an hour's time."

We both looked at our watches.

"We can go round by the coast, Mr. Franklin," said Betteredge, "and get to the quicksand in that way, with plenty of time to spare. What do you say, Sir?"

"Come along."

On our way to the Shivering Sand I applied to Betteredge to revive my memory of events (as affecting Rosanna Spearman) at the period of Sergeant Cuff's inquiry. With my old friend's help I soon had the succession of circumstances clearly presented again in my mind. Rosanna's journey to Frizinghall, when the whole household believed her to be ill in her own room—Rosanna's mysterious employment of the night-time, with her door locked and her candle burning till the morning—Rosanna's suspicious purchase of the japanned tin case and the two dog-chains from Mrs. Yolland—the Sergeant's positive conviction that Rosanna had hidden something at the Shivering Sand, and the Sergeant's absolute ignorance as to what that something could be—all these strange results of the abortive inquiry into the loss of the Moonstone, were clearly present to me again when we reached the quicksand, and walked out together on the low ledge of rocks called the South Spit.

With Betteredge's help I soon stood in the right position to see the Beacon and the Coast-guard flag-staff in a line together. Following the memorandum as our guide, we next laid my stick in the necessary direction, as neatly as we could, on the uneven surface of the rocks. And then we looked at our watches once more.

It wanted nearly twenty minutes yet of the turn of the tide. I suggested washing through this interval on the beach, instead of on the wet and slippery surface of the rocks. Having decided on this, I prepared to sit down: and, greatly to my surprise, Betteredge prepared to leave me.

"What are you going away for?" I asked.

"Look at the letter again, Sir, and you will see."

A glance at the letter reminded me that I was charged, when I made my discovery, to make it alone.

"It's hard enough for me to leave you at such a time as this," said Betteredge. "But she died a dreadful death, poor soul! and I feel a kind of call on me, Mr. Franklin, to humor that fancy of hers. Besides," he added, confidentially, "there's nothing to be taken against your letting out the secret afterward. I'll hang about in the far plantation, and wait till you pick me up. Don't be longer than you can help, Sir. The detective-fever isn't an easy disease to deal with, under these circumstances."

With that parting remark he left me.

The interval of expectation, short as it was when reckoned by the measure of time, assumed formidable proportions when reckoned by the measure of suspense. This was one of the occasions on which the invaluable habit of smoking becomes especially precious and consolatory. I lit a cigar, and sat down on the slope of the beach.

The sunlight poured its unclouded beauty on every object that I could see. The exquisite freshness of the air made the mere act of living and breathing a luxury. Even the lonely little fishing-village, with a slow curve of desert loneliness; and the bared wet surface of the quicksand itself, glittering with a golden brightness, had the interest of all things known from under a passing smile. It was the finest day I had seen since my return to England.

The tune to smoke my cigar before my cigar was finished. I saw the preliminary heaving of the Sand, and then the awful shiver that crept over its surface—as if some agony of terror had just moved and shuddered in the fathomless deeps beneath. I threw away my cigar and went back again to the rocks.

My directions in the memorandum instructed me to feel along the line traced by the stick, and, beginning with the end which was nearest to the beacon.

I advanced in this manner more than half-way along the ledge before encountering any thing but the edges of the rocks. An inch or two further on, however, my patience was rewarded. The tips of my fingers, groping under a patch of my forefinger, I felt the chain. Attempting, next, to follow it by touch in the direction of the quicksand, my progress stopped by a thick growth of sea-weed—which had fastened itself into the fissure, no doubt, in the time that had elapsed since Rosanna Spearman had chosen her hiding-place.

It was equally impossible to pull up the sea-weed or to break it. Nothing was left but to mark the spot indicated by the end of the stick which was placed nearest to the quicksand. I determined on using my pocket-knife for this on a plan of my own. My idea was to "sound" immediately under the rock, on the chance of recovering the end of the chain at the point from at which it entered the sand. I took up the stick and knelt down on the brink of the South Spit.

In this position I was within a few inches of the surface of the quicksand. The sight of it was not inviting. Every now and then, at intervals by its hideous shivering fit, shook my nerves for the moment. A horrible fancy that the dead woman might appear on the surface, and point to the hidden spot, made me, at intervals, conscious of a sensation of an unutterable dread of seeing her rise through the heaving surface of the sand and point to it. I got rid of this idea as soon as it entered my mind, and turned me cold in the warm sunlight. I own I closed my eyes at the moment when the point of the knife touched the quicksand.

The instant afterward, before the stick could have been submerged more than a few inches, I was free from the last of my own superstitious terror, and was throbbing with excitement from head to foot. Sounding blindfold, at my first attempt—I felt the chain! I had sounded right! The stick struck the chain.

Taking a firm hold of the roots of the sea-weed with my left hand, I threw myself down over the brink, and felt with my right hand under the overhanging edges of the rock. My right hand found the chain.

I drew it up without the slightest difficulty. And there was the japanned tin case fastened to the end of it.

The action of the water had so rusted the chain that it was impossible for me to unfasten it from the case without breaking the links. Cutting the case between my knees, and exerting my utmost strength, I contrived to draw off the cover. Some white substance filled the whole interior when I looked in. I put in my hand and found it to be—paper.

In drawing out the linen I also drew out a letter crumpled up with it. After looking at the direction, and discovering that it bore my name, I put the letter in my pocket and completely removed the linen. It came out in a thick roll, moulded, of course, to the shape of the case in which it had been so long confined, and perfectly preserved from any injury by the sea.

I carried the linen to the dry sand of the beach, and there unrolled and smoothed it out. There was no mistaking it as an article of dress. It was a night-gown.

The uppermost side, when I spread it out, presented to view innumerable folds and creases, and nothing more. I rubbed the undermost next, and instantly discovered the smear of the paint from the door of Rachel's bondoir!

My eyes remained riveted on the stain, and my mind took me back at a leap from present to past. The very words of Sergeant Cuff recurred to me, as if the man himself was at my side again, pointing to the unanswerable inference which he drew from the smear on the door:

"Find out whether there is any article of dress in this house with the stain of the paint on it. Find out who that dress belongs to. Find out how the person can account for having been in the room, and smeared the paint, between midnight and three in the morning. If the person can't satisfy you, you haven't far to look for the hand that took the Diamond."

The old man's appearance recalled me, the moment I perceived it, to my sense of present things, and reminded me that the inquiry which I had pursued thus far still remained incomplete. I had discovered the smear on the night-gown. To whom did the night-gown belong?

My first impulse was to consult the letter in my pocket—the letter which I had found in the case.

As I raised my hand to take it out I remembered that there was a shorter way to discovery than this. The night-gown itself would reveal the truth: for, in all probability, the night-gown was marked with the owner's name.

I took it up from the sand and looked for the mark. I found the mark, and read—

"Mr. Ezra Jennings."

There were the familiar letters which told me that the night-gown was mine. I looked up from them, before was the sun; there were the glittering waters of the bay; there was old Betteredge, advancing nearer and nearer to me. I looked back again at the letters. My own name. Plainly confronting me—my own name.

"If time, pains, and money can do it, I will lay my hand on the person who stole the Moonstone"—I had left London with those words on my lips. I had penetrated the secret which the unassisted skill of police from which the tags departed upon the first trial—all these seemed to and at our door and victimize Patty.

I was will perhaps smile as you read this; so may I; but true tears shine in my eyes as well. I glance at this sister of mine as she sits with the bright glimmer of her busy needles flashing with consummate patience the most trying orifices in the stockings of the writer. Who but she could make those gaping holes so neat and presentable? You would hardly imagine, from her face, what sort of a person she might be; for the lines are very clear and quiet, the eyes tender, gray, the whole expression that of peace rather than repose—the peace that "passeth all understanding." But then, Patty is forty? If you would characterize with any degree of accuracy, always observe the mouth. My sister's is as sensitive as that of a child—just as eager, just as credulous, as full of faith. But never, never around any child's mouth is such an expression of pathos, of yearning, of hope deferred, of sense of deep suffering patiently borne as stands written in lines of untold faithless about the sweet mouth of this, my elder sister.

You will understand, then, why it was that this little romance in the domestic life of "pennies," and put out their hands, frosty, red as winter apples with the cold, sure that the person would be welcoming. You will understand why it was that people who were sick or in trouble always sent for Patty.

She knew as well as any body that people imposed upon her; but then she liked them none the worse for it: the main idea that animated Patty was that of "helping other people along." Let her help you in some way, and she was the obliged party, and felt grateful to you for the privilege. Perhaps these had been at times when her life had held other hopes besides these; a beautiful season, when it was early spring-time with her heart, and when the birds sang, and the violets bloomed in sunlight. The birds had stopped their singing, maybe, and if the violets bloomed, none guessed it was there above a year; none she said nothing of all this neither shall I, except as I must tell the story of what befell us in our quiet home.

It was a very quiet home, in a little country town, where we had always lived. Our house was a rambling, old-fashioned one, and the old-fashioned grates, but what became of the heat it was hard to say; I suppose it all went up the chimney, just where it wasn't wanted. So Patty and I wrapped shawls around ourselves, and made light of the matter. The doors, too, wanted to be re-hung of a cold winter's day; how the draughts came in, biting one's feet! and if it snowed what white flakes would drift in through the cracks, and lodge in the great, barn-like entries! Well, well; this was all very healthy, laughed we; plenty of fresh air, at all events.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This philosophy answered the purpose until one afternoon—I sha'n't say one unlucky afternoon, because that's a bad expression, and, besides, the sequel proved otherwise. One afternoon, then, I let Patty proceed alone to the one scene of dissipation in which we permitted ourselves to indulge, viz.: that useful branch of festivity known as the "Dorcas Meeting." I saw her depart with misgivings; it was an uncommon thing for us to be separated at any time, especially on these occasions; but how could I help myself? Marian, our plump little maid-of-all-work—a misnomer in this instance, as Patty and myself did all the work worth speaking of—had been sent for—wanted at home. There were various odds and ends to be attended to, so, as I was the youngest, I got the reticule, put in thimble, scissors, etc.—I always attended to these small items—and dispatched Patty to the field of action. If I had dreamed for a moment what the result would be!

Patty came home from the meeting a trifle earlier than usual, and with her bonnet edged a little bit to one side, as if it had been put on in a fit of desperation; just as a man, under similar circumstances, claps his hat close down over his eyes.

"Elizabeth, I've done it!" was her exclamation, as she entered.

"Done what, Patty?"

"I expect you'll be amazed."

"Patty, you haven't gone and invited that Dorcas Society to meet here? I can't—I won't believe that!"

"Elizabeth, that's exactly what I have done; and now, all that's left to us is to make the best of it."

I was simply confounded. For a space silence reigned; then I opened a solemn battery, as follows:

"Patty, have you considered that we want a new stair-carpet, that we haven't chairs enough, or plates enough, or cups enough? Have you considered that the back-room up stairs hasn't any carpet at all on it, good, bad, or indifferent?"

"I've been expecting all the time we should have been able to buy one," interpolated my victim.

"All very well, Patty; but the time hasn't come yet when we have had any money to spare, and I don't know when it will! Have you considered that we live in an old barn of a house, with fires that won't warm it, that we've got no rugs in the parlors, and nothing as it ought to be?"

"The parlor carpets are very pretty, though, Elizabeth," said my poor sister, in a voice that quivered.

"But while you were about it, why did you pick out the coldest weather? and why did you select our house after that of Mrs. Rawlins, who is rich, who is splendid, who has every comfort and luxury?" ended I, jumbling every thing together, as women will when they wish to be especially aggravating.

I say I "ended" thus. For the truth was, that as I regarded my sister, I beheld large, round tears, betokening extreme distress, falling down her cheeks.

I made a rush then, threw my arms around her neck, and exclaimed, "Patty, stop crying, and I'll not say a word more. Just tell me how it came about?"

"There was no other place for it—I mean the Society—to meet. And I—and I thought they all looked at me, and in a moment of desperation I said we'd have it, and they all took it up at once."

"Of course, curiosity," I muttered.

Then I grew desperate too, and said, defiantly, "Well, let them come!" as if the members of the said meeting, one and all, were a set of vampires, or ghouls, or dreadful savages of one sort or another.

Then Patty and I sat down and talked the matter over as to the hows and wherefores, so that we might not be disgraced and put to open shame.

Should we set a regular tea-table, or should we pass the tea round? The latter carried the day. It was an innovation, to be sure, for the time-honored custom was, at a given signal from the lady of the house, to proceed in solemn state down stairs to a table set forth with frigid splendor, in its "company" silver, china, etc., which we surrounded in silence—a feminine conclave, without one masculine present to stimulate conversation, or give zest to the meal; in my heart I always sympathize with a man when he declares that he abhors "tea-parties."

This point settled, another difficulty dawned upon us. "Elizabeth, we have no silver."

I stared at Patty, then said, with some degree of bitterness: "You're to blame for that, you know; you would sell the silver—our mother's silver—to pay our father's debts."

"I know it. I had no choice. We are poor enough, but then we are honest. We owe no human creature a farthing—always remember that, Elizabeth."

"Patty, I never could find out who bought that silver."

A grave look came into my sister's eyes, a very gentle flush into her cheek; I knew what she was thinking of when she looked so; or, rather, I always had known heretofore, but I was puzzled now.

"I have sometimes thought," said she, with a quiver in her voice, "that perhaps somebody we knew had purchased it, and that some time or another I should have money enough to buy it back."

"Dear me, that's just like you!" sighed I.

Poor dear Patty! she was always having visions of this kind. She had keen æsthetic tastes, loved the beautiful so dearly. She was all the time illuminating our poverty with the thought of some golden period that should presently arrive, when all her pet ideas could be carried out, and our home made the earthly paradise she would have it become. What beautiful flowers she would have, what charming nicknacks, such as all women love. Oh, it was as good as a novel to listen to her dreamings! No child over a fairy-book ever pictured such delights as Patty. For to us all these things seemed wildly beautiful, because beyond our reach; we could hardly realize that to many people they were everyday matters, nothing heeded, nothing thought of, never worth a moment of thanksgiving to Him who had created this love for the beautiful in the soul made after His own image!

The next day was Sunday. I watched Patty in church, and could see that, notwithstanding the time and place, the Dorcas Meeting was the uppermost thought in her mind. I knew by the wrinkles in her forehead the exact calculation she was making, and as she glanced over at the Rawlins's pew, I knew she was devoutly hoping that the portly figure of Mrs. Rawlins would be absent from the next meeting. For we poor folk all dreaded the splendid Mrs. Rawlins, and wished to steer clear of her, as little minnows try to keep out of the way of the larger fish. Dear me! this magnificent lady might dispatch poor little us at a mouthful—her splendor engulfed every thing as in a maelstrom.

The next day we sat in our back-parlor, striving to be very cheerful; but I think we both felt as if our hearts were freighted with lead, instead of the lively currents that were wont to ebb back and forth.

Patty had just said, "Never mind, Elizabeth, it's always darkest just before day," when the door-bell chirped after a comical fashion it had of its own, and Marian let in the sweetest girl in all the town—Alice Starbright.

The face carried out the name. Surely no star ever gleamed more sweetly upon any wanderer, leading him toward rest and comfort, than did this of Allie's, always smiling, always tender, bright. Ay, even now, though she wore garments of deep mourning. She had lost her father only a month ago, yet for all that the shadow of her grief was suffered to rest upon no other heart—the cross had been sent to her alone, and she bore it with a gentle bravery most beautiful to see.

Patty kissed the lovely girl-face first on one cheek, then on the other, then gave way to me with that light flush on her cheek, and that intent look in her eyes that Allie's coming always brought to her countenance. Allie's father had once upon a time been my sister Patty's lover; and with her to love once was to love always.

"So you're going to have the Dorcas Meeting here?" was Allie's first greeting.

"Yes," we answered, striving to look cheerful with all our might.

"I heard of it last week," continued Allie, laughing.

"Of course," grumbled I; "every thing of that kind travels fast—bad news especially."

Allie laughed again. It wasn't like her to be unsympathetic, but she seemed delighted with that soft, sweet delight she always showed when she was going to make somebody happy.

"Let's see. It's to meet to-morrow afternoon. Cake all made?"

"Yes, indeed," said Patty, with that bright, tender glow on her face she always wore for Allie.

Then she must needs bring a plate of cakes for Allie to taste—crisp, home-made biscuits, such as only Patty could make; crumpets, delicate brown, melting in one's mouth; and frosted sponge-cake.

"These are all fit for a queen," said Allie, tasting, with gusto.

"Yes," cogitated Patty, "the cake will answer, if the rest only matched."

"I've got a favor to ask," said Allie, growing grave all at once. "You're not either of you used to Dorcas Meetings. Now I know just the modus operandi. Aunt Mary is ill, and wants to see you both ever so much. Now you go there in the morning, and don't get back here until the afternoon, just about dusk, say; the people do not come before then, and if I don't have every thing in beautiful order my name's not Alice Starbright!"

At first we declared this to be impossible; but Allie coaxed, and then Patty gave in. I followed suit, for I began to see there was something beneath it all. When she had attained her object, Allie ran away, but I noticed before she went that she nestled close up to Patty, and kissed her many, many times.

The next morning found us on our way to Aunt Mary's. Patty, who was never more at home than when she was going to a sick-room, carried a little brown basket on her arm. How many pilgrimages that little brown basket made in the course of the year! and what comfort it always held for invalids!

The day slipped away, Patty as busy as a bee, setting things to rights, and making Aunt Mary comfortable in every direction, until the shadows began to fall and grow deeper. Then we trudged home again, in a queer mood both of us.

What a sweet face it was that met us at the door—that led us in—and to such a transformation! Wonder of wonders! what did it all mean? In the old-fashioned grates, leaping, dancing fires cracked and sparkled, and before them glowed crimson rugs of softest velvet. In the windows swung moss baskets of trailing creepers and bright-hued blossoms. On the oaken side-board gleamed, most wonderful of all, our mother's silver!

Patty knew it at once. She ran to it, she kissed each separate piece, and gave it a little hug of delight. Then I knew how much it had cost her to part with it, how proud and pure the honor that would let no stain be left upon our father's memory.

Allie drew us to the fire, and, one hand in each of ours, said:

"Dear friends, you will not refuse me the comfort of pleasing you? How dear you both are I can not tell; how dear one of you must ever be to me, I can only show in deeds. Before my father died he told me the story. How dear Patty had been to him; how she was to have been my mother. I think he loved her all through these years. He told me, too, that he had bought the silver, but dared not offer it in his lifetime; he knew Patty too well for that; when he was dead and gone, she would take it from his daughter, and keep it for the father's sake."

By this time Allie and I were both crying. Patty shed no tears, but smiled softly, sweetly, brightly, as the angels may, then held out her arms to Allie Starbright. Allie nestled in them. She had lost her mother years ago, and now that her father had gone, there was no room for empty gossip—Patty could be her mother in very deed and truth.

Perhaps you may ask why Patty and Joseph Starbright, Allie's father, had never got married. I can not tell you; it seems to me that hearts that are dearest in this world are forever held apart. God help us all! how we drift away from those we prize the fondest! Hush! there is no loss even here. Remember, we are only children, the best of us, and what we would soil or mar God puts out of reach for the present. Trustful hearts, we shall have it all back again by-and-by.

The meeting came and enjoyed itself wonderfully, and staid later than it had ever staid at any body's before. The fires warmed the sitting-rooms, the young people played their old-fashioned games with the best grace imaginable, and the dreaded Mrs. Rawlins staid at home.

So, after all the worriment, the cogitations, the tears, the end of Patty's Mistake was unmitigated delight. From henceforward I never mean to worry any more. It's wicked, and a waste of time besides. For there's a best to every worst, and where the shadows fall the thickest it's a sure sign that there the light is brightest!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The report on silk and silk manufactures, by Mr. Elliot C. Cowdin, United States Commissioner to the Paris Exposition, is full of exceedingly interesting facts. The entire report is eminently worthy of a careful reading. Among the topics concisely discussed are the rise and progress of silk industry in the United States, in France, England, and other European countries, as well as in Asia and Africa; the rearing of silk-worms; the state of the silk-worm malady, and the remedies proposed; and various specialties embraced by silk industry in the Exposition, and in practice. By a careful analysis given, it appears that the manufacture of silk, as it exists in countries the most advanced in the art, embraces seven special branches of industry, namely: the rearing of the silk-worms; the filature, or reeling of the silk from the cocoons; the throwing, or spinning of the silk thread; the dyeing of the silk; the preparation of the silk threads for the looms; the weaving of silk goods; the spinning of waste silk.

America can hope to excel in these industries whenever she resolutely wills it, and devotes to them that energy and skill which have placed her in the first rank among nations for certain of her inventions and manufactures. In regard to the spinning and dyeing of the silk, utilizing silk waste, and the automatic weaving of plain stuffs the United States may, without difficulty, make and keep a high position among the more experienced nations of Europe.

In regard to the specialties of rearing the silk-worms, reeling the cocoons into raw silk, and the weaving of figured goods, time will be necessary to obtain the experience requisite to complete success. Yet many sections of the United States have been proved to be admirably adapted to the growth of the mulberry-tree; and there is every reason to hope that the epidemic prevailing among silk-worms in European countries will not extend to our own. The reeling of the cocoons into raw silk constitutes, perhaps, one of the processes the most difficult to teach, and especially in localities wanting in experience in this particular branch of silk industry. The superiority of the French and Italian silks over Asiatic silks is greatly owing to the perfection of reeling. The success of this process depends in a large measure upon the care and watchfulness of the attendant, especially so far as the perfection of the product is concerned. Nevertheless, the country which produces the most skillful and careful spinners of wool and cotton manufactures will not despair eventually of arriving at the successful production of the many kinds of silk goods so clearly within its province.

Though long and patient study will be necessary to produce articles of sufficient novelty and artistic skill to compete with European industry, yet a most successful beginning has been made, and progress is rapid. The prospect is that before long this important industry will be firmly established and diligently prosecuted in many sections of our country.

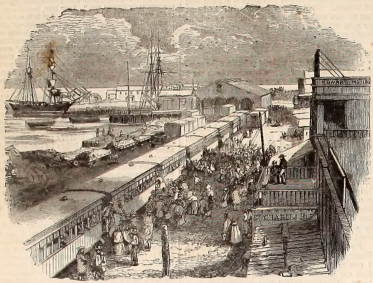
In general, about this time of year, we have ominous croakings from all parts of the land that the fruit crop will be "unusually" meagre—the peach-buds have been nipped by the frost, apples look poorly, pears are blighted, and berries of all kinds winter-killed—are the current rumors. But this year, strange to say, although the season has been backward, a good report is brought from various sections of the country. Strawberries, raspberries, and blackberries bid fair to yield abundantly, only we must be patient for their coming, for the warm days have been shy of appearing thus far. Peaches and apples, as well as other fruit, give fair promise of a good crop.

One of the daily newspapers comments very sensibly upon "The Woman's Club" organized in this city, in connection with the opening speech of its President. Among other things it remarks that there really does not seem to be the least objection to such a club, "except that it appears to us that a club-house open to both ladies and gentlemen would be the more sensible as well as the more delightful institution. It is not for us to obtrude our opinion, but we are inclined to think that a mixed club of men and women, with an elegant house, attractive library, well-appointed reading-room, and a smoking-room at the very top of the building, is rather to be desired than an exclusive society of ladies, from which we sterner creatures are regularly locked out." Very true, indeed—an exceedingly reasonable "opinion." But is it not a little singular that none of the "sterner creatures" above mentioned ever discovered that a "club-house open to both ladies and gentlemen" would be a sensible institution until an exclusive "Woman's Club" was established? If an "elegant house" had been thrown open to women, and they cordially invited to participate in its advantages with the gentlemen, perhaps they would not have taken the trouble to organize a club of their own.

There is now on exhibition in London a "blue horse," which is fourteen and a half hands high, and has no trace of hair on any part of its body. Its skin is smooth and delicate, feeling to the touch like India rubber, and very warm, and forms in curious wrinkles when the animal moves. It is of a purplish gray color over the greater part of the body; its face is buff, and there is a large patch of the same color extending over half the back, with numerous blotches; the tail resembles that of a pig. At a distance it looks as if formed of some variety of rare Oriental marble. It was obtained by a merchant on the Gaboon River, and is about eight years old. When first captured it was entirely blue, with the exception of one foot; but the blue color has gradually diminished since it was brought to England.

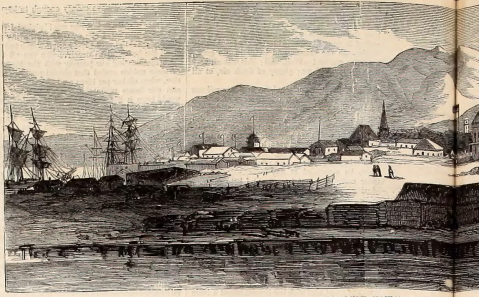
The Memphis Post gives an interesting sketch of an enterprising colored man by the name of Latting, who was born a slave in Chicot County, Arkansas, and is now the owner of nearly nine hundred acres of rich land in that vicinity. When twenty-eight years of age he bought his own freedom and that of his wife for fifteen hundred dollars. Having been allowed to hire his time, he had then accumulated some little money, and in two years was enabled to pay off the entire sum. He then learned the trade of a gin-wright, and at the same time attempted to learn to read. When he had mastered his trade he determined to educate himself, and went to school at Oberlin, Ohio. Having obtained a good business education, he moved to Chatham, Canada West, and bought three farms, in three different townships, besides a house and lot in the village of Chatham. In 1864 he went to St. Louis to hunt up his relatives, having sold most of his real estate. He opened an eating-house in Cairo, in which he made money, and finally bought a valuable plantation near the mouth of the St. Francis River. Mr. Latting is quiet and unassuming, values his word, and pays his debts. His career is certainly a cheering encouragement to every colored man who will be honest, industrious, and enterprising.

A foolish controversy has been going on for two years past in a New England town over a matter originally not exceeding twenty-five cents in value. Fifteen hundred dollars have already been expended in the courts about it, and no prospect as yet of settlement. The parties are said to be church-members, and wealthy; but it would seem from report that religion does not enter into their business relations.



In a discourse recently delivered at the New England Church in this city, upon the practicability of serving God acceptably in the ordinary business of life, the preacher remarked: "The other day a young man told me that one evening after he had started to go to his business he recollected that it was the night appointed for the prayer-meeting. And a contest arose in his mind whether he should go to his place of business and serve the world, or to the prayer-meeting and serve Christ; but at length he concluded to go to the prayer-meeting. Perhaps this young man was right, in this instance, to attend the prayer-meeting. It is often right to go to the prayer-meeting. But one thing is certain, if your business is serving the world, and attending the prayer-meeting is serving Christ, and the two are continually interfering, you need either to apply yourself to recasting your business until it harmonizes with your religion, or else to remodel your conception of religion until its exercises shall aid and strengthen you in the duties of your business."

From recent reports it appears that there are now about 17,000 pupils gratuitously educated in the municipal schools of Naples. In 1861 only 3000 were thus educated.

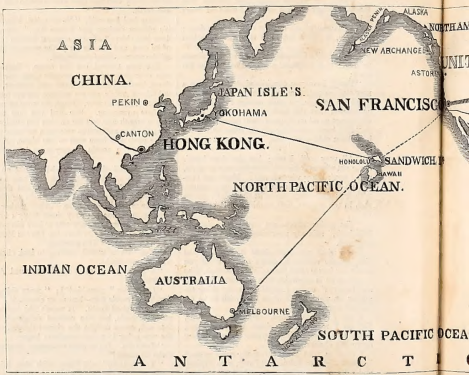


Although great natural advantages are afforded in the United States by the vast area of unoccupied land and the variety of flower blossoms, yet comparatively nothing has been done in the matter of distilling perfumes from flowers grown on American soil. In Italy, Greece, and Sicily large tracts of land are given up to the exclusive cultivation of flowers of all varieties, from which the manufacturers of perfumery in Paris and London procure the delicate and aromatic odors which give the desired staple bouquet to their dainty distillations. These extensive flower farms of Southern Europe furnish employment for thousands of persons, especially women, and annually net thousands of dollars to the cultivators. But in this country, as a general thing, all the ingredients used in the manufacture of perfumery are imported. Perfumers complain that there is no sale for articles which are known to be manufactured here, although often they are better and cheaper than those offered to the general public in large European cities. So foreign bottles are imported in many cases, and filled with home distillations. Yet there are a few American firms which are prominent as manufacturers, and their colognes and other perfumes have become justly celebrated. With fine, imported ingredients the American manufacturer guarantees to produce articles in every way equal to those in the French and English market. And it is understood that distillation from our own flowers is a matter under consideration, and to a limited extent experiments are being tried. As we have blossoms wholly unknown in Europe, strange and delightful essences might be the result of careful experiment.

A Paris restaurant has obtained a rarity in the shape of edible nests from China. The nests are quite white, take their owners two months to build, and cost about a franc each in China. They are gathered twice a year, and taken away before the eggs are deposited. About thirty millions are annually exported.

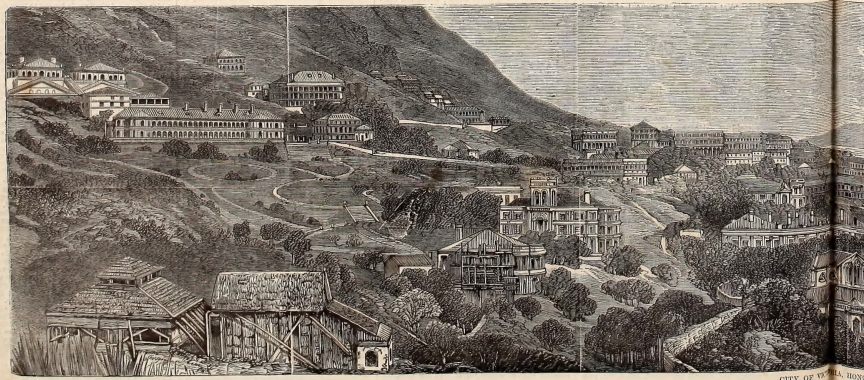
Much more capital is invested by New York merchants in foreign fruits and nuts than is generally supposed. These commodities come to us in all shapes from all parts of the world. The best raisins come from Malaga; which place also sends us lemons and figs. Sicily also produces lemons, and Smyrna and Naples produce figs. Oranges come from Sicily and the West Indies. The best dates come from Africa, though a few are brought from Arabia. Olives come from Spain and France. Spanish olives are regarded as the best. Prunes come from France and Turkey. Pine-apples, pomegranates, bananas, and cocoa-nuts come from the West Indies. The best pecan nuts are brought from Texas; and pea-nuts from Africa, Virginia, and the Carolinas. Filberts come from Naples, Barcelona, and Sicily, and South America sends us Brazil nuts. Languedoc and Spain produce almonds for our market. The best are what are termed "Princess paper shells." The so-called English walnuts come from France and Italy. Currants are brought from the Grecian Isles; and it is said that raisins and currants are imported in larger quantities than any other foreign fruits.

ASPINWALL, NEW GRANADA, CENTRAL AMERICA.



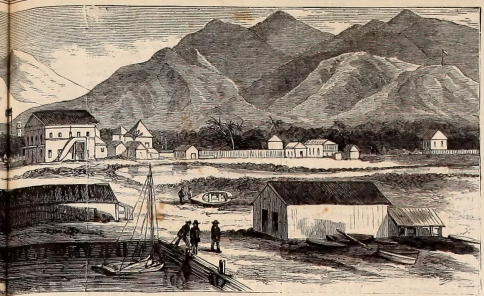
HONOLULU, HAWAII, SANDWICH ISLANDS

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS OF NEW YORK.

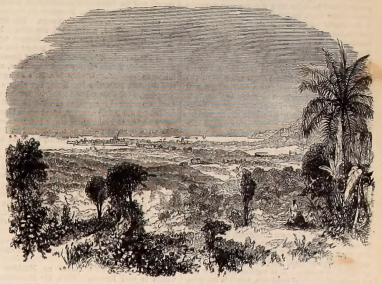


THE union of the Oldest Empire and the Youngest Republic—the richest of uncivilized and the most enterprising of civilized nations—is almost a fact accomplished by the peculiar diplomatic relations established through the agency of Hon. ANSON BURLINGAME and the commercial changes daily occurring in consequence of the extension of the Pacific Railroads. These and other events have been for some time past combining to bring the people of China and the East and America into freer and more intimate diplomatic and commercial relations. And some of these events are tending, also, to extend and increase the importance of our relations with Europe. The United States have become the great highway between Western Europe and Eastern Asia; and New York is rapidly becoming the "world's great mart"—the centre of the commercial world. Our own vast empire

SNOW SHED ON THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.



MAP OF THE WORLD ON MERCATOR'S PROJECTION, SHOWING THE GEOGRAPH



CITY OF VICTORIA, HONG

COMMERCIAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL RELATION OF NEW YORK TO EUROPE AND ASIA. WITH VIE

ISLANDS.—[SKETCHED BY R. B. LIVINGSTON.]

PANAMA, NEW GRANADA, CENTRAL AMERICA.

rapidly increasing in population and developing in wealth, natural commerce, manufactures, and agriculture; indeed, it is becoming apparent that the whole Pacific coast must soon become ours, thus extending our actual territory. The immigration to the Pacific coast of the United States from China and India bids fair to rival that to its Eastern borders from Europe; and at this moment there are 10,000 Chinese laborers actively engaged on the Pacific Railroad in bringing their country nearer to our own. In two years more, it is safe to say, New York will be within 26 days of Hong Kong, thus establishing a route for trade and travel shorter by more than a fortnight than the swiftest route now existing, that by way of Aspinwall and Panama.

In view of the increasing importance of our new diplomatic arrangements and the revolutionizing of our commercial relations with China and the East, we have given on this page an outline map of a portion of the world, showing at a glance the relation

OGRAPHICAL RELATION OF NEW YORK AND THE REST OF THE UNIVERSE.

SURVEYING FOR THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD IN HUMBOLDT PASS.

HONG KONG, CHINA.

H VIEWS OF HONG KONG, HONOLULU, ASPINWALL, PANAMA, AND ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

which New York bears in regard to distance and geographical position with the great commercial cities of our East, Europe, and West, Asia. By it the reader will perceive that we are really in the centre of the universe, the "half-way" house between either extreme of the same continent. New York is about 10,000 miles from Hong Hong by way of San Francisco overland, while it is over 19,000 by way of Australia; and London by its shortest route is at least 17,000 miles from the same point. An examination of the map will suggest other comparisons all going to show that the present metropolis of the United States is destined to be the commercial centre of the world.

As of interest in this connection we have surrounded this map with views of Aspinwall and Aspinwall on the present route to China; views on the railroad across the continent, and a large view of Hong Kong while on another page will be found also a portrait of Mr. BURLINGAME.

ASPINWALL AND PANAMA.

Aspinwall owes its existence to the railway company, by whom it was founded, with the sanction of the Government of New Grenada, fourteen years ago. It is situated in the Bay of Colon, and the harbor, or roadstead, is frequently called by that name. The site of Aspinwall is a small island named Manzanilla, which is by nature a mere swamp, but has been consolidated by artificial means. It is neither a healthy nor an agreeable place of residence, but it is the principal "gate to the Pacific" which has only been opened by the transit from one ocean to the other by the ordinary trains being accomplished in four hours, a distance of sixty miles, to the town and port of Panama, which is the corresponding railway terminus on the western coast of the isthmus. The history of sixty miles is remarkable as a pretension than Aspinwall. It has a larger population (about 7000) but its trade is small, its harbor not very extensive, though large enough, and it labors under the same difficulties as Aspinwall in regard to unhealthy location.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Our engravings on the Central Pacific Railroad are taken principally from some of the difficulties of building and running it. The first shows the dangers and toils of the civil engineers in surveying in one of the mountain defiles known as Truckee Pass. The second illustrates the structure by means of which the road is protected from the snowdrifts which in this locality are so frequent in the Cascade and Rocky Mountain ranges. Many miles of the Central Pacific Road have been covered by these snow sheds.

VICTORIA, HONG KONG.

Hong Kong is a small island on the Chinese coast, which was ceded to Great Britain on the conclusion of the treaty of 1842, and Victoria, which we illustrate, is its capital. Hong Kong is mainly a factory for British commerce in China, and a military station for the protection of British and other foreign interests in the neighborhood. The Government is sustained by Great Britain, but its commerce is open to all civilized nations. The trade with Hong Kong is only about 100,000, of whom 100,000 live in Victoria (and in boats in the harbor); but to this little place comes much of the commerce of China. The value of the exports from Hong Kong is very great, forming a not insignificant proportion of the whole export trade of China; but tables of exports have been kept only of those sent to Great Britain. This fraction of the export trade of Hong Kong amounted, in 1864, to $14,649,646 in gold, against an import trade of $8,094,335.

Many of the Government buildings of Victoria are of a most imposing character, and the residences are substantial and often elegant. Our view gives an excellent general idea of the city.

MINISTER BURLINGAME.

To accompany these cuts and the portrait of Hon. ANSON BURLINGAME on page 348, we give below a brief account of his life and career.

He was born in New Berlin, New York, November 14, 1820, but later moved to "Western Reserve," Ohio, when the son was quite small, and from there to the (then) Territory of Michigan. He graduated at the Detroit Academy and the branch University of Michigan at Detroit, and went through the regular course, making an impression by his natural powers. From them there he entered the Harvard University Law School, under Justice Story; took the degree of LL.B., and opened a law office in the Old State House, Boston, the firm being BRIGGS & BURLINGAME, the Mr. BRIGGS being a son of the late Governor BRIGGS of Massachusetts.

During the political campaign of 1848 Mr. BURLINGAME took part upon political lists, taking an active part in the Free Soil movement, and finally became a member of the Republican party. Shortly after he graduated from the Law School he was sent to the Massachusetts Legislature as Senator, and was Chairman of the Committee which framed the conduct KOSSUTH upon New England, and was subsequently elected a member of the Constitutional Convention from the town of Northboro', although he lived in Boston. Governor BOUTWELL, CHARLES SUMNER, and R. H. DANA, JUN., were elected at the same time, according to the old English borough system. Mr. B., advancing rapidly, was sent to Congress in 1853 from Boston and Cambridge, and served six years as a member of the House of Representatives. He took part in the contest which resulted in the election of N. P. BANKS as Speaker. When CHARLES SUMNER was assaulted, Mr. B. got the floor, and made his celebrated denunciation of that infamous act in that never-to-be-forgotten speech. Smarting under the wrongs of Massachusetts, he threw down the glove to the pro-slavery men of the South, and declared himself ready to defend freedom of speech and the State he represented on any field they might be assailed. PRESTON S. BROOKS, of South Carolina, came a challenge. Mr. BURLINGAME accepted, and named the rifle. His father, a pioneer of the DANIEL BOONE type, was by general old FRITZ, had taught his son to be a "dead shot." The "fire-eater" BROOKS was probably aware of this unpleasant fact, and declined to respond. Mr. BURLINGAME's provincial career he spoke but little, but always to the point, as the record will testify. During the exciting political campaign of 1856 he also harangued the whole country, speaking in almost every State, and addressed many literary societies on the great topics of the day. Mr. LIVERMORE, shortly after his inaugural, tendered him the mission to Austria. Austria refused to receive him, because of his conspicuous action during the mission to Sardinia from the second to the first class, thus recognizing that great idea of Count CAVOUR's, "the unification of Italy." This act of Austria might have been questioned; but as the United States had a war on hand to settle, it was thought better to transfer Mr. B. to China, and attend to Austria at a more convenient time.

In 1847 Mr. BURLINGAME married the daughter of Hon. ISAAC LIVERMORE, of Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Mr. BURLINGAME's career as Minister to China is well known. With Sir FREDERICK BRUCE, Mr. HOLLOWAY, Mr. WADDINGTON, Mr. BALLERZECH, the former, and Mr. VANGALLY, the present Russian Minister, he laid the foundations for that "understanding" which was adopted by the chief Treaty Powers, and sustained by their present representatives at Pekin. This understanding, which is a modification of the old doctrine of force, guarantees the autonomy of China, and proposes co-operation on all international questions. Mr. BURLINGAME drew the draft of this co-operative policy, which received the assent of his colleagues as an authoritative history and exposition of it. He drew up the elaborate paper giving a construction of the different treaties upon a great number of hitherto doubtful points. This was accepted without difficulty by his colleagues. He led the opposition to the "Concession Doctrine," under which it was proposed to take concessions of land from the Chinese Treaty ports. This, if persisted in, would have led to the disruption of China. This view has been maintained by Mr. BURLINGAME from the first. At the request of Mr. BURLINGAME Confederate pirates were excluded from Chinese waters. He was made referee in the LAY-OSBORNE difficulty; and he settled it to the satisfaction of England and China.

He induced the Chinese Government to employ an American geologist, RAPHAEL POMPELLY, who has demonstrated that the coal-mines of North China are of great extent, and constitute an coal of superior quality. Through the same enlightened influence, WHEATON's "Elements of International Law" has been translated into Chinese by the Rev. W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D., published at the expense of the Imperial Government, and adopted as a text-book in schools, &c. Mr. BURLINGAME proposed, some time since, that an American College should be established at Pekin, using for the purpose the "Indemnity Fund." Our Government has approved of this, but Congress has not yet acted. The Chinese, however, at the suggestion of Mr. HART, Inspector-General of the Imperial Maritime Customs, have opened a college, of which the venerable SHU-KWEI is the superintendent, the professors, is the Chinese, and Dr. MARTIN, the foreign professor.

The great cause of missions has found in Mr. BURLINGAME an ardent supporter, and has advanced from the South far beyond the "Great Wall;" and now the good news is received in the broad plateau of Mongolia among the nomad tribes of that vast region. The first grant of a submarine telegraph connecting the Chinese coast, from Canton to Tien-tsin, was made to Mr. HENRY HOLLOWAY in 1865. Since that time the foreign trade of China has advanced from $82,000,000 to $300,000,000. Several hundred foreigners have been taken into the Chinese Civil service; and, under the direction of Mr. HART, they are doing much to civilize China.

The present mission of Mr. BURLINGAME to the interests of civilization is the request of the Chinese to Mr. BURLINGAME to represent them at the Courts of the European Powers. The Hon. EDMUND FORD ALCOCK said: "It is the greatest compliment ever paid to any man, and Mr. BURLINGAME deserves it." Lord CLARENDON spoke to the point of visiting the thirteen Treaty ports and then returning to the United States. Prince KUNG had invited him to a Grand Civil service; and, under the direction of Mr. HART, they are doing much to civilize China.

The present mission of Mr. BURLINGAME to the interests of civilization is the request of the Chinese to Mr. BURLINGAME to represent them at the Courts of the European Powers. The Hon. EDMUND FORD ALCOCK said: "It is the greatest compliment ever paid to any man, and Mr. BURLINGAME deserves it." Lord CLARENDON spoke to the point of visiting the thirteen Treaty ports and then returning to the United States. Prince KUNG had invited him to a Grand Civil service; and, during the ceremonies said: "Will your Excellency represent us officially as well as non-officially at the Courts of Europe?" To which Mr. BURLINGAME supposed it was a graceful Chinese compliment, said that he would represent them unofficially as a friend, and the conversation passed into other channels. He was very much surprised next Mr. BROWN, the Chinese Secretary of the English Legation, spoke to him a few days after with a formal proposition from the Prince Regent KUNG tendering him the mission. Mr. BURLINGAME, after mature deliberation and grave consultation with his friends, determined to accept it. He instantly communicated all the facts to his colleagues. They very kindly approved and rejoiced at this progressive step. Mr. BURLINGAME's credentials, a yellow parchment, wrapped in yellow brocade satin, the imperial color, and encased in a yellow box. He has given him the title of Embassador, and clothed him with the most ample powers.

EXCELSIOR.

Pur out thy talents to their use—
Lay nothing by to rust;
Give vulgar ignorance thy scorn,
And innocence thy trust.
Rise to thy proper place in life—
Trample upon all sin,
But still the gentle hand hold out
To help the wanderer in.
So live, in faith and noble deed,
Till earth's dream be o'er—
So live, that men shall mark the time
Gave such a mortal birth.

EPISODE IN A SURGEON'S LIFE.

I HAD been about a year a lecturer on anatomy in a large hospital in London. I shall not name it, as the events I am about to relate really happened, and some might recognize them. At the date of their occurrence I was suffering from one of those heaven-sent blows which under the strongest and most philosophic succumb for a time—many forever. A blow, however strong our philosophie, the greatest affliction man can suffer passed over me, and left me walking, eating, sleeping, but in the mechanical manner in which we anatomists attribute little or no self-consciousness in their actions, and no pleasure in the fulfillment of them. We may be wrong; the hungry-looking arms of the anemone may obey a more than mere unconscious stimulus when they receive their dainty prey; but, at all events, man, who possesses all the nervous organization for being, doing, and suffering, is in no doubtful as to his actions in such circumstances as those to which I allude.

"I was sitting one snowy December night, with my rigor and my pen, at letters to Athens, trying to pass the time, to keep my eyes from that shadow on the wall which every now and then drew them from the large folio leaves on which the great good man has unburdened his big heart to his friend; often, too, the empty chair beside me seemed occupied by a figure which seemed substance till I looked, then shadow, then mere memory.

"The wind was I wearily getting through the night when my servant brought me a note—a small, long, black-edged envelope, addressed in a lady's hand; it was this:

"DEAR SIR,—Is it possible to take a cast from the face of one who has lain for two weeks in a coffin? The bearer waits your answer.

There was no signature. I tore off the blank half of the note-sheet, wrote "Yes" upon it, and gave it to my servant. The mere taking of casts from the dead body is part of the business of an anatomist, be by such means preserves those outlines which are soon under the pressure of the atmosphere, after those chemical changes have occurred which our tissues undergo when the spirit leaves us around here, lying wherever it may chance to desert us, in beds or on bleak waste lands, inside houses or on door-steps, until our friends remove their mysterious part in the formation of an immortal body.

I had taken many casts of the dead, but had never been asked for one so before; by a small note in such delicate writing, it was clearly from some one oppressed with feelings much akin to my own. Who is, I thought, influenced by that curious perplexity, or that perplexed curiosity, we all feel about the dead. It is not, I thought, the mere desire for a cast; human instinct would answer her question as well as I could, but "Will you bring me with our dead?" has been a question for each nation as it appeared. I thought how some are now passing their four thousandth year in worship and ceremony, how others are lying in catacombs, grazed on by curious visitors, who seem to think death but a mere national peculiarity, a passion. I thought of others, useless in their lives, who are after death noble monuments, built up for usefulness in the minds of men. I thought, too, of the first time I had seen a funeral, it was in mid-Atlantic; the moon shining now and then past masses of cloud, the plunging of the ocean steamer plunging bows under; how the dead man was laid on the sponson, covered with a flag. A clergyman who happened to be in the ship's passenger list read the service as we clustered round, holding on as best we could. I remembered how the words, "We therefore commit your friend," rang out over the rushing of the water, and how in a little time we committed the body to the deep, till the sea-shall give up her dead. Then I thought of dust I had worshiped which had returned to dust, and yearned for the time when mine too should commingle with its native elements.

I was aroused from this half-asleep condition by another ring, and presently another note in the same hand:

"SIR,—Will you be so kind as — Cemetery in one hour from now, and bring with you what you think necessary for taking a cast? All expenses will be paid, as explained in my last note.

"An hour!" I exclaimed; "who ever took a cast in a cemetery at one o'clock in the morning? It may be a misdemeanor, for all I know; it may be a felony. Why not, I, as well as in probability, what I thought at first. Here, too, is a poor broken-hearted one, doing what I would do were it in my power. Who am I to set diffculties in her way or question the wisdom of her proposal?" So calling my servant, we took a small bag of plaster of Paris, a tin basin, iron spoon, oil, and all the other necessaries, and started. A cab was waiting for us at the corner of the street, which dragged us slowly through the snow to the cemetery. Another cab was standing at the gate, out of which two ladies stepped. I could just see that they were tall, in deep mourning, and closely veiled. One, who seemed considerably the elder, addressed me entirely, and gave all directions. We walked along the trim gravel-walks, a man preceding us with a lantern, which the crisp, unsullied snow rendered quite unnecessary; but it added to our mystery to the scene as it shone on the stiff unsightly monuments, and glittered on the snow-covered shrubs, and at last on an iron barred gate, which the man unlocked. Here the two ladies glided past us and followed him closely till, after a reference to his pocket-book and looking at several coffins, he laid his hand on one, and signed to my man to come and assist. I was soon pulled down and placed upon the trestles; it had neither name nor date as is usual, but the man seemed confident he was right in his selection. Then there was a burst of grief, and the elder lady drew her companion away. The man placed a screw-driver and his lantern on the coffin and followed them, leaving my man and myself alone. It was a place of very weird aspect, consisting merely of a few graves with shelves in niches, on which lay coffins of all shapes and sizes. I am not a nervous man—my days have been spent much among the dead—but I confess to a feeling of dislike to such a studio at one A.M. on a winter morning. We soon removed the coffin-lid, and I, with the lantern's light saw a man's face, a sharp outline, waving black hair, a noble forehead, high nose, large black beard and mustache. He must have been a handsome fellow, not above thirty. But how hollow were the cheeks, and how wasted the thin, long, manly hand!

A rustle of a woman's dress and the tall lady enters, throws up her veil, and kisses the damp, cold forehead, and rolls off some of the hair, and vanishes. We take the cast, close the coffin; it is again locked on to a shelf, and, the cold and tedious business over, I am glad to leave the place. Again the dark figure of the elder lady comes towards us, having taller from under her black garments contrast with the snow. She now addressed my servant, who was carefully carrying the pieces of still wet plaster. "Is the cast?"

"No, ma'am; cast won't be ready till to-morrow."

"Give that to me."

"But, Madam," I said, "it is merely the mould, and scarcely form a cast." I was unaccustomed to handle such things is sure to destroy it.

"Be good enough, Sir, to give that to me," she said, in such a voice that the gravel-walk was nearly being umpire in the dispute as my servant stood in the scale.

"Very well, Madam." She took the towel in which they were and walked away into the darkness.

"Who is she?" I asked the man with the lantern.

"No one knows," he said.

"Who was the gentleman?"

"No one knows; he came one evening to — Hotel without luggage, and as star wood down down and disappear, bringing to my mind Berranger's noble ode:

"Oh! may my shooting light betoken,
That falls, fair, and is quenched afar?"

"I don't know what it betokens, Sir, I'm sure," said my servant, wakening with a start, "but I suppose it's good. That old girl knows more than she seems."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, Sir, I'm a cast, Sir! Not she; when, Sir, you've seen as much as I have, you'll know 'em better; she's lived long enough in the world to know that these moulds can't be handled like that: she wanted to see him, Sir, only. If she's so very fond of him, let her have him properly picked after undertaking to her."

"But why should she wish to see him?"

"It's curious, Sir; but so it is when people know one another before the death of other people, they like to take a peep at them now and then. Maybe she's married somebody else, Sir, perhaps. He covered him up, and would never have been suspected, but he would go in the night and uncover him, to see if he was still there; so he was caught, and—" Here's home, Sir."

With, the exception of having my interest a little aroused in the mysterious affair, I, in describing a gentleman who had never returned from a journey to the north, and whose features seemed to resemble those of some one I had once seen, I couldn't remember where, the incident just narrated faded from my memory as the events of the next day may oddly have effaced my mind. The spring was approaching, and the long winter session drawing to a close, when I got the following note from the medical man whose duty it is to conduct such investigations:

"DEAR —— Will you oblige me by coming to my house at 3 P.M. to-day, as I wish you to conduct the p.m. examination of a case of suspected poisoning? Yours ever, ——"

I desired my trusty John to bring the necessary instruments, and went to join my friend. His door was at the door. We got into it, and John mounted the box.

"What street is it in, G——?" I asked.

"No street, only the cemetery. The body has been buried, or rather vaulted, for several months. There is no need to remove more than what is absolutely necessary for purposes of analysis. You don't mind?"

"Not I. What is the case?"

"Sure I don't know; most likely nothing at all, but it seems a man died in an hotel, and died without medical advice; he never had time, it would seem, and he was unclaimed; but as he left they sent him here. He had some money, I suppose, else you'd have seen him in the rooms."

"You take things coolly here."

"What's the use of making a fuss after a man's dead? However, his friends have traced him, and I am desired to see into it. I was very busy, didn't even ask his name; it will be in the warrant for exhumation, though."

All this time I was puzzling my brains as to how all this seemed so familiar to me, and I was just going to say as much to G—— when I looked up and saw John's face looking back through the window behind the coachman with the most comical expression of perturbation I ever saw on human countenance. In an instant the whole midnight scene at the cemetery returned to my mind; and what I had attached so little importance to then as almost wholly to forget, I now remembered in its every detail. I need not go over the old story; all was the same except that the spring flowers were rustling in the May-day breeze, and children were playing hide-and-seek among the head-stones and evergreens. The rest was the same, as the same man brought the same lamp, and he and my servant pulled down the same coffin in the same way and put it on the same trestles. This being a legitimate proceeding the regular attendant removed the lid, and I could see but little change in the face so far as decomposition was concerned—there was only an excessive amount of moisture about the face, and the grave-clothes seemed as if they had been wrung out of water. G—— was busily noting down the general appearances when he exclaimed, looking at the white particles sticking about the hair, "Holloa! they've been taking a cast of this."

The murder was out; so I said, "Yes, I did with our friend John here."

"You?"

"Yes; John and I in December."

"Before interment, of course?"

"Not a bit; just where you are now."

G—— cast a look at the man, as much as to say, "You may go home and pack up any movables you may care to take with you." He said nothing more to me, who had already begun my part of the revolting business; but I could hear mutterings, not loud but deep, of "unscrupulous," "unwarrantable," etc., etc., which I knew were inspired by thoughts of myself.

After our business was over, and the coffin, of which I was now perfectly weary, again hoisted to its shelf, we drove home, talking of indifferent matters, and went our several ways. A country engagement prevented my seeing G—— for a couple of days, and, indeed, not then; for on my return a message awaited me to call at one of the hotels. I went as soon as possible, so that I might get my work for the day quite over, and have a long rest.

"Who is it wants me?" I asked the waiter.

"A lady, Sir—No. 15." And he showed me in.

She certainly did not hurry herself, and I had plenty of time to look about me before any one appeared. At last a lady entered the room with, it seemed to me, some show of recognition, and her voice at least sounded familiar to my ears. She was tall, and dressed in that mixture of black silk and black crape which is so becoming to tall women. Her hair was black, just sprinkled with gray; her eyes were black, with brows and lashes to match; they were set too near the nose for perfect beauty; her other features were perfect, though the lips were rather too thin; her complexion was dazzling white, or rather transparent, like French china. Just over the molar bones there was a soupçon of pink—her hands long, lean, and white—the same unnatural white.

"You don't remember me, Mr. Jones?"

"Indeed I have not that pleasure."

"Ah, you doctors have so much to think about. Are you stronger than you were in the winter?"

"Thank you, I am much better."

"I'm so glad to hear it. You passed me to-day in a carriage. Where were you going? To do some horrid operation, I suppose."

"Not exactly."

"You don't expose yourself to cold night air as you used to do, I hope."

"No more than I can help. Why?"

"Oh, nothing; just something to say."

That was quite evident; so I began to look at my watch, which she noticed, and said,

"You'll take tea with us, won't you? My niece will be in directly. She wasn't well, and lay down for a little. We have been traveling about a good deal lately. We were in Glasgow, and saw Madeline Smith's window. What a long arm L'Angelier must have had to reach to it for his chocolate!"

"Yes, poor fellow. What a fearful end his was!"

"Are the traces of arsenic easily discovered?"

"Very."

"And antimony?"

"And antimony; indeed all metallic poisons are easily discovered."

"Then what are used which so often baffle even the most expert chemists?"

"Chiefly vegetable poisons—what are called the vegetable alkaloids; in other words, the active principles of such drugs as strychnine, from nux vomica; but poisoners like Palmer, for instance, are convicted on symptoms characteristic of these poisons."

Here an involuntary yawn interrupted the progress of my lecture, but taking for granted that my patient was the young lady, I waited; the tea-tray was brought in, and my companion left the room; she presently returned with a much younger lady, about twenty-five apparently, dressed in bluish gray, a sort of half-mourning. She had a perfect face and figure, her eyes had an almost unearthly lustre, and her complexion was the same French china white as her aunt's. Her lips had not the full rosy color of women at her age, and she walked like one who had suffered a long illness; but her manner was marked by vivacity, as her countenance was by intelligence. But that glistening eye of hers would not keep still; it wandered round the room more like a wild bird's than a young lady's. "I'll leave you two for a little," said the elder, and now I became more reconciled to my detention. After giving her a chance of beginning again, I said, "You don't look much like an invalid."

"I am not exactly an invalid, but my aunt seemed anxious for me to see a doctor."

"Do you feel very weak?"

"Oh, so weak!"

"Are you ever sick?"

"Always sick."

"Any pain in your limbs?"

"When I walk, such an aching!"

These short answers evidently fatigued her, and she asked for water.

"Does it hurt you to swallow?"

"No, only my throat is so hot."

And so she went on to tell me how she had been losing strength for several months—how her aunt had been so good to her; and, in answer to my questions, she said she had suffered much grief in the winter, when a dear friend had died. "Where?" I asked. "Oh, here in this town. He was traveling about, and he died in an hotel. He had been traveling with them till within two or three days; but he was not well, so he staid behind to rest, and died, and—" Here she stopped, for a rustle in the adjoining room told that a third person, that nuisance in all medical consultations, was approaching; we changed the subject, the elder lady came in and made tea; I wrote a prescription and got up to go away, but was requested to step into the next room and tell the elder lady what my opinion was. "It seems to me merely debility, and an irritable mucous membrane. She has been depressed in spirits; what have you given her?"

"Nothing," was the answer.

"Then I'll call the day after to-morrow and see how she gets on with this."

And I left; but the well-known back of a "Churchill's Manual" caught my eye as I passed out. "So you study Taylor's book," I said to her; "is not this rather ghastly reading for a lady?"

"Not I," she answered, quickly. "I suppose some predecessor of ours in this room must have forgotten it. Come and say Good-night to Kate."

I was very tired that night; there is nothing so tiring as the work of a medical man. Few of the cases which present themselves to him have any extraordinary interest—and, indeed, the anxiety which these involve is scarcely compensated by the accompanying fees or éclat. The most fatiguing part, however, is the constant endeavor to appear concerned about trivial ailments, and the striving to be on good terms with your fellow-practitioners, who you know detest you heartily. Yes, I was very tired as I trudged down the hill to my solitary abode. I vainly tried to read, and at last flung myself on the sofa. I must have been asleep for several hours, as it was quite dark when I awoke, feeling as I never remembered feeling before. "What a fool I am," I thought, "for sleeping on the sofa! Here I've got a sore throat and the rheumatism, and will be useless to-morrow." Then I dozed off again, and, as is often the case when tossing restlessly about seeking for sleep, I sat up and tried to read, and gave it up, looked over my case-book, wrote a few lines and lay down again, oppressed by a feeling of weariness words can not express. My thoughts would dwell in a dreamy way on my new patient. Where had I seen her aunt? how account for her odd manner, to me apparently so contradictory to her apparently reserved manner; and what could she have been reading in Taylor? Did she think I was going to believe she had not read him? Did I— Oh, what was that?—that awful pain that shot through me, and passed away in a minute. It took my breath away, and for some time I sat on the sofa and wiped the perspiration from my face. Again, again it came; my throat felt as if on fire, my eyes as if cayenne pepper had been dusted into them, and all accompanied by such fearful nausea as utterly deprived me of what is termed vulgarly "pluck." Death seemed to stare me in the face; I felt the seriousness of solitude in earnest then. The gray light of morning came in at last, and found me lying more dead than alive on the carpet with my head on the sofa, but the pains were less severe. How I rejoiced when I heard the carts going about the street! and some movements down stairs told me that my trusty John was making his toilet, and would soon be up stairs. All my efforts to reach the bell-rope had only ended in cramps and powerlessness.

As soon as I could I sent John for Dr. G——, who was quickly with me. He questioned me as to what I had eaten, and we both concluded that during my country visit I had taken something to disagree with me. He administered some remedies, and kindly sat by my bedside for a time, and diverted my thoughts by conversation. "By-the-way, Jones, if you are well enough, you must come round to my place and see some of that friend of yours tested."

"What have you found?"

"What have we not found?—arsenic and antimony in every organ of the body, especially antimony. How he could have lived an hour with so much even in his blood I can scarcely say, unless he took it little by little. By-the-way, have you got 'Taylor?' if you have, I want to look at it a moment."

"It's in the next room; ring the bell."

He rang, and John fetched the book, which reminded me of my patient at —— Hotel, so John was sent up with an apology for my not being able to make the promised visit. On his return Dr. G—— was gone, and I was glad to have even John to talk to, as my eyes were still too sore to read.

"I gave your message, Sir, and to whom do you think?—to the old one, and she knew me, she did, and she asked how you was, Sir, and if you were better. Who told her you had been ill?" (I may here mention that doctor's illnesses are always kept a secret.)

"Whom on earth do you mean, John?"

"The old one, Sir, as made me give up the piece-mould last winter in the cemetery."

Now the whole story flashed back upon me, and horrible doubts and terrors possessed me as I thought of my own escape, and the fair girl in that dreadful woman's power. I crawled out of bed as well as I could, and with John's help dressed and sent for a cab. We drove up to —— Hotel. The old lady was out, and my patient was in bed. The hotel servants knew and at once admitted me. The poor girl was lying back with her pale face bathed in perspiration, and her long hair lying in dank masses on the pillow. Her eyes were even more glistening and restless than on my last visit, and occasionally an expression of agony she strove in vain to conceal passed across her face. By her side was a table, on which were a wine-glass half full of what seemed pure water, and a saucer of currant jelly.

"Oh, doctor," she said, "aunt thought you weren't coming. Your medicines are here, I haven't begun them yet. Aunt left me this to take, but it always makes me so sick, I'm putting it off as long as possible."

"Your aunt has no business to give any medicines which I have not ordered. Chambermaid, tell my servant to speak to me. John, take this note to its address as quick as you can."

I penciled:

"Dear G——: Come at once with John, and bring the handiest thing you've got for testing antimony and arsenic in solution. J."

I calculated on having at least an hour to ourselves in the sitting-room before the aunt could return from the distant suburb she had gone to. In an incredibly short space of time G—— was sitting at her writing-table, while I, pretending the fidgetiness of an invalid, kept prowling about in search of drugs, taking an occasional anxious look at G——, who was patiently examining the water in the wine-glass.

He had placed a few drops on a slip of glass, and was allowing it slowly to evaporate. Some more of it he poured into a test-tube, cautiously dropping into the latter dilute nitric acid; as he did so a white cloud appeared in the previously limpid fluid, which sank to the bottom of the tube. He continued to add the acid, and the fluid became as limpid as before. "What was that?" I asked.

"I'm not sure, but I think subnitrate of antimony," said the cautious man. "Let's try again. Give me that bottle of dilute tartaric acid." He again half filled a test-tube from the wine-glass, and, as it is technically termed, threw down the white precipitate with the dilute nitric acid. He now added some of the tartaric acid, and the precipitate disappeared. "Now let's try another while that glass dries," said he; and filling another tube, he dropped in some ferro-cyanide of potassium. The fluid remained unchanged. "Now for the glass;" and he lifted the slip from which the water had evaporated, and left a thin coating of something which he examined carefully through a lens, and then handed to me. I could distinctly see the little tetrahedral crystals of tartar emetic. We had now seen enough to entitle us to obtain legal protection for the poor girl. G—— tried some more tests, and occasionally jotted down a few notes, when a silk dress rustled along the passage toward the bedroom. Our door was ajar, but it passed, and we heard her ask, "Dr. Jones been here? Did you take your medicine? Where's the glass?" The bedroom door then shut, and directly after, ours was thrown wide open, and the elder lady had advanced several steps into the room before she observed us. She had not read "Taylor on Poisons" for nothing; her glance took it all in, from the spirit lamp to the bits of glass over which G—— was poring with a lens. But her bloodless face betrayed no inward emotion as she bowed to each of us, and said she would return in a moment.

"Who is that?" said G——.

"That!" I croaked, through my still sore throat; "that's the aunt, and the elder of the two ladies I met at the cemetery."

I had not finished when the rotten bell-rope came down with G——'s violent pull, and then we rushed along the passage, and I could hear him shouting to "stop that lady who's going out." I tried to follow, but sank back into my chair from weakness. Lest the invalid should be alarmed I went into her room. She was shaking with terror, and begged me not to leave her.

"Don't you like your aunt, then?"

"She's not my aunt," said she, "but she told me to call her so. She was to travel with me, my guardians said. She's always reading that dreadful book."

Dr. G—— returned; the old experienced bird had fled, but detectives were seeking for her already, and descriptions of her were flashing along the wires. A good nurse was sent to my patient, who was for the future under our medical care. Of course we communicated with her guardians, and very soon she was surrounded by loving friends.

The police, though unsuccessful in their search after the elder woman, took upon themselves to break open her boxes and writing-desk. In the latter they found a letter in a disguised handwriting—a letter that seemed a confession of betrayal, at the same time that it defied the person to whom it was addressed, and read as if she had threatened revenge.

Experts declared the writing to be that of the murdered man; and putting all the dark facts together, we concluded that the poisoner had been actuated by jealousy and revenge. The man had been attracted by the fair young girl, and had thus roused the stormy passions of a cruel woman.

Bearing in mind the precarious condition of the invalid, those dark conjectures were never revealed to her. Indeed, the shock to myself was great, and it was mournful to see my patient fading away.

"How changed you are!" she said to me as we met one day in the cemetery.

"And you, you ought not to be out?"

"It makes no difference," was her answer, "except that I seem to suffer more indoors. And it can't last long; and," she continued, "you know we got him put there," pointing to the grave she had left.

They now rest together. "Bury me beside him," were her last words. It was done.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Medical Intelligence.—Surely if a Medical Quack can be called a woman because he's a Charlotte Anne, a Chemist might be called a Ditto, as he is an Anne Eliza (Analyzer).

Fits that are not Fatal to Actors—Bene-fits.

To Catch Your Own Shadow.—To do this trick well you must drink two pints of whisky on a moonlight night, then start for home, observing your shadow at full length before you. Jis' drop flat on your face, lettin' your nose go two inches in the ground, so as to make the shadow secure. Lie there till placed in a wheel-barrow by a policeman who feels it his duty to take you home.

"Madam," said a husband to his young wife, in a little altercation, which will spring up in the best regulated families, "when a man and his wife have quarreled, and each supposes the other at fault, which of the two ought to advance toward a reconciliation?"

"The best-natured and wisest of the two," said the wife, putting up her mouth for a kiss, which was given with an unction. She was the conqueror.

May be Heard Every Where.—"Songs without Words"—a remarkable performance; but perhaps a still more wonderful feat is playing upon words.

Cure for Creaking.—The most infallible way of preventing a kitchen-door from creaking is said to be to engage a servant-girl whose sweet-hearts come to the house to see her.

WANTS.

Music of the spheres with original score.
The cap of a climax.
The musket and powder-horn of a shooting star.
The march of mind, arranged for a full orchestra, with trumpet obligato by Fame.
Some bristles from the last brush with the rebels.
Some sand from Time's hour-glass.
The iron from the plane of the ecliptic.
Some tenpenny nails made from fragments of the Iron Duke.
A finger-post from the road to ruin.

ARTIFICIAL BABIES FOR TRAVELERS.

Armed with an Infant one is admitted to First-class Cars and Saloons.

The tariff of prices is as follows:

Common traveling infants, yielding intermittent cries of fear, and capable of being put into the pocket, $2 50.

Second-class, crying not too loudly, but lamentably and insupportably, $5.

Third-class, full squaller, with a very piercing and aggravating voice of five octaves, $10.

The same, arranged as a prompt repeater, $12.

Fifth-class, first quality, capable of continued squalling, $15.

The young fellow who engaged himself to half a dozen young women is undoubtedly a beau of promise.

Some wretch of an editor says that another twist to the present mode of "doing up" the ladies' hair would take them off their feet.

THE AGE OF LOVE.

"Prithee, tell me, Dimple Chin,
At what age does love begin?"

"Oh!" the rosy lips reply,
"I can't tell you if I try.
'Tis so long I can't remember:
Ask some younger miss than I!"

"Tell me, oh, tell me, Grizzled-Face,
Do your heart and head keep pace?
When does hoary love expire?
When do frosts put out the fire?"

"Ah!" the wise old lips reply,
"Youth may pass, and strength may die;
But for love! I can't foretoken;
Ask some older sage than I!"

"I have passed through many hardships," as the schooner said after sailing through a fleet of iron-clads.

To Ugly Women.—A young man who has run through all his property, but now sees the error of his ways, and is a reformed character, wishes to marry and settle. He would wish to settle any fortune that his wife might bring with her on herself, with remainder in the hands of trustees to the survivor for life. Any lady of strictly moral and religious principles and an affectionate temperament, whose inclination for holy matrimony has, notwithstanding peculiar affluence (say $100,000), been opposed by disadvantages of personal appearance, may secure a fond husband, who is considered very handsome, but, being himself indifferent to externals, regards only those qualities in a married partner that are truly valuable.

DREAMS.

To dream of a millstone about your neck is a sign of what you may expect if you marry an extravagant wife. It is very lucky to dream that you pay for a thing twice over; since ever afterward you will probably take care to have your bills receipted. For a person in embarrassed circumstances to dream that he is arrested is very fortunate, for it is a warning to him on no account to accept a bill. To dream of fire is a sign that—if you are wise—you will see that all the lights in your house are out before you go to bed. To dream of having a great number of servants is madness.

Pretty Girl to Charles. "Charley, how far is it round the world? Isn't it twenty-four thousan—"

Charles (who adores pretty girl and put both arms around her). "That's all a mistake my love; it is only about twenty-four inches."

She was all the world to him.

A little girl worn out by a long sermon, observing the preacher gathering himself for the introduction of another "point," exclaimed, "Oh, mother! he is not going to quit at all! He is swelling up again!"

HON. ANSON BURLINGAME, MINISTER FROM CHINA.—[See Page 346.]

PRINCE ALFRED OF ENGLAND.

PRINCE ALFRED OF ENGLAND.

THE attempt on the life of PRINCE ALFRED, Earl of Kent and of Ulster, though better known as the Duke of Edinburgh, and perhaps still better known as "The Sailor-Prince of England," has been condemned far and wide in this country, where the horror of assassination is so great, although our disregard of human life is held by our transatlantic cousins to be such a serious fault of our character.

The Prince, whose portrait we give on this page, is, as every one knows, the second son of QUEEN VICTORIA, and is now nearly twenty-four years of age, having been born, at Windsor Castle, on August 6, 1844. He was educated at the

"BROUGHT TO EARTH"—A VIRGINIA DEER-HUNT.—DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[See Page 349.]

University of Edinburgh and a Bonn, and was created LL.D. on the occasion of his opening the Museum of Science and Arts in the Scottish capital. He entered the Navy in August, 1858; became Lieutenant in 1863, and Captain in 1866. He served on board the Euryalus, 1858–61; the St. George, 1861–63; the Bacchus, 1863–66; and was appointed to the command of the Galatea in January, 1867, and proceeded on a voyage to the Australian colonies shortly afterward—a voyage which he was still prosecuting at the time the attempt on his life was made.

THE DEER-HUNT.

A FAVORITE mode of hunting the deer as practiced in Virginia is handsomely illustrated in our engraving on the preceding page. The haunts and "runs" of the animal are well known; some of the best marksmen of the hunters post themselves at points near which the deer is likely to pass when started, while the mounted hunters and dogs prepare to start the game and drive it toward the concealed marksman. A well-aimed rifle shot serves to bring the game to earth.

M. JULES FAVRE.

ON Thursday, April 23, M. JULES FAVRE took his seat in the French Academy. Seven hundred distinguished persons were waiting to receive him, and to listen to his eulogium on his predecessor, M. COUSIN. His speech, which was a long one, was in part devoted to proving that Christianity, political liberty, and philosophical liberty conduce to the support of one another and to the prosperity of states. He recalled the time when, a timid student, he had listened to the lectures of COUSIN, and the incredulity, the fear, with which he should then have heard that he was one day destined to take the place of that great thinker among his illustrious associates.

JULES GABRIEL CLAUDE FAVRE, advocate, politician, and now member of the Academy, was born on March 21, 1809. He was engaged in prosecuting his studies for the Bar when the Revolution of July, 1830, broke out, in which he took an active part. Shortly afterward he commenced the practice of his profession. The independence of his character, the bitter irony of his address, and the radicalism of his opinions, early made him a reputation. From that year to the present time he has been in the Press, in the different National Assemblies, and at the Bar the consistent champion of liberal opinions. After the Revolution of February, 1848, he became Secretary-General of the Ministry of the Interior, and was the author of the famous circular to the Commissioners of the Provisional Government, as well as of the "Bulletins" of the same year. He also officiated for some time as Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He voted for the prosecution of MM. LOUIS BLANC and CHEMIDIEFF for their complicity in the insurrection of June, 1848; he refused to join in a vote of thanks to General CAVAIGNAC, and opposed the expedition to Rome of December, 1848. He became the strenuous opponent of LOUIS NAPOLEON after the latter's election to the Presidency, and leader of the Montagne on the flight of LEDRU ROLLIN. Elected after the coup d'état of 1851 to the General Council of the "Loire et Rhone," he refused to take the oath to the new Constitution. His defense of ORSINI in 1858 created a great sensation by its boldness and eloquence. In the same year he became a member of the Legislative Body, since which time he has distinguished himself by his speeches against the law of "deportation," the war with Austria in 1859, in favor of complete liberty of the press, and generally as a determined opponent of the Imperial rule, and a supporter of liberty and progress.

M. JULES FAVRE, OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

ASTORIA.

ASTORIA, Oregon, a view of which we give on this page, was the first trading-post established by the expedition of fur-traders sent out by JOHN JACOB ASTOR about the year 1810. It is situated about ten miles from the mouth of the Columbia River, and is important only in a commercial sense.

THE SEA-SERPENT IN ALL AGES.

THE belief in the existence of a monstrous sea-serpent is very ancient. It appears first to have originated among the Chinese, and from them to have spread through nearly every nation of the civilized world, from the tropics to the Arctic regions. The first European account which pretends to rest on any positive evidence is that given by an Austrian residing at Lentz. This story relates that a fisherman bathing in the Danube with some companions, took it into his head to dive down in a part of the river which was very deep, but not appearing again, his companions threw their nets for him, and after several vain attempts, at last succeeded in bringing up his body, with one arm and one leg entangled in the root of an old tree. As they were endeavoring to disengage the body in order to take it into the boat, they saw a serpent of prodigious size fixed to the left breast of the corpse, which so terrified them that they cried out. Upon this the monster left his prey, and after hissing in a most terrible manner, threw himself again into the river. The next account which claims attention is that of Mr. Fisher, an Icelandic traveler, in 1820. He states that when returning from Eindeker to Horsees, the man who was steering his boat, observing that he took a great interest in natural history, told him the following tale:—He said that about two years ago, he and a companion were fishing near Thunoe, when they observed the head of a large animal lying quietly on the surface of the sea close to the boat. The head was like that of a seal, but they immediately perceived it was not one, as the body and tail toward the animal as they were looking at it and made a pounce upon it, when the huge creature raised its body at least three fathoms, or about eighteen feet into the air, and the bird flew away in terror. They said they had time, before it disappeared, to notice that the monster had a red throat, and that its body was about twice the thickness of a boat-mast.

VIEW OF ASTORIA, OREGON.

The next account we meet with is much more circumstantial, and much less legendary than either of the other two. It is in the shape of an extract from the log-book of Captain D. Bell, of the bark Harriet Ida, bearing date, October 8, 1833, and is as follows:

Sailing in South Atlantic in latitude 37° 30' North, and longitude 17° 40' East, perceived on July the 9th of this year, between twelve and one in the afternoon, a large sea-monster, which appeared for two days constantly kept alongside of us to latitude 35° South, and longitude 9° 0' West. This animal was ninety feet long, and twenty-five to thirty feet broad, and every now and then it struck the sea with such force as to make it vibrate. The monster blew much water, which fell in an unpleasant shower upon the deck. Fearing that the animal might injure the rudder, I did my utmost to drive it off, but without success.

After it had received more than one hundred musket-balls, a harpoon, and a long iron bar, fitted was seen to flow freely from its nostrils, and the last blow, or loss of blood, the monster could swim behind the vessel no longer. It then was delivered up to us.

It will be at once perceived that this account is much more worthy of belief than any previously mentioned.

The next account of the sea-serpent having been seen is in the year 1849. This account is remarkable for having well attested, and from having given rise to an angry controversy. The whole of the story would be too long for insertion here; the monster was seen by Captain Bell, and other officers of Her Majesty's ship Daedalus, in latitude 24° 44' South, and longitude 8° 22' East.

Captain M'Quhae's account was replied to by no less a person than Professor Owen, who asserted that Captain M'Quhae had been mistaken as to the size of the animal he saw, and that it could not possibly be a serpent, but must almost probably a seal. This letter was answered by the Captain, who again reiterated his statements, and was upheld by the admiral under whom he served. Other letters followed, and of course, as neither party would yield, the matter still rests where it was.

The sea-serpent has been reported several times since that date: the last time in 1866. If human testimony could be relied on, the existence of this great monster must be regarded as proved. In the Scandinavian countries it has been a subject of popular belief from the earliest times. It is a great monster, similar to a serpent, which they call "The Kraken," swims in the ocean. Sometimes this has been substantiated by reputable natives of its appearance. The more modern instances which I have glanced at have frequently been of a doubtful, not only by parties who are proverbially credulous, but by passengers and others. But if such an animal exists, it is, as Professor Owen justly says, most extraordinary that of the hundreds which must have lived and died in the ocean since the creation, not a single vestige, not a bone nor a tooth, has ever been cast on shore, as far as the most diligent search and investigation has hitherto shown. Nor, strange to say, as would naturally have been expected, has the dead body of one ever been found floating on the water. In the case of the Phantom Ship, the Great Serpent has never been seen except when swimming through the water at great speed in foggy or stormy weather, and, like the phantom, it has invariably swept past, leaving not a trace behind.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

THE Senate reached a vote on one of the Impeachment articles on May 16. By a majority it offered the same day it was decided that a vote should be taken on the eleventh article first. The vote was then taken, and resulted in the acquittal of the President on that charge by a vote of 19 nays to 35 ayes. Seven Republican Senators, viz.: FESSENDEN, FOWLER, HENDERSON, ROSS, TRUMBULL, VAN WINKLE, and WILKEY voted with the Democrats for acquittal. The excitement in the Senate and throughout the capital was very great. Our illustrations on page 340 and 341 of scenes enacted in the city and Capitol during the closing hours of Impeachment.

SCENE IN THE SENATE LOBBY.

During the secret session which immediately preceded the vote the lobby of the Senate was crowded with Representatives, reporters, and citizens anxious to learn the nature of the speeches made by the Senators. Every hall and corridor, every stairway and lobby, and every seat in the spacious chairs from the rotunda to the farthest corner of the Senate wing was occupied. The hungry crowd was "voracious for news." Occasionally a Senator came out to get his lunch at the adjoining refreshment saloon. He was at once surrounded by his friends, and scrap by scrap the news was wrenched from his reluctant lips.

SCENE IN NEWSPAPER ROW.

The offices of the correspondents of the various newspapers throughout the country are located under the Ebbitt House, in Fourteenth Street, and to this focus of news the crowd tended on the night after the vote had been taken. The sidewalk on Newspaper Row was blockaded during the whole evening by anxious searchers after news, and the offices of the New York papers, and that of the Cincinnati Gazette agent were crowded until midnight. But as it is the duty of the correspondent to collect news of the many and dispense it only to his editor, the crowd became the dispenser of rumors rather than the recipient of facts.

"A SURPRISE."

"Sin is dead!" they said to him. "Come away; Let us bury it and have a holy love to-day!"

They smoothed her tresses of dark brown hair; On her forehead of stone they laid it fair:

Over her eyes, which gazed too much,
They drew the lid, like wise a prudent;
With a tender touch they closed up well
The sweet thin lips that had secrets to tell;
About her brown and beautiful throat
They tied her veil and her marriage-lace;

And drew on her white feet her white silk shoes—
To hide were the whitest as well as the newest.

And over her bosom they crossed her hands:
"Come away!" they said—"God understands."

And then there was Silence—and nothing there
But the blackness and scents of mourners,

And Jasmine, and roses, and rosemary;
And they said, "As a holy should lie, lies she!"
And they put their hands on the door in the room,
With a shudder to glance at its stillness and gloom.

But he who loved her too well to dread
The Sweet, the motherly, the beautiful dead—

He lit his lamp, and took the key,
And turned it!—Alone again—he and she!

He and she: but she would not speak,
Though he kissed, in the old place, the quiet cheek.

He and she; yet she would not smile,
Though he called her the same she loved erewhile.

He and she; still and white she lay
To any one passionate whisper of love.

Then he said, "Cold lips! and breast without breath!
I agree no wife!—no house!—no home!

"Dumb to the ear and still to the sense,
But heart and soul deathless!—intense!

"Yes, woe—alone with you!—and ear—
What was the secret of dying, Dear?

"Was it the infinite wonder of all,
That you ever could let life's flower fall?

"Or was it no reason, but out of the room,
The perfect calm o'er the agony steal?

"Was the miracle greatest to find how deep,
Supernal and strong, the heart can sleep?

"Did life roll backward its record, Dear,
And show, as they say it does, past things clear?

"And was it the innermost secret of the skies
To find out so, what a wisdom love is?

"Oh, perfect Dead! oh, Dead most dear!
I hold the hands of my soul to hear!

"I listen; as deep as to breathe and live,
As high as to heaven!—and you do not tell!

"There must be pleasures in dying, Sweet,
To make you so placid and fair as that!

"I would tell you, Darling, if I were dead,
And knew your hot tears upon my brow shed

"I would say, I pardoned it all, and laid aid
His sword on my lips to keep it unsaid.

"You should not ask, vainly, with streaming eyes,
Which of all deaths was the bitterest surprise—

"The very strangest and subtlest thing
Of all the surprises that dying must bring."

Ah! foolish world! Oh! most kind Dead!
Though he told me, who will believe it was said?
You will suppose he heard your low word
With the sweet soft voice, in the dear old way?

"The utmost wonder is this—I hear
And see you still. There is no low you, Dear;

"And on your Angel who was your Bride
And know, that though dead, I have never died."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN. The only reliable Remedy for those Brown Discolorations on the face is PERRY'S MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold everywhere.

FOR THOSE DISFIGURING DISEASES. Black Worms and Pimples on the Face, use PERRY'S COMEDONE and Pimple Remedy. Order from Druggist, or send to Dr. B. C. Perry, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

S. T.—1860.—X.

"HUSBANDS, LOVE YOUR WIVES," and give them Hunnewell Bouquet when they are afflicted with leucorrhœa, General Debility, Fluttuses, Spasms, or any of the thousand and one diseases to which the weaker sex is liable. Having ourselves experienced the benefit of their use we can recommend them to others. This invaluable tonic will chase Hypochondria, or "the Blues"—give tone to the damaged nervous system—gently stimulate the torpid secretions —dispel vapors and ennui, and generally build up the worn constitution. For each sex and all ages it is a puzzle whether it is more beneficial to the weaker. Millions of bottles are sold daily all over the world.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—A delightful toilet article —superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS & CO., No. 481 Broadway, will dispose of 15 new and 10 second-hand PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of five first-class makers, and take from 80 to 115 monthly until paid. The offer will be continued for 3 days. Also, sole agent for the large number of Pianos returned the 1st of May. Also, 50 new and second-hand harmoniums for rent, and rent allowed if purchased, or for sale at bargains for cash.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN, MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN,

and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION,"

renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION

SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.

This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been used with great success.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance. For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S PAPHIAN SOAP

for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PHALON & SON, 811 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY & CO.'S
CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. Complete CATALOGUES and SPECIMEN VOCAL SCORE, with organ or piano-forte accompaniment; TUTORS for all INSTRUMENTS; and THE MUSICAL CABINET—a complete Library of Vocal, Piano-forte, and Dance Music in Numbers—sent free on application. Our important musical works equally cheap. Catalogues and terms free. BOOSEY & CO., 548 Broadway, New York, and Holles Street, London.

WANTED, AGENTS to sell Campaign Badges and Medals of Washington, Grant, Colfax, Wilson, &c., ready now. Send 25c. for samples, or stamp for full particulars. WM. A. WILDE & CO., 335 Washington St., Boston.

WANTED—AGENTS. $300 per month the year round. Will prove it or forfeit $1000 per month to those having a little capital. We guarantee the above monthly salary to agents who will attend to our own houses. Every agent, farmer, gardener, planter, and fruit-grower in the United States should send at once for particulars. Please call on or address J. AKEHURST & CO., 65 Nassau St., Baltimore, Md.

From the New York Tribune of May 2.

To the Editors of the New York Tribune:

GENTLEMEN:—We have this day received from S. R. Wells, Book and Newspaper Advertising Agent, Nassau, a letter from your establishment calling some inquiries as to the manner in which our business is conducted. In reply to which we respond as follows: That our business is not a gift-enterprise concern; that we are not in the lottery business; that our business, and do not deviate from the plan as advertised. We have been doing a safe business in this nature and extent of our business, we give you a statement of our affairs for the year 1867:

Amount of sales for November, 1867, according to sworn returns, $194,711 (one hundred and ninety-four thousand seven hundred and eleven dollars). Number of orders received by mail and express, 7000—it sums varying from $1 to $200. The orders were executed from, and the goods sent in return to, places all the way from the "Falls" to Nebraska, and from the Lakes to Cape of New York. We also give you a list of some of the articles SOLD BY US for one hundred per month of November, as taken from our books:

1407 Piece Brown and Bleached Sheeting, average 42 yards to a piece, retail price 30 cents per yard.
56 Wool Long Shawls.
69 Paire Wool Blankets.
310 Dozen Ladies' Linen Hemstitch Shawls, retail price $3
30 Cashmere Long Shawls.
177 Paire Lace Curtains.
5 Pieces of Wool Carpeting, 90 yards each.
11 Pieces Brussels, 90 yards each.
46 Silver Hunting-case Watches.
1193 Wool Long Shawls.
1464 Pieces Hemp Carpeting, 25 yards each.
6 Silver Tea Sets, each pieces of 6 pieces each.
1476 Silver-plated Castors.
1479 Watches.

If additional proof is desired as to the equitable manner in which we conduct our promises, and the satisfaction given our patrons thereby, we shall gladly furnish references to those who have received their goods from us. In the month of September, 1867, we made a contract for the delivery of Hemstitch Shawls, to be delivered in such quantities as we might call for within the year. The quality of goods as those sold by jobbers at wholesale for $3 per dozen, and of which we have since sold in Boston and New York at $2 each. By taking so large a quantity we obtained them at a price which permits us to sell them at $1 each, and leaves us a small profit. Other articles we offer have been obtained in a similar manner. In domestic our House absorbs the entire production of one Mill.

But we think we have offered evidence enough to convince you that we can obtain dollar for dollar for every article purchased from us.

Yours, WELLS & CO.,
Nos. 104 and 106 Nassau St., Boston, Mass.
☞ We will send circulars to any address.

EMPLOYMENT.—$15 to $30 per day guaranteed. Male or Female Agents wanted to sell superior two-thread, Lock-stitch Family Sewing Machine. Address JAMES C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

THE BEST IN EXISTENCE.

Any Number can be taken out without disturbing the rest, and inserted in any other being no perforation. "Efficiency, applicable for "Harper's Bazar," with the Patent Index.
Harper & Brothers "have pronounced the Clarke's Binder the best in the market."
Frank Leslie says "the best in the market."
Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1.25.
JOHN C. CLARKE, Publisher, Jersey City, N. J.
Trade supplied by the American News Co., N. Y.

CLARKE'S IMPROVED 36 BINDER

Presidential Campaign Opened for 1868.

Samples of five different kinds of elegant Grant Campaign Medals and Fine sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1. Agents wanted. Address HOWARD & HITCHCOCK, Headquarters for Campaign Goods, 39 Spring St., corner of St. Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT.—Male or Females employed in Picture business. Large profits; no risk. 100 sample pictures and catalogue sent free for 15 cents postage. J. A. REEVES & CO., 76 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE OLD WORLD IN ITS NEW FACE. IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE IN 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $2.75.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.
FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y.

The above work sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the World."

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JUNE, 1868.

CONTENTS:

LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN, AND HOW WE WON IT. Illustrations.—Signal Rock, Lookout Mountain.—General Hooker, the Hero of Lookout Mountain.—Hooker's Position in the Battle.—View of the "Palisades" of Lookout Mountain.—Plan of the Battle of Lookout Mountain.—Scene in the Valley on Side of the Mountain.—Ruins of the White House.—Rebel Wagon at the White House.—Scaling the Palisades.—Raising the Flag on the Summit.—Camp, Harper's Weekly," and its Garrison.—Rebel Flag-Staff on Lookout Mountain.—The Pet Mascot.—Hooker's Position in Lookout Valley.—Saddle Rock.—Lula Lake.—Lula Falls.

SPRING CLOTHS.

AMONG THE ANDES OF PERU AND BOLIVIA. By E. G. SQUIER.

Illustrations.—Shrine of Nuestra Señora de Copacabana, Bolivia.—View of the Bay of Copacabana, Lake Titicaca.—Scene cut in the Rock at Copacabana.—The "Bath of the Incas," Copacabana.—View from the "Lake Island" of Titicaca in the Distance.—Balsa Navigation on Lake Titicaca.—Plan of Ancient Buildings at the Landing, Island of Titicaca.—Niche in Ruins at Landing, Island of Titicaca.—The Sacred Rock of Manco Capac.—Pila or Fountain of the Incas, Titicaca.—Ancient View of the Palace of the Inca," Island of Titicaca.—Ground-Plan of "Palace of the Inca," Island of Titicaca.—Island of Coati and the "Crown of the Andes," from Esplanade of Palace of the Incas.—Plan of Ancient Buildings, Chambers in the "Palace of the Inca."—The Inca's Chair, Island of Titicaca.—Ancient Towers, Acora, Peru.—Ancient Sepulchers, Acora, Peru.—Plan of Ancient Cyclopia.—Section of Round Cyclopia.—Plan of Round Cyclopia.—Section of Round Cyclopia.

IMMIGRATION.

SHOOTING STARS, DETONATING METEORS, AND AEROLITES. By PROF. ELIAS LOOMIS.

Illustrations.—Meteor which Burst in Air.—Meteor which Burst with an Explosion.—The Number of Meteors seen at Greenwich, November, 1866.—Meteoric Paths, November, 1866.—The Number of Meteors seen at Greenwich, November 14, 1867.—Orbit of the November Meteors.—Orbit of the third Comet of 1866.—Orbit of the Tempest Meteor, August 9, 1866.—Meteor with a long Train.—Form of the Train after Three Minutes.—Form of the Train after Sixteen Minutes.—Path of Weston Meteor, December 1, 1807.—Meteoric Aerolite Crossing Aerolite.—Santa Rosa Aerolite.—La Caille Aerolite.—Aerolite Shower.—Structure of Bohemian Aerolite.—Structure of Texas Aerolite.

DANDELION.

MILLY'S MISHAPS.

THREE VIEWS OF THE SAME THINGS.

THE SIEGE OF LUCKNOW.

TRINITY SHAKON.

SOLDIERS' RATIONS.

THE NEW TMOTHY.—Part II.

MARTHA'S VINEYARD.

THE LAW OF FREEDOM: A LOVE STORY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."[a] ed ILLUSTRATIONS.—Forsaken.—Mrs. Ellerton's Return.—Julius and Edna.—Mrs. William Stedman.—Mrs. Ellerton's Return.

ENGLISH PHOTOGRAPHS BY AN AMERICAN.

WOMAN'S BEAUTY: HOW TO GET AND KEEP IT.

THE BALTIMORE PLOT TO ASSASSINATE ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

Owes an account for its success only by the simple fact that it meets precisely the popular taste, faithfully presenting the attractive variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A Complete Pictorial History of the Times."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the story of "THE WOMAN'S KINGDOM," by DINAH MULOCK.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

It is now being published "The Cord and Cross," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

THE BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will always become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, one year, one year, $10 00; or either two of them, to one address for one year, $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either HARPER'S MAGAZINE or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE Subscribers at $4 00 each; or, six copies for $20 00; Eight Copies for $26 00.

☞ POSTAGE.—Periodicals will be delivered to City Subscribers without extra charge.

Back Numbers can be supplied at any time.

A complete SET of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, now comprising Thirty-five Volumes, in neat cloth binding, will be sent by express, freight at expense of purchaser, for $36 per volume. Single volumes, by mail, postpaid, $2 25. Cloth cases, for binding, 50 cents, by mail, postpaid.

The Annual Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY, in neat cloth binding, will be sent by express, free of expense, for $7 00 each. Cloth cases, for binding, 50 cents, by mail, postpaid.

 Subscriptions sent from British North American Provinces must be accompanied with 20 cents ADDITIONAL, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, and 24 cents ADDITIONAL for the MAGAZINE, to prepay United States postage.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion. For a less number than Three, each insertion, 25 cents.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Interior districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (Black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best at $1 00.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 00.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN (uncolored), 50c., $1, best $1 10 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25, best $1 40 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 25c. per pound, and guarantee to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club buy one copy of this paper, and select the kind and price from our Price List as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is completed send us the list, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution —each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transporting the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by freight to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. Special inducements to any parties for clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that attempt to counterfeit our Establishment, or copy our name in either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or institutions. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

AVOID POISON.

Invalid reader, do you know what nine-tenths of the bitter compounds you are solicited by the proprietors to accept as universal panaceas are composed of? Give head for a moment. They are manufactured from impurified alcohol, containing a considerable portion of fusil oil—a poison almost as deadly as prussic acid. The basis of the regular tinctures of the Materia Medica is the same. No amount of "herbal extracts" can overcome the deadly energy of this pernicious element. The essence of sound Rye, thoroughly rectified, is the only stimulant which can be safely used as a component of a bitter, alterative, or tonic medicine, and HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is the only medicinal preparation in the world in which this article is used as an ingredient. Hence the extraordinary effects of this great specific. It gives strength without producing excitement. No other tonic does this. All the ordinary Bitters flash the face and affect the brain. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS diffuses an agreeable calm through the nervous system, promotes digestion, and produces sleep. No other tonic so quickly revives the exhausted physical energies, restores the appetite and removes the gloom and depression, which always accompanies weakness of the bodily powers. It purges from the system the morbid humors which retard its natural functions, and which bring paleness to the cheek and fever to the blood. In short, whatever those clogs upon pleasure, restores the system to high health, and necessarily pursues it with a vigilant to the digestive organs. A trial is all that is needed to establish it in the confidence of the skeptic.

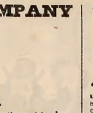
AGENTS WANTED—FOR THE best and most reliable PICTURE OF GRANT, by Hon. J. T. HEADLEY. Now ready. In one handsome Vol. $150. Also just issued THE NATIONAL HAND-BOOK of Facts and Figures from the foundation of the Government to the present time. 608 pages $1.50. Sent Post paid. E. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED AGENTS To sell by sample a combined SQUARE, LEVEL, and DEVIL. Great inducements offered. County rights for sale on most liberal terms. For particulars, address

W. S. BATCHELDER & CO., Pittsburg, Pa.

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE MIRROR AND FARMER, a weekly paper published at Manchester, N. H. in the interest of FARMING AND FAMILY PAPER in the Eastern States. It is the largest circulation of any New England Weekly Tribune. Specimen copies sent free upon receipt of a two-cent stamp to prepay postage. Terms of advertising: Ten Cents for a line of space each insertion. Less rates made as the time or space exceeds Dollars per column single insertion.



JOHN CLARKE, Editor and Proprietor.

"ECONOMY is Wealth."—Franklin. Why will people pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when $20 will buy a better one for all practical purposes? Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, the subscribers beg to inform their numerous friends that the "FRANKLIN" and "DIAMOND" Machines can be had in any quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Table, constructed upon entirely new principles, and DOES NOT infringe upon any other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of patrons will testify. 25" AGENTS WANTED. All sent out on Agents on trial, and terms given to families who are needy and deserving. Address

J. C. GUTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made in our own Factory, from the best manufacturing and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to their best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one is warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Ladies' and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for use, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold for wear, for sale at low prices. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges on goods paid when the goods are delivered.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has grown to such large proportions, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances asserting that they are made by us. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering direct of us.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

IF A HUMBUG,

What a wonder
That the doors
Are open still—
Diver since the
First of August
Thousands have Pain Paint applied.
Those who lie,
Or call it humbug,
Are the doctors,
Not ourselves.
For they always
Have been jealous
When their patients
Use Pain Paint.
Pile up facts
As high as mountains,
Flash the truth
Before their eyes:
But the cry
Is always humbug;
Men of science
Call it humbug.

Pain Paint has been tested free of cost over six months every day on Sundays, at No. 19 Chatham Square, New York, for the removal and cure of all manner of pain and soreness. The office is constantly crowded with patients, rain or shine, and yet fools are found who will persist to lie and call it humbug. Yet every person who buys Pain Paint, or tries it free of charge, finds it out, and who call it humbug tell a falsehood. All such lies, like chickens, come home to roost. What is your reputation is "measured" by their well-known opposition to Wolcott's Pain Paint.

AMPHION:

A Collection of Four, Five, and Six Part Songs, for MALE VOICES, Original and Selected. Words edited by H. A. CLARKE. Music selected and arranged by J. E. GOULD and H. A. CLARKE. Opera Chorus Book. "Sacred Chorus Book," etc. Complete in Two Books —Piano Score and Separate Vocal Parts. Price, Complete, $1 25 of Vocal Parts. $4; Separate Vocal Parts, each, $1 of Piano Score, $2. Mailed postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston; CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, N. Y.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an excellent Puzzle. Sent, with a beautifully Colored Toy, will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents, by W. ADAMS, 102 Nassau St., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and money. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.

DAVID WATSON, 43 Adams Press Co., 29 Courtlandt Street, New York.

THE DOLLAR WATCH.—The Magnetic Pocket Time Keeper, in Nickel Silver, handsome case, perfect crystal, white dial, steel and metal works, watch size, good one year. Sent by mail, post paid, for $1. Also, two years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Sent by mail for $1 1 for 25, or by Express, C. O. D., on receipt of order. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

ACCORDEONS. The new improved Tube Accordeon, with ten keys and our tremolo stop, sent to any address, with instruction book, on receipt of $18, $19, and $20. C. BRUNO & SAENGER & CO., Manufacturers, 350 Bowery, New York.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made: 5 New Patents received.
MARTINGALE RINGS, $18 and $20 single gross.
SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross.
BILLIARD BALLS, $9 and $10 per set.
CHECKERS, $15 and $17 per 100.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, 334 Broadway, N. Y.
WM. M. WELLING, 671 Broadway, New York.

Greatest Curiosity of the 19th Century.

WONDERFUL ELECTRIC FISH. It pleases all. Price, 50 cents per Dz. and upwards; 2 for 50c. Address the inventor, NATHAN HALL, West Millbury, Mass.

☞ Agents wanted in every part of the world.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 502 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S reversible sewing Machines are the most-prized reliable Machines. Examine different styles, or send stamp for circular to Depot, 502 Broadway.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Building.

CONCERTINAS. A splendid Concertina, with 20 keys, tremolo, or organ tuner, with a complete instruction book, sent to any address on receipt of $8, $7, and $10, or C.O.D. I. SAENGER & CO., Manufacturers, 350 Bowery, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Ready:

I.

BELLOWS'S OLD WORLD. The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

II.

LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. With a Collection of Meteorological Tables. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and Author of a "Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $3 00.

III.

KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Scripture History and the Book of Psalms. By FREDERICK WILLIAM KRUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite," etc. Translated by and by express Sanction of the Author by the Rev. M. G. EASTON, B.A. With a Letter from Dr. Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reigns of Charles IX., Henry III., and Henry IV. By HORACE WHITE, M.A., Ph.D. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book." Revised by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

VI.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. Vols. Two—1609. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," Complete in Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

VII.

BARNES'S THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS. History of the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States. By WILLIAM BARNES, A.M., Author of "The Body Politic," &c. With Eighteen Steel Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

VIII.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1868. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, 81 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

IX.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. Which are now published and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Ornamental Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

Uniform with Queen Victoria's Memorial of the Prince Consort.

X.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

XI.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BRAKESPEARE; or, The Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

POOR HUMANITY. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Carlyle's Wife," "Grandmother's Money," "Curry's Confession," "No Man's Friend," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c., &c. The Sequel to "Birds of Prey." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SCORNER OR LATER. By SARAH BROOKE. Author of "The Rose Garden," "Illustrated by Lucy Maitland." 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

MY HUSBAND'S CRIME. With Illustrations by GARNOCK DU NOYER. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ONE OF THE FAMILY. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BROWNLOWS. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ELEVATION—AT THE WHITE HOUSE. DEPRESSION—AT THE TRIBUNE OFFICE.

EFFECT OF THE VOTE ON THE ELEVENTH ARTICLE OF IMPEACHMENT.

"The Pen Is Mightier than the Sword."

MORTON'S GOLD PENS

DO NOT WEAR OUT.

A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

BY THEIR USE
THE LABOR OF WRITING IS REDUCED,
Greater Uniformity is Obtained.
Ease, Elegance and Beauty are acquired
ECONOMY, PLEASURE AND PROFIT CONSULTED.
The Best, Cheapest and most Durable Instruments for Writing ever used.

SENT BY MAIL SAFELY.
Prices, Fifty Cents and upward.

NO TRAVELING AGENTS EMPLOYED.
Call and you will find Pens exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, or enclose stamp for circular
A. MORTON,
25 MAIDEN LANE,
NEW YORK.

THE GREAT MYSTERY.
PLANCHETTE.
Patent secured. Manufactured and for sale by KIRBY & CO., 693 Broadway, N.Y. Send for a Circular.

WOODWARD'S
Country Homes.
120 Designs, $1 50, postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect,
191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

Steel Collars, enameled white, mailed on receipt of $1. Billon & Fogwell, Mfrs., 78 Nassau St., N.Y.

One Ounce of Gold
Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. BABBITT'S Low Cooper." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a One Dollar Greenback. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

(LOCKE'S PATENTS.)
SELF-LIGHTING GAS BURNER
TURN THE KEY, AND THE GAS IS LIGHTED.
Applied to any Gas Fixtures without alteration.
NO ELECTRICITY. NO FRICTION. NO MATCHES
Price $1 each. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1. Liberal discount to the trade.
New York and Brooklyn Agency,
P. S. SANDERSON, Manager,
No. 661 Broadway, opp. Bond St., N. Y. City.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Sent.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

WALTHAM WATCHES
AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.
Silver Hunting Watches $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases . . . $60
Gold Hunting Watches. Ladies' Size $70
Each Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Co. Watches sent by Express, C.O.D., with privilege to examine before paying. Every one in want of a reliable time-keeper is requested to write for our descriptive price-list. Address in full
HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N.Y.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!
Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-plated Ware, Cooking Utensils,
CHINA AND GLASS WARE,
at greatly reduced prices.
JASSFORD'S,
Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

TRY
B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,
MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.
Cures Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.
If your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS
Forty thou sand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

DRUNKENNESS CURED
By UPHAM'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1.25 by S. C. UPHAM, 28 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

Live in My Heart
And Pay No Rent. New Song . . . . . 30c.
The Eve that Brightens when I Come. . . . . 30c.
Pulling Hard Against the Stream . . . . . 30c.
Dress of the Ball—Waltzes—Godfrey . . . . . 40c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 10c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 Broadway, Branch, 208 Bowery. 52 door above 25th St.

DRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed free by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

AGENTS WANTED.
PEOPLE in want of, and AGENTS who are selling all kinds of goods, Machines, etc., are requested to address me (with stamp) for greatly reduced prices and terms. J. K. PHILLIPS, 105 Jamestown, Mass.

DRUNKARD, STOP! C. C. BEERS, M.D., 36 Harrison Ave., Boston, has a medicine that has cured thousands of Intemperance. It is recommended by Judge Russell, and many others. Send stamp for circular.

ASK FOR A
WALTHAM WATCH.
It is the Best. It is the Cheapest.
T. B. BYNNER, No. 180 Broadway, New York.

GARDEN ADORNMENTS
VASES, FOUNTAINS, STATUARY, &c.,
IN IRON AND TERRA COTTA.
CHASE & CO.,
No. 824 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

New Spring Goods
FOR GENTLEMEN.
ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.
UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, everywhere, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $100 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which more than amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, Pa., or BOSTON, Mass.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties selling off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT
The man who told the Doctor that "he felt as if he didn't want to do any thing" was accused of laziness. Yet thousands experience this feeling—especially in summer—in consequence of a disordered condition of the stomach, which a few refreshing draughts of TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT would be sure to remedy.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

WARD'S SHIRTS
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars, sent free every where. THE CASH can be paid to Express Company on receipt of goods. 637 Broadway and Union Square; also 387 Broadway, N.Y.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN.

One Forward and two Backward Arches, ensuring great strength, our balanced elasticity, ease of point, and smoothness of execution. Sold by all Stationers. One gross of these Pens in a Beautiful Gold Pen. One dozen Steel Pens (assorted points) and Patent Ink-stand Holder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 and 113 William St., N.Y.

FOULAIS & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 489 Broadway, near Broome St., & 27 John St., near Nassau. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5246.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!
Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in both MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us, with certainty and dispatch, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Price-List sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & BURR, Clothing Warehouse, 124 Fulton St., and 10 Nassau St., N. Y.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,
As Imported for N. Y. Union Club.
TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway,
Publisher and Importer of
SCIENTIFIC WORKS,
has just issued a new General Catalogue of Books, 48 pages, octavo. Sent by mail on application.

PARIS, 1867.

Cheap, Useful, and Elegant.
"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINIUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"
The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOPF'S PATENT PEOPLE'S WATCH."
The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by rescript of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.
Not responsible for money not enclosed in letters.
Address JULES D. RUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

WARD'S CLOTH LINED PAPER COLLARS AND CUFFS.
TO BE HAD EVERYWHERE.
RETAIL: Corner of Union Square and Broadway. Also, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL: 387 Broadway, New York.

500 Photographs for 10 Cents. Address A. SEYMOUR & CO., Box 57, Station A, N. Y. City.

SOMETHING NEW.
The BALLARD BREECH-LOADING SHOT-GUN.
This gun, so much called for, is now ready for delivery. Price, $25 00. Sent, securely packed, on receipt of price. Also the well-known BALLARD RIFLES, the Southerner Pistols, Pepper Boxes, and American Metallic Ammunition, all sizes. Superior quality. Send for circular. Address NEWTON, TAYLOR & SIMPKINS, Sole Agents, 302 Broadway, New York. After May 1st, 193 Broadway.
P. S.—A full assortment of all goods in our line.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.
Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents; six do., $5.00, postage 27 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 48 cts. Sold by all druggists.
TURNER BROS. & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

CHEAP EDITION
OF
QUEEN VICTORIA'S BOOKS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published
The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort,
Compiled, under the direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Two Portraits.
Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861.
To which are prefixed and added
Extracts from the same Journal,
From 1862 to 1865.
Giving an account of
EARLIER VISITS TO SCOTLAND, AND TOURS IN ENGLAND AND IRELAND, AND YACHTING EXCURSIONS.
ENGRAVINGS. EDITED BY ARTHUR HELPS.
Cheap Edition. 12mo, Paper. 25 Cents Each.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XII.—No. 597.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

CHICAGO, MAY 21, 1868.

TOO LATE.

ONLY a dreamful slumber,
But high has soared the sun;
Only a moment wasted,
A duty left undone.
Only a word unspoken
(Was thine the blame, oh Fate?),
Only a promise broken,
Only an hour too late.
Only a half-heard whisper
Instead of laughter sweet;
Only a stranger shadow
Where once fell gentle feet.
Only the close-drawn curtains
Around a quiet bed;
Only the white hands folded,
Only the peaceful dead.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1868.

☞ HARPER'S PERIODICALS will be delivered to City Subscribers without extra charge.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

WITHIN the last month the Republican party has fully vindicated its right and capacity to govern the country at this time. It has shown a genuine patriotism, its high principle, and its good sense. It has proved that it is not to be diverted from its true purpose and its best policy by a feeling which is really foreign to its character and convictions. The sagacity which is justly essential to political success has directed its action during the late very perilous crisis, and the party is now incalculably stronger and surer of triumph than it has been for some months past. And this is because the great body of the party has spoken by its immediate representatives.

In the first place, the action of the Republican Senators upon the impeachment showed that the judicial record of the President could not be made a mere party issue. Some of the ablest and most incorruptible Senators refused to prostitute themselves to the mere tools of party despotism against their sincere convictions and their oath. The Democratic Senators, on the other hand, members of a party which has always treated the oath to the country and humanity as more pardonable than difference with party dictation, voted throughout the trial as if impeachment were a mere party measure. The Republican Senate divided according to their honest opinions. A party which, under the circumstances, and by some of its best representatives, refused to publish reckoning at a possible party advantage, shows that it has both the sagacity and the conscience which are indispensable to a true national welfare.

In the second place, the General Convention of the party, despite the peculiar pressure of the situation and the ease with which great bodies of men are apt to be swept toward hot expressions and extreme measures, pointedly refused to follow the counsel of the unwisest men in the party, and would not brand as traitors those who had dared to be true to themselves in the midst of a hurricane of the foulest slander. It is noticeable also that those who were most eager that this course should be pursued, were not, politically speaking, primitive Christians, but Latter-Day Saints. They were perhaps anxious to establish their orthodoxy by a zeal. But the Convention generously recognized their devotion without following their advice.

In the third place, the General Assembly of the Republican party denounced "all forms of Repudiation as a national crime," and declared that the national honor requires the payment of the national debt, "not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted." This most explicit declaration shows, as we have always contended, that Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS and General BUTLER no more represented in this matter the principle and the policy of the Republican party than Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The unanimous immense enthusiasm with which this declaration was received is one of the most cheering signs of the moral tone of the party.

In the fourth place, the same wisdom that inspired the expressions of the Convention controlled its organization and its nominations. The presence of Mr. SCHURZ, the temporary Chairman, was worthy of the occasion and of the party. It was dignified in manner and tone, and, disdaining any appeal to prejudice or mere party-spirit, nobly asserted the fundamental principles of the Government as maintained by the party. General HAWLEY, the permanent President, is a man of spotless character, and a soldier of the utmost gallantry, a fit representative of the profound conviction, the energy and ardor of the party. No presiding officer could have been selected more justly satisfactory; and his speech was an admirable counterpart in spirit of that of Mr. SCHURZ, reciting in a few terse, ringing sentences the humane and ennobling principles that mould the Republican policy.

Of the nominations we speak elsewhere. It is clear that unless the loyal majority of American citizens are sorry that the war was victoriously ended, and sigh to return again to the dreary days when there was the form only, not the fact, of union, they will see in the brief, wise, and harmonious action of the representatives fresh from the Republican sentiment of every State, and in the manly adherence to honest conviction and to the sanctity of the oaths upon the part of Republican Senators, the evidences of the vigor, purity, and practical sagacity of the great dominant party of justice and humanity, which, with organization and energy, is sure to win as great and glorious a victory at the polls as GRANT and the hundreds of thousands of brave soldiers and sailors achieved in battle.

GRANT AND COLFAX.

"GENTLEMEN of the Convention, you have six hundred and fifty votes, and you have given six hundred and fifty votes for General ULYSSES S. GRANT." So said General HAWLEY, the President of the Republican National Convention of 1868, which was not, like the Democratic Chicago Convention of 1864, a Convention resolved to surrender at discretion, but resolved upon the "unconditional surrender" of the enemy. The Convention had its instructions long before it met. They came from the grateful heart of a loyal people. They came from those who have given all things, time, labor, money, their heart's affections, and their life's joy, that the country might be saved and a Government founded upon justice established. They came from those who did not think the long and terrible war an event to be at once forgotten—from those who know that its causation was the bad vital, from those who are resolved that its results shall be secure and abiding. They came from those who mean that at last there shall be a true Union, not the mocking name merely, and who know that such a Union can have but one corner-stone, and that is the equal rights of all men.

From such feelings and convictions and purposes came the instructions of the Convention, and they had already expressed themselves in the name of one man as the type of fidelity, the name of simplicity, sagacity, honesty, and persistence, have all been displayed in the most illustrious career of the time; whom no political contests or differences could affect, whose personal ambition betrayed; a man in whose detraction malice spends itself in vain, and in whose defamation the most skilful falsehood is at once detected. It is the name which from the moment that the war ended by the surrender of LEE, that, unless this nation were unlike all other nations, and unless the people were suddenly struck with the madness and capacity of its great hero, it would insist upon offering him the highest honor it could command.

The wisdom of that instinct has been constantly confirmed by the experience of the last five years. The position of General GRANT has inevitably led to the trying of the most momentous trials. The President, betraying his party and the cause victorious in the war, has sought to make use of the character and popularity and fame of the General, and has been in every case signally and hopelessly baffled. The General's conduct, although often most bitterly assailed by the party of duty because of the arts of traitors and its censors and proved to be of true service to the country and to the great cause. Yet all has been done as tranquilly and unostentatiously as if the country and the party and fanny doing his duty at the most obscure post. The hold of such a man upon the heart of such a people as this, can not be shaken. We have seen the Democratic party fury assailing him in every pitiful and malicious way, the air will be thick with aspersions and hum with lies; but all of them will drop lifeless in the dust, and from the great heart of the people that trusts him—the people that in electing him President continue the line of WASHINGTON and LINCOLN.

The selection of SCHUYLER COLFAX for the Vice-Presidency was most fortunate. With one exception, there was something to be seriously urged against all the other gentlemen named; but against COLFAX, as General GRANT remarked, all that can be said is that he is a Republican. To the highest personal character, to integrity upon which no breath has ever breathed, he adds great political experience and sagacity, strong political conviction, and an honest party fidelity, which the country and the party and humanity which have made him universally popular and have conciliated the regard of his political opponents. However warm the feeling of the friends of the other candidates, no selection could have been made which was sure to excite so little hostility as that of Mr. COLFAX; and the country will be content with whatever may happen the fidelity of SCHUYLER COLFAX will be always as conspicuous as the sagacity of ANDREW JOHNSON.

It is not surprising that the nomination of such candidates has aroused universal enthusiasm among all truly loyal men, and startled with the sure instinct of overwhelming defeat the disorganized and demoralized Democracy. Indeed the word Democracy is a standing satire upon the party that claims it—a Democracy that tramples upon equal rights and strives to perpetuate a political aristocracy. Let the watch-word of the Republican Party, the old guard of the Union, be Union. Let the differences that have separated upon minor points those who cherish the same fundamental political faith be buried out of sight, and with the same sublime unity with which we moved to victory during the war let us now advance resistlessly to secure that victory.

THE DISSENTING SENATORS.

WHOEVER has read the opinions of Senators FESSENDEN, GRIMES, and TRUMBULL, however he may regret the conclusions to which they come, will not deny the ability, dignity, and candor with which their views are stated. They all know the storm of obloquy that was sure to follow their action, but they leave no doubt that, however they may differ with many of their party friends upon the particular point involved in the Impeachment, they are still in hearty sympathy with the great purposes of the party.

Senator GRIMES said:

"MR. JOHNSON'S character as a statesman, his relations to political parties, his conduct as a citizen, his efforts at reconstruction, the exercise of his pardoning power, the character of his appointments, and the influences under which they were made, are not before us on any charges, and are not impugned by our testimony. Nor can I suffer my judgment of the law governing this case to be influenced by political considerations. I can not agree to destroy the harmonious working of the Constitution for the sake of getting rid of an unacceptable President. Whatever may be my opinion of the President, I can not consider his title with the high office he holds. I can do nothing which, by implication, may be construed into an approval of impeachment as a part of future political machinery. However widely, therefore, I may and do differ with the President in respect to his political views and measures, and however deeply I have regretted, and do regret, the difference between himself and the Congress of the United States, I am not able to record my vote that he is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors for those differences. I am acting in a judicial capacity, under conditions whose binding obligations I can not exceed or evade, and I must act according to the best of my ability and judgment, and as God shall give me light, according to their dictates, the President is guilty, I must say so; if, according to their dictates, the President is not guilty, I must say so."

Senator FESSENDEN said:

"The people have not heard the evidence as we have heard it. The responsibility is not upon them. It is upon us. We have taken an oath to do impartial justice according to the Constitution and the laws. I have endeavored to do it. I can not render judgment upon their conviction, nor can they transfer to themselves my responsibility. I can not, even if I would, consider myself undeserving of the confidence that the just and intelligent people imposed upon me in the great office which I now occupy. I have a place among honorable men, if, for any fear of public reproach, I can trifle with my sworn duty and vote upon what I should disregard the conviction of my judgment and my conscience. The consequences will never follow. Far from conviction or acquittal, are not for me, with my convictions, to consider. The future is in the hands of Him who alone governs the universe, and the fear that He will not govern it wisely and well would not excuse me for a violation of His law."

Senator TRUMBULL said:

"In coming to the conclusion that the President is not guilty of any of the high crimes and misdemeanors with which articles of impeachment have been presented to the country, I have endeavored to be governed by the case made without reference to other matters of fact not contained in the record, and without giving the least heed to the clamor of intemperate zealots who demand the conviction of Andrew Johnson at all hazards, and who, if they can not so identify with and make responsible for his acts those who from conscientious motives of duty differ with them, can make no vote for his acquittal. His speeches and the general course of his administration have been so distasteful to me as to any one, and I should consider it the great calamity of the age if the principles avowed, so often condemned by the people, should gain political ascendency. If the question was, is ANDREW JOHNSON a person fit to be President, I should answer no; but it is not a party question, nor upon ANDREW JOHNSON'S death can you get a man so far as they are made to appear in the record, that I am to decide. . . . In view of the consequences [leaving out of the case those of a personal character], that may result in conviction on what my judgment tells me are insufficient charges and proofs, I tremble for the fate of my country. I can not be an instrument to produce such a result; and as the hazard of the lies even of friendship and affection, till calmer times shall do justice to my motives, no alternative is left me but the inflexible discharge of duty."

Any party would be infinitely poorer which should lose the sympathy and support of such men; and a party which should formally expel them from its membership would forfeit the support of the most intelligent and honest of its friends.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

THE Platform of the Chicago Convention—which we print elsewhere—is a frank, simple, and satisfactory statement of the great principles of the Republican party. It does not evade nor equivocate. It applauds reconstruction upon the condition of equality of civil and political rights. It declares plainly that "every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice" demanded the guaranty by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men in the South. Finally, while in the first place the subject properly belongs to the people of those States. This is the principle upon which the whole reconstruction policy is founded. Either the loyal people had a right to secure upon Republican principles the Union which they had maintained, and in some of the States of which they must initiate civil government, or they had not. If they had not, the war was a criminal blunder. If they had—and in the very nature of the case they did have—this right, they have used it wisely. There is no point upon which the party may more safely go to the country. There is none upon which the intelligence of the people is more unanimous.

The Platform, as we have remarked elsewhere, trenchantly denounces all forms of Repudiation as a national crime; declares that taxation should be equalized, and should be reduced as rapidly as the national faith will permit. It truly states that the ill-repute of our national credit which compels us to pay high rates of interest is due to the threats of repudiation, partial or total, open or covert. It asserts as a permanent policy the principle that naturalized citizens must be every where protected as if they were native born; and declares that the legal bounties and pensions of the soldiers and sailors are binding obligations. The Platform further expresses sympathy with "all oppressed peoples," and hopes for a liberal and just policy in promoting immigration; calls for strict economy, and condemns the corruptions of ANDREW JOHNSON'S administration.

There is a long arraignment of the President, and an approval of the impeachment and of the vote of the thirty-five Senators. A simple expression of condemnation of the course of the President would have been better. But we know how very ardent was the wish of many delegates to excommunicate in violent language the Republican Senators who differed from their brethren, and how very difficult it is to resist such an impulse upon such an occasion. Mr. JOHN COCHRANE and Mr. HENRY S. SANFORD were urged to smite the Senators directly or indirectly. Mr. COCHRANE by a direct censure, and Mr. SANFORD by urging the repudiation of the principle of the 12th section of the resolutions of the National Council of the Union League, denouncing Messrs. FESSENDEN, GRIMES, TRUMBULL, and others, and their action. The Convention was too just to authorize such an aspersion, and both efforts failed; Mr. COCHRANE, indeed, withdrawing his proposition at the unanimous request of the New York delegation.

The Convention unanimously added to the Platform two resolutions proposed by Mr. SCHURZ, the first heartily recording the conduct of the late adherents of the rebellion who now sincerely co-operate in the restoration of the Union upon the basis of justice and harmony, and the second for the removal of all political disabilities at the South as fast as is consistent with the safety of the loyal people; and an appeal addressed to the people by the Declaration of Independence the true foundation of democratic government. These resolutions properly express the true magnanimity of a victorious party, decided and secure, as nothing of rebels who have been conquered, but honest acquiescence in the legitimate consequences of victory.

The Platform as it stands is a most admirable and vigorous manifest of principles adapted to the situation of the country. It is plain and decisive; and it is not surprising that General GRANT declared himself to be perfectly satisfied with it. The Republican party has given its word, and it will fulfill it.

HOW WE ARE CHEATED.

THE Government of the United States pays more for peace and order than any citizen. The internal scramble for office, the doctrine and practice of spoils to the victor, corrupt our politics more than any other causes; nor is it possible to see any end to the corruption and extravagance and consequent extreme peril of the work, unless great system in some such reform as that proposed by Mr. JOSEPH MEDILL, early in his CIVIL SERVICE Bill. The speech with which he presented the bill states very clearly and strikingly the actual situation and the necessity of the reform, and the bill itself is a wise and self-reflecting man who does not sincerely wish the passage of the bill.

It is very simple. It establishes a Department of the Civil Service, of which the Vice-President is to be the head, and provides that all officers of that service, except postmasters and such as are required to be appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate, shall be made from qualified persons. It further provides a Board of four Commissioners, who are to determine all grades of qualification, examination, and promotion in each branch of the service. They may also designate what offices may be filled by women as well as males; and require any officer in service at the passage of the act, except those already mentioned, to pass an examination; and may judge any already guilty of misconduct and ineffectiveness. By such a thorough organization of the Civil Service system, whose members are more numerous than the whole army and navy united, the Government can obtain double the amount of the present service at two-thirds of the present expense. The Committee estimate that the saving in the expense of collecting the revenue will be half of its present cost, which is fifteen millions of dollars, and that, with an able, active, and self-respecting body of officers, an additional amount of at least fifty millions in the internal revenue, and twenty-five millions in the customs, may be saved. Nor is this in the least an unreasonable estimate, when we remember the notorious official incapacity and corruption and consequent evasion which now prevails.

MR. JENCKES very properly counts upon the enormous gain both in the economy and the character of the civil service by introducing the same sentiment of honor and esprit de corps that prevail in the service of arms. "Who," he asks, "ever loads his declarations with cases of peculation among the officers of the army and navy? Who ever charges them with connivance at stealing? Who thinks of exacting bonds of an admiral or surveyor from the commander of a department? And why? Because their honor and the good of the service are one. The admiral of a fleet may distance more than the captain of a port receives; but how different is the position of each in the national service! I desire to see the collector of a port or of a district raised to a position similar to that of a general or a commodore." This is certainly not an extravagant desire; and unless we are willing to admit that ignorance and insatiable cupidity with party devotion are qualifications for a multitude of the most important public employments, we shall cordially agree with MR. JENCKES, and see that the way to begin the reform is to prescribe by law qualification of character and capacity.

The Civil Service Bill contemplates a truly conservative policy. We do not mean that conservatism of Kearney Hall, the City Hall, and the Ring, but the conservatism of economy, prudence, and intelligence. The other conservatism, that Tammany and Mozart school, is intrenched in ignorance and consequent corruption and extravagance. There are few proprietors who against which it would more zealously struggle than against that of MR. JENCKES; for imagine the consternation that a practical enforcement of the Jeffersonian principle of capacity and honesty in every grade of the public service would produce among the office-holders and seekers who call themselves Democrats, because they vote the ticket which the Ring dictates and Tammany proclaims! But the bill would immensely strengthen the foundations of the Government by stimulating education and making official fidelity and industry essential. It would palpably reduce taxation and help to pay the debt. It would remove much of the dangerous bitterness from our political contests, and elevate them from the battle for the spoils into a contest of principles. There is no bill before Congress of more vital importance, and we hope for the speedy passage of a law that can not be plausibly opposed.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM AND THE HOPE OF THE SOUTH.

IN adopting the resolutions of CARL SCHURZ, of which we have elsewhere spoken, the Republican party has shown its earnest desire to complete the harmonious restoration of the Union, and to aid the Southern States in contributing once more to the general prosperity. The action of the Convention was both politic and magnanimous. The value of the products of those States to the common welfare was so great, as is well known, that the Secessionists counted upon it as a lever to induce the recognition and persuade the alliance of foreign Powers.

The natural resources of the Southern States are greater than those of the North, and the products far more varied in character. But those resources have never been developed as they might have been. Lands have been allowed to run to waste and wear out from lack of proper tillage, and, when cultivated, made to yield but a small part of what they might have produced by the employment of suitable agricultural implements under a profitable and proper system of labor. Still, if the South could make so fair a showing under its shuffling and neglectful system, what an overflowing measure of abundance might be exacted from it if its farming population would devote themselves to their labor, regardless of race, with the same energy and well-directed application which characterize the North!

Already we perceive a marked improvement in those respects that is truly encouraging for the future. The industrial disorganization occasioned by the rebellion is being compensated by the introduction of fertilizers and labor-saving implements, and increased industry among the whites. This assertion is not applicable to all sections of the South, but it is true of many. We have each encouraging assurances of the industrial condition of various States or parts of States as may will excite surprise when all the difficulties of the case are considered. For instance, a Georgia editor informs the New York Times that the gross proceeds of last year's crops in that State, including cotton, corn, wheat, and rice, are very nearly as large as formerly, the cotton crop alone yielded over $30,000,000. Factories also are yielding large dividends. In other States the work of reconstruction is in an advanced state of progress; and it only needs the fostering care and judicious assistance of the Republican party and a Republican administration to bring back again the "flush times" of which we were once so fond of speaking.

The South is surfeited with politics for the present. It doubtless prefers to prove the sincerity of the party in power rather than trust the promises of those outsiders who have nothing to lose, but every thing to gain. What it especially needs, is to have the machinery of business adjusted and at work in its proper grooves.

Now let Congress wisely, not rashly, respond to the pledges of the party Platform, and nothing can prevent the triumphant election of the unexceptionable ticket now before the people.

LATEST FROM CHINA.

MR. BURLINGAME, the chief of the flowery Embassy, in his speech at San Francisco, very significantly remarked that he was explaining that it would be highly improper for him to reveal any of the secrets of his mission until he reached the seat of Government. So he merely stated, in the pleasantest way, that his mission meant progress. It meant the closer intimacy of China with other nations, and a consequent better international understanding. He drew a good picture of the ancient empire, the original inventor of so many of the glories of civilization, descending and bedoubbing with the most ancient of modern peoples." MR. BURLINGAME was gracious and fluent as he always is, and he justified by his reticence the wisdom of TENCRIN, the brother of the Emperor, the most powerful man, and the great grandfather of the fixed stars, in selecting him as embassador to the Great Powers.

Apart from the humors of the event there is remarkable significance in the presence of the Chinese Embassy here so soon after that of the Japanese. Reticent Asia begins to open by wheel into line. Geographical remoteness and obscurity are disappearing. The inventions which China has fostered are destroying the seclusion which secured them a very long period. And now the oldest and most disdainfully exclusive of empires selects a citizen of the young republic to be her messenger to the nations which she has hitherto declined to recognize in the usual manner. Of course there are many speculations upon the probable purpose of the mission. That something so unlikely as the supposition that the Chinese Government, without urging, suddenly resolved to open friendly communication with other nations by means of a Minister, is the most probable to assume the embassy to be a foreign suggestion. We observe, accordingly, that it has been attributed to MR. HART, the Inspector General of the Chinese customs, a suggestion which a correspondent of the Tribune says "we know was not the case," denying that the idea of the embassy was due to any foreigner. The same authority is of opinion that one chief object of the mission is the negotiation of a loan. This, however, is not so very unusual an object as to demand the veil of mystery. It is very much more possible that MR BURLINGAME is going about among the Great Powers to cheapen a loan by the promise of commercial advantages. Besides it is impossible for the Chinese empire could as easily have staid at home, and have invited proposals.

It, again, the object were to enter into "the federation of the world," why send a single embassador, and he a foreigner, to travel from state to state, instead of sending a number of envoys to meet and unanimously vote in China? Or is there some immense secret about tea to be gently broken to mankind? Is the advice of civilization sought upon the culture of opium? Are the Chinese women asserting their right to unlimited feet? Are rats to be discarded for horses as food? These are natural questions. But we must have patience. Even the Chamber of Commerce must have patience; and if it dines MR. BURLINGAME before he goes to Washington, it must content itself with flowers instead of fruit. Meanwhile it is pleasant to know that a countryman of ours, by his ability and courtesy, had so commanded the respect and confidence of the Chinese Government that it selected him for so imposing and probably so important a task.

THE ENGLISH CRISIS.

THE remarkable notice by an Irish Member of Parliament for promotion to inquire why the Government had not advised the Queen to dissolve if her health did not permit her to remain in the capital, is really a blow at MR. GLADSTONE. For many of the members will suddenly ask themselves—and with mistake MR. DISRAELI if he does not ask them—why that is not the logical conclusion of the Liberal policy. Separate Church and State in Ireland, and you have established the way for a separation in England. But when the mind of the people is once fixed upon the essential reason of such relations, and upon the philosophy of government, a point always carefully avoided in English political discussion—should the people not ask, why have an hereditary executive?

Indeed, when the glamour of royalty is gone, and the king has become merely "an hereditary executive," the crown is in great peril, not of being knocked off, but of falling off. The reason of the thing has expired. It has become an economical and other computation. The only question remaining is, how do we secure the most order most cheaply? No one who watches the course of English politics can escape seeing that such a question is becoming yearly more imminent. In every way the prestige of the crown disappears, and if the Queen were to die to-morrow there would be delay and a decided want of enthusiasm in the cry Vive le Roi!

The truth is, that while the Queen by her mild, maternal, and amiable character shields the crown from incisive criticism, her son, the Prince of Wales, invites and compels it. A youth without ability, of no premises, devoted to theatres, clubs, and much more questionable resorts, he offers nothing that can for a moment divert the public attention, what is the use of him? To the general intelligence of the British people it must be more and more impossible to answer the question, as they see the Prince lounging at the clubs, or roaring out the cider-cellar lyrics, or dancing at the Jardin Mabille, while the Princess ALEXANDRA sits silent and sad at home, why we pay such enormous sums to maintain this young gentleman and the system of which he is a part? Do we need this pageant of royalty any longer?

Indeed, if what is currently reported and generally believed, both of the Prince of Wales and of his younger brother the Duke of Edinburgh, be true, the regard of the English people for the royal system will be very much relaxed when they are its conspicuous representatives. A young man like the late Archduke MAXIMILIAN, who had experience in affairs of state and intelligence sufficient to guide him to conduct that should endear him personally to the people and thereby protect the monarchy, would have made a most brilliant use of the opportunities offered to an English Crown Prince. Such a man would not have found it impossible to create an intelligent and resistless loyalty in Ireland by identifying himself with fundamental Irish reforms, and residing long and familiarly in the country. The late visit of the Prince and Princess of WALES to "the brightest gem of the sea" shows how readily touched the heart of the race is, and how flexible it would be under skillful treatment.

The British Government seems to reproduce the tastes and general conduct of the late lamented Prince Regent, without his opportunities and consequent fame. ALBERT EDWARD, indeed, lives only forty years later than his grand-uncle, PRINCE GEORGE, but there is a century of progressive intelligence between their epochs. Moreover, MR. ALBERT had the advantage of the immense reaction toward royal privilege of his father's reign, and of that which followed the French Revolution. ALBERT EDWARD is not the Regent of England. The real tenacity of the system upon the hearts of the people will be tested by the Prince, who can have no other hold of them.

The British mind has not been strengthened by the late extraordinary course of MR. DISRAELI in endeavoring to put the Queen forward as an active agent in politics. It is too much to expect that a man who has been struggling for sixty years to reach a lofty station will consent to be driven from it forever in a day's night. And the antecedents of the Prime Minister should have assured every body that he would hardly hesitate to strain the system to save himself. The British crisis is much too manifest not even the excitement of our own can destroy the interest with which events in England must now be contemplated.

DEMOCRATIC "PEACE AND VIRTUE."

In speaking of the Congressional plan of reconstruction under which the late rebel States are returning to the Union, a Democratic paper says: "Whether that policy will stand depends upon the action of the presidential election; and it is not yet clear that the country will consent to maintain great permanent armies in the South to uphold a policy which its whole population abhors." This is a plain declaration that if the Democratic party succeed it will repeal the whole question of reconstruction and restore a state of things which will disfranchise the loyal colored voters, add place the political power in the hands of the late rebels.

It is with this understanding that General BEAUREGARD, one of the most offensive of the rebel leaders, wrote last year that the Southern people—meaning those who favored the rebellion—"must submit, but with that calm dignity becoming our manhood and lost independence. .....A futile resistance would only cause our rivets to be driven closer." But, looking to the Democratic ascendency, he adds:

"Our people should understand that the Radicals can remain in power only so long as the public excitement is kept up." He thinks they will disappear "when peace and virtue are restored to the country." That is, when VALLANDIGHAM, the STEVENSES, and the modest and truthful BEAUREGARD come into power.

With the same understanding General N. B. FORREST, another rebel general, speaks of the army of "the Confederacy" as the "true representatives of the greater portion of the Constitution men of the States," and adds: "The only hope of a restoration of a good government in this country is the success of the National Democracy in the next presidential campaign." This is precisely what the newspapers and orators of the rebellion used to say during the war. There would be no good government until the party that thought the war a failure succeeded.

It is not surprising that FORREST and BEAUREGARD cling to their "lost cause," nor that they believe that the party that, as a party, did what it could to serve their cause, "will be restored to power." It is not surprising that the pardoned rebels of the Southern States at MESSRS. BELMONT, FORREST, QUANTRELL, & Co. But it would be a little surprising if the loyal American people, who have so sympathy for that cause, should forget that the great captain of the glorious victory over it, to honor and trust the men and the party who loaded the country with its heavy debt and filled its homes with mourning.

The Republican party declares that every man, white or black, in the late rebel States shall have his civil rights; the Democratic party insists that the white men in those States shall have their own rights and all those of the colored men under the domination of Democracy. Then they are of opinion that that is "peace and virtue." And if they and their Democratic friends could only succeed, that is the "conservation" which they would introduce.

BITING A FILE.

LAST autumn when the New York World hoped that somehow or other General GRANT might be seduced from the plain patriotic path of duty, it said of him:

"Of the stentorian and stanchness of General Grant's patriotism we are not ignorant and solicitude of his character, no man in the country doubts or affects to doubt.....On the score of his quiet and solid public services the world in the country can come into competition with the illustrious soldier."

Now that he has been nominated for the Presidency upon a platform of equal rights the World gives this biography of him:

"The man has been nominated for President by the Chicago Convention. The facts are: He was Born at Point Pleasant, Ohio, April 27, 1822; entered West Point in 1839, graduated, 1843, a second lieutenant of infantry; served in 1845, a captain. In 1854 was applicant for a clerkship to the Prothonotary of St. Louis. The application was rejected. He was a poor faculty. He then went to Galena, and became a tanner. In August, 1861, he entered the Federal army as a captain, was transferred to the regular service, where he still remains."

It also says: "We challenge inquiry into the grounds of General GRANT's fame as a soldier."

Union soldiers and sailors will observe that this is the way in which a paper, which has been trying to put upon the platform that the war was a failure, now speaks of the man who defeated its hopes and brought rebellion to an unconditional surrender. And the manner in which it spoke of him when it thought that its party could use him, and now when it has discovered that it can not, reveals the exact value of its praise or censure. An illustration of a viper biting a file was FRENEAU's National Gazette slandering WASHINGTON.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ACTION in both HOUSES during the dates embraced in our news has been confined almost exclusively to routine business. The Senate has made into alleged bribery of certain Senators in the Pacific Railroad matter. A portion of the report of the Judiciary Committee was read on May 28, but for the purpose only of obtaining the privilege of the House for arrest of Charles W. Woolley, a refractory witness.

The Deficiency Bill, appropriating $2,000,000 was passed by the House on May 28.

NEWS ITEMS.

Official dispatches received at the Navy Department state that the Monongahela has finally been got off the reef on which she was stranded. She was stranded by the third wave accompanying one of the earthquakes in Peru.

Four acres of apparently solid ground, in Hamilton County, Ohio, recently sank to the depth of fifty feet, the pit thus formed being gradually filled with water.

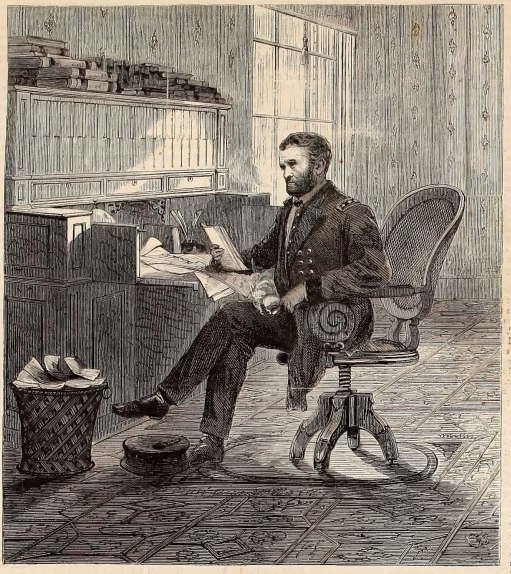
A collision occurred on the New York Central, near Rondout, near Kingston, on May 23, by which one man was killed and another severely injured. A mistake in reading orders was the cause.

A gang of bold robbers on the night of May 26 stuck up upon the engine and express car of a railroad train at Seymour, Indiana, disengaged them from the train, and, while in rapid motion, broke open the express car, and, while in rapid motion, broke open the express car out of the window, and robbed three safes in charge of the messenger, getting away of over $20,000 in money.

A heavy snow-storm fell in San Antonio, Texas, on the 23d of May, destroying crops to the value of over half a million dollars, besides killing several cattle and sheep. The Galveston Railroad has been damaged to the amount six hundred miles beyond Omaha, Nebraska. Six inches have fallen in Salt Lake valley, and a longer force of laborers than ever is at work on the road.

FOREIGN NEWS.

MOSS outrages on Americans in Hayti are reported. Mr. J. B. Hepburn, of Virginia, was shot on May 3, and Mr. Jones, of Maine, the latter was robbed by bullets although the American flag was over the door. Jones has declared himself Dictator, but the revolutionists have surrounded him in Port-au-Prince. Two English vessels are there to protect foreigners. The United States steamer De Soto had left Port-au-Prince, but was short of provisions, and the American Consul had telegraphed to Washington for help. The English commander had threatened to bombard Jones if Prince d'Salnave did not respect the rights of foreigners.



The capture of Carapaby proves to have been an abandonment. Only Quaker guns were found in it.

THE REPUBLICAN NOMINEES.

THE Republican Convention, which met at Chicago on May 20, nominated as its candidates for President and Vice-President General ULYSSES S. GRANT of Illinois, and SCHUYLER COLFAX of Indiana. We give elsewhere a full account, with illustrations, of the Convention.

We present on this page accurate portraits of the chosen candidates of the party. With the military history of General GRANT all our readers are familiar; in regard to his political antecedents very little is known, and his letter accepting the nomination will be the first positive expression of his convictions on the subject. It may be presumed, however, from a remark made by General GRANT on the reception of the news of his nomination, that they are in accordance with the principles of the platform. The General received the news of his nomination in his office at the Head-quarters of the Army, in Washington, the first announcement being made by Secretary STANTON, Congressmen HOOPER, AMES, and others. He at once inquired about the platform, and, on being handed a synopsis, he carefully read it, saying, after two or three minutes' consideration, "That is good." He afterward said that he was particularly pleased with the declaration against any form of repudiation. He remained at his room in Army Head-quarters through business hours, as illustrated in our engraving, reading in the course of the afternoon a large number of congratulatory telegrams.

The political convictions and career of Mr. COLFAX are as well known as the military life of the head of the ticket. In early life he was the editor of a paper at South Bend, Indiana, and in this sheet, as in many political speeches which he made about the same time, he was persistent in the advocacy of Whig doctrines and free-soil principles. He was in the Convention which in 1850 framed the present Constitution of Indiana, and strongly opposed the adoption of the clause prohibiting free colored men from settling in the State. In his whole course in Congress he has been a warm advocate of equal rights; and, as the Speaker of the Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, and Fortieth Congresses, has, by his tact, decision, and general urbanity, "won golden opinions from all sorts of people."

GENERAL GRANT AT ARMY HEAD-QUARTERS.—[SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.]

POPULAR ZOOLOGICAL ERRORS.

It is curious that so much dislike should surround so inoffensive an animal as the hedgehog; and equally so, that every charge brought against it is erroneous. It is a firmly rooted belief in the minds of farmers that hedgehogs suck the milk from the cows when they are lying at night in the meadows. It is almost inconceivable how so absurd a notion as this should have gained ground, for any person who has ever looked at the mouth of a hedgehog must have seen that it would be physically impossible for the animal to suck a cow. In the first place, the mouth is much too small to enable it to grasp the teat; and in the second, the jaws are armed with a number of sharp, pointed teeth, so that if the hedgehog ever made the attempt, the pain caused would be such that the cow would immediately rise and thus get rid of its tormentor. Another equally strange superstition connected with the hedgehog is that it can never be poisoned. What the peculiar condition of the coats of the hedgehog's stomach is which gives it this desirable immunity no one has ventured to state; but the supposed fact is extensively and firmly believed. The cause of this belief has doubtless been the fact that the hedgehog, in common with some other animals, can resist the attacks of poisonous snakes. But as snake poison is peculiar in that it acts solely on the blood and not internally, the fact of any animal possessing a peculiar immunity from being poisoned in that particular manner will not by any means prove that it can not be poisoned by any of the more common modes with which we poor humans are, unhappily, too familiar.

The toad is accused of having the power of casting the evil-eye. How this absurd notion ever gained ground it is difficult to say, for so far from casting around malignant glances, it is so shy it will scarcely look any one in the face. The toad was also said to contain within its skull a stone, the possession of which would confer upon a human being the magical power of rendering himself invisible, together with many other rare and much to be prized gifts. Many were the unfortunate toads which fell victims to would-be wizards in their search after this wondrous stone. And now, in the cabinets of the curious virtuosi, may be found preserved stones which had been in ancient times supposed to have been extracted from the heads of toads. These, however, have proved on examination to be in most cases portions of one of those curious concretions called bezoar stones, and, in some, merely fragments of polished coprolite. The belief, however, that the toad is poisonous has, unlike the other popular superstitions connected with that animal, some foundation in fact. There is no doubt that the surface of the skin of the toad secretes a slightly irritating mucus calculated to protect it from the attacks of a dog or any other animal which seizes its prey in its mouth.

ULYSSES S. GRANT, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

SCHUYLER COLFAX, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR THE VICE-PRESIDENCY.

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER IV.

I HAVE not a word to say about my own sensations.

My impression is, that the shock inflicted on me completely suspended my thinking and feeling power. I certainly could not have known what I was about when Betteredge joined me—for I have it on his authority that I laughed, when he asked what was the matter, and, putting the night-gown into his hands, told him to read the riddle for himself.

Of what was said between us on the beach I have not the faintest recollection. The first place in which I can now see myself again plainly is the plantation of firs. Betteredge and I are walking back together to the house; and Betteredge is telling me what I shall be able to find out, and he will be able to face it, when we have had a glass of grog.

The scene shifts from the plantation to Betteredge's little sitting-room. My resolution not to enter Rachel's house is forgotten. I feel gratefully the coolness and shadiness and quiet of the room. I drink the grog (a perfectly new luxury to me, at that time of day), which my good old friend mixes with ice-cold water from the well. Under any other circumstances the drink would simply stupefy me. As things are it stirs up my nerves. I begin to "face it," as Betteredge has predicted. And Betteredge, on his side, begins to "face it" too.

The picture which I am now presenting of myself, will, I suspect, be thought a very strange one, to say the least of it. Placed in a situation which may, I think, be described as entirely without parallel, what is the first proceeding to which I resort? Pray, do I seclude myself from all human society? Do I set my mind to analyze the abominable impossibility which, nevertheless, confronts me as an undeniable fact? Do I hurry back to London by the first train to consult the highest authorities, and to set a searching inquiry on foot immediately? No. I accept the shelter of a house which I had resolved never to degrade by even entering again; and I sit, tippling spirits and water in the company of an old servant, at ten o'clock in the morning! Is this the conduct that might have been expected from a man placed in my horrible position? I can only answer, that the sight of old Betteredge's familiar face was an inexpressible comfort to me, and that the drinking of old Betteredge's grog helped me, as I believe nothing else would have helped me, in the state of complete bodily and mental prostration into which I had fallen. I can only offer this excuse for myself; and I can only admire that invariable preservation of dignity, and that strictly logical consistency of conduct which distinguish every man and woman who may read these lines, in every emergency of their lives from the cradle to the grave.

"Now, Mr. Franklin, there's one thing certain, at any rate," said Betteredge, throwing the night-gown down on the table between us, and pointing to it as if it was a living creature that could hear him. "If a liar, to begin with."

This comforting view of the matter was not the view that presented itself to my mind.

"I am as innocent of all knowledge of having taken the Diamond as you are," I said. "But there is the witness against me! The paint on the night-gown, and the name on the night-gown are facts."

Betteredge lifted my glass and put it persuasively into my hand.

"Facts?" he repeated. "Take a drop more grog, Mr. Franklin, and you'll get over the weakness of believing in facts! Foul play, Sir!" he continued, dropping his voice confidentially. "That is how I read the riddle. Foul play, somewhere—and you and I must find it out. Was there nothing else in the tin case when you put your hand into it?"

The question instantly reminded me of the letter in my pocket. I took it out, and opened it. It was a letter of many pages, closely written. I looked impatiently for the signature at the end. "Rosanna Spearman."

As I read the name a sudden remembrance illuminated my mind, and a sudden suspicion rose out of the new light.

"Stop!" I exclaimed. "Rosanna Spearman came to my aunt out of a Reformatory? Rosanna Spearman had once been a thief?"

"There's no denying that, Mr. Franklin. What of it now, if you please?"

"What of it now? How do we know she may not have stolen the Diamond after all? How do we know she may not have smeared my night-gown purposely with the paint—?"

Betteredge laid his hand on my arm, and stopped me before I could say any more.

"You will be cleared of this, Mr. Franklin, beyond a doubt. But I hope you won't be cleared in that way. See what the letter says, Sir. In justice to the girl's memory, see what the letter says."

I felt the earnestness with which he spoke—felt it almost as a rebuke to me. "You shall form your own judgment on her letter," I said, "I will read it out."

I began—and read these lines:

"Sir—I have something to own to you. A confession which means much misery my sometimes be made in very few words. This confession can be made in three words. I love you."

The letter dropped from my hand. I looked at Betteredge. "In the name of Heaven," I said, "what does it mean?"

He seemed to shrink from answering the question.

"You and Limping Lucy were alone together this morning, Sir," he said. "Did she say nothing about Rosanna Spearman?"

"She never even mentioned Rosanna Spearman's name."

"Please to go back to the letter, Mr. Franklin. I tell you plainly, I can't find it in my heart to distress you, after what you have had to bear already. Let her speak for herself, Sir. And get on with your grog. For your own sake, get on with your grog."

I resumed the reading of the letter.

"It would be very disgraceful to me to tell you this, if I was a living woman when you read it. I shall be dead and gone, Sir, when you find my letter. It is that which makes me bold. Not even my grave will be left to tell of me. I may own the truth—with the quicksand waiting to hide me when the words are written.

"Besides, you will find your night-gown in my hiding-place, with the smear of the paint on it; and you will want to know how it came to be hidden by me? and why I said nothing to you about it in my lifetime? I have only one reason to give. I did these strange things because I loved you.

"I won't trouble you with much about myself, or my life, before you came to my lady's house. Lady Verinder took me out of a reformatory. I had gone to the reformatory from the prison. I was put in the prison, because I was a thief. I was a thief, because my mother went on the streets when I was quite a little girl. My mother went on the streets, because the gentleman who was my father deserted her. There is no need to tell such a common story as this, at any length. It is told quite often enough in the newspapers.

"Lady Verinder was very kind to me, and Mr. Betteredge was very kind to me. Those two, and the matron at the reformatory are the only good people I have ever met with in all my life. I might have got on in my place—not happily—but I might have got on, if you had not come visiting. I don't blame you, Sir. It's my fault—all my fault.

"Do you remember when you came out on us from among the sand-hills, that morning, looking for Mr. Betteredge? You were like a prince in a fairy-story. You were like a lover in a dream. You were the most adorable human creature I had ever seen. Something that felt like the happy life I had never led yet leaped up in me the instant I set eyes on you. Don't laugh at this, if you can help it. Oh, if I could only make you feel how serious it is to me!

"I went back to the house, and wrote your name and mine in my work-box, and drew a true lover's knot under them. Then, some devil put it into my head to say some good angel—whispered to me, 'Go, and look in the glass.' The glass told me—never mind what. I was too foolish to take the warning. I went on getting fonder and fonder of you, just as if I was a lady in your own rank of life, and the most beautiful creature your eyes ever rested on. I tried—oh dear, how I tried—to get you to look at me. As you had known how I used to cry at night with the misery and the mortification of your never taking any notice of me, you would have pitied me perhaps, and have given me a look now and then to live on.

"It would have been no very kind look, perhaps, if you had known how I hated Miss Rachel. I believe I found out you were in love with her before you knew it yourself. She used to give you roses to wear in your button-hole. Ah, Mr. Franklin, you wore my roses oftener than either you or she thought! The only comfort I had at that time was getting my rose secretly in your place of water in place of hers—and then throwing her rose away.

"If she had been really as pretty as you thought her, I might have borne it better. No; I believed I should have been more spiteful against her still. Suppose you had put Miss Rachel into a servant's dress, and took her ornaments off—? I don't know what is the use of my writing in this way. It can't be denied that she had a bad figure; she was too thin. But who can tell what the men like? And young ladies may behave in a manner which would cost a servant her place. It's no business of mine. I can't expect you to read my letter if I write it in this way. But it does stir one up to hear Miss Rachel called pretty, when one knows all the time she'd be her dress does it, and her confidence in herself.

"Try not to lose patience with me, Sir. I will get on as fast as I can to the time which is sure to interest you—the time when the Diamond was lost.

"But there is one thing which I have got it on my mind to tell you first.

"My life was not a very hard life to bear, while I was a thief. It was only when I had caught me at the reformatory to feel my own degradation, and to try for better things, that the days grew long and weary. Thoughts of the future forced themselves on me now. I felt the dreadful reproach that honest people—even the kindest of honest people—were to me in themselves. A heart-breaking sensation of loneliness kept with me, go where I might, and do what I might, and see what persons I might. It was my duty, I know, to try and get on with my fellow-servants in my new place. Somehow, I couldn't make friends with them. They looked (or I thought they looked) as if they suspected what I had been. I don't regret, far from it, having been roused to make the effort to be a reformed woman; but, indeed, indeed it was a weary life. You had come across it like a beam of sunshine at first—and then you too failed me. I was mad enough to love you; and I couldn't even attract your notice. There was great misery—there really was great misery in that.

"Now I am coming to what I wanted to tell you. In those days of bitterness I went two or three times, when it was my turn to go out, to my favorite place—the beach above the Shivering Sand. And I said to myself, 'I think it will end here. When I can bear it no longer, I think it will end here.' You will understand, Sir, that the place had laid a kind of spell on me before you came. I had always had a notion that something would happen to me at the quicksand. But I had never looked at it, with the thought of its being the means of my making away with myself, till the time came of which I am now writing. Then I did think that here was a place which would end all my troubles for me in a moment or two—and hide me forever afterwards.

"This is all I have to say about myself reckoning from the morning when I first saw you, to the morning when the alarm was raised in the house that the Diamond was lost.

"I was so aggravated by the foolish talk among the women servants, all wondering who was to be suspected first; and I was so angry with you (knowing no better at that time) for the pains you took in hunting for the jewel, and sending for the police, that I kept as much as possible away by myself, until late in the day, when the officer from Frizinghall came to the house.

"Mr. Seegrave began, as you may remember, by setting a guard on the women's bedrooms; and the women all followed him up stairs in a body, to know what he meant by the insult he had put on them. I went with the rest, because if I had done any thing different from the rest, Mr. Seegrave was the sort of man who would have suspected me directly. We found him in Miss Rachel's room. He told us he wouldn't have a lot of women there; and he pointed to the smear on the painted door, and said some of our petticoats had done the mischief, and sent us all down stairs again.

"After leaving Miss Rachel's room, I stopped a moment on one of the landings, by myself, to see if I had got the paint-stain by any chance on my gown. Penelope Betteredge (the only one of the women with whom I was on friendly terms) passed, and noticed what I was about.

"'You needn't trouble yourself, Rosanna,' she said. 'The paint on Miss Rachel's door has been dry for hours. If Mr. Seegrave hadn't set a watch on our bedrooms, I might have told him as much. I don't know what you think—I was never so insulted before in my life!'

"Penelope was a hot-tempered girl. I quieted her, and brought her back to what she had said about the paint on the door having been dry for hours.

"'How do you know that?' I asked.

"'I was with Miss Rachel and Mr. Franklin all yesterday morning,' Penelope said, 'mixing the colors, while they finished the door. I heard Miss Rachel ask whether the door would be dry that evening, in time for the birthday company to see it. And Mr. Franklin said, he'd lend a hand, and said it wouldn't be dry in less than twelve hours. It was long past luncheon-time—it was three o'clock before they had done. What does your arithmetic say, Rosanna?' Mine says the door was dry by three this morning.'

"'Did none of the ladies go up stairs yesterday evening to see it?' I asked. 'I thought I heard Miss Rachel warning them to keep clear of the door.'

"'None of the ladies made the smear,' Penelope answered. 'I left Miss Rachel in bed at twelve last night. And I noticed the door, and there was nothing wrong with it then.'

"Ought I to say to mention this to Mr. Seegrave, Penelope?'

"'I wouldn't say a word to help Mr. Seegrave for any thing that could be offered to me!'

"She went to her work, and I went to mine.

"My work, Sir, was to make you safe, and to put your room tidy. It was the happiest hour I had in the whole day. I used to kiss the pillow on which your head had rested all night. No matter who has done it since, you have never had your clothes folded as nicely as I folded them for you. Of all the little nick-nacks in your dressing-case, there wasn't one that had so much as a speck on it. You never noticed it, any more than you noticed me. I beg your pardon; I am forgetting myself. I will make haste, and go on again.

"HE TOOK A SLIP OF PAPER FROM HIS POCKET, AND HANDED IT TO BETTEREDGE."

"Well, I went in that morning to do my work in your room. There was your night-gown tossed across the bed, just as you had thrown it off. I took it up to fold it—and I saw the stain of the paint from Miss Rachel's door!

"I was so startled by the discovery that I ran out, with the night-gown in my hand, and made for the back stairs, and locked myself into my own room, to look at it in a place where nobody could intrude and interrupt me.

"As soon as I got my breath again I called to mind my talk with Penelope, and I said to myself, 'Here's the proof that he was in Miss Rachel's sitting-room between twelve last night and three this morning!'

"I shall not tell you in plain words what was the first suspicion that crossed my mind when I had made that discovery. You would only be angry—and, if you were angry, you might tear my letter up and read no more of it.

"Let it be enough, if you please, to say only this. After thinking it over to the best of my ability, I made it out that the thing wasn't likely, for a reason that I will tell you. If you had been in Miss Rachel's sitting-room at that time of night, with Miss Rachel's knowledge (and if you had been foolish enough to forget to take care of the wet door) she would have reminded you—she would never have let you carry away such a witness against her as the witness I was looking at now! At the same time, I own I was not completely certain in my own mind that I had proved my own suspicion to be wrong. You will not have forgotten that I have owned to hating Miss Rachel. Try to think, if you can, that there was a little of that hatred in all this. It ended in my determining to keep the night-gown, and to wait, and watch, and see what use I might make of it. At that time, please to remember, not the ghost of an idea entered my head that you had stolen the Diamond."

There, I broke off in the reading of the letter for the second time.

I had read those portions of the miserable woman's confession which related to myself with unaffected surprise, and, I can honestly add, with sincere distress. I had regretted, truly regretted, the aspersion which I had thoughtlessly cast on her memory before I had seen a line of her letter. But when I had advanced as far as the passage which is quoted above I own I felt my mind growing bitterer and bitterer against Rosanna Spearman as I went on. "Read the rest for yourself," I said, handing the letter to Betteredge across the table. "If there is any thing in it that I must look at you can tell me as you go on."

"I understand you, Mr. Franklin," he answered. "It's natural, Sir, in you. And, God help us all!" he added, in a lower tone, "it's no less natural in her."

I proceed to copy the continuation of the letter from the original, in my own possession.

"Having determined to keep the night-gown, and to see what use my love or my revenge (I hardly know which) could turn it to in the future, the next thing to discover was how to keep it without the risk of being found out.

"There was only one way—to make another night-gown exactly like it, before Saturday came and brought the laundry-woman and her inventory to the house.

"I was afraid to put it off till the next day (the Friday); being in doubt lest some accident might happen in the interval. I determined to make the new night-gown on that same day (the Thursday), while I could count, if I played my cards properly, on having my time to myself. The first thing to do (after locking up your night-gown in my drawer) was to go back to your bedroom—not so much to put it to rights (Penelope would have done that for me, if I had asked her) as to find out whether you had smeared off any of the paint-stain from your night-gown on the bed, or on any piece of furniture in the room.

"I examined every thing narrowly, and, at last, I found a few faint streaks of the paint on the inside of your dressing-gown—not the linen dressing-gown you usually wore in that summer season, but a flannel dressing-gown which you had with you also. I suppose you felt chilly after walking to and fro in nothing but your night dress, and put on the warmest thing you could find. At any rate, there were the stains, just visible, on the inside of the dressing-gown. I easily got rid of these by scraping away the stuff of the flannel. This done, the only proof left against you was the proof locked up in my drawer.

"I had just finished your room when I was sent for to be questioned by Mr. Seegrave, along with the rest of the servants. Next came the examination of all our boxes. And then followed the most extraordinary event of the day —to me—since I had found the paint on your night-gown. It came out of the second questioning of Penelope Betteredge by Superintendent Seegrave.

"Penelope returned to us quite beside herself with rage at the manner in which Mr. Seegrave had treated her. He had hinted, beyond the possibility of mistaking him, that he suspected her of being the thief. We were all equally astonished at hearing this, and we all asked, Why?

"'Because the Diamond was in Miss Rachel's sitting-room,' Penelope answered. 'And because I was the last person in the sitting-room at night!'

"Almost before the words had left her lips I remembered that another person had been in the sitting-room later than Penelope. That person was yourself. My head whirled round and my thoughts were in dreadful confusion. In the midst of it all, something in my mind whispered to me that the smear on your night-gown might have a meaning entirely different to the meaning which I had given to it up to that time. 'If the last person who was in the room is the person to be suspected,' I thought to myself, 'the thief is not Penelope but Mr. Franklin Blake!'

"In the case of any other gentleman I believe I should have been ashamed of suspecting him of theft almost as soon as the suspicion had passed through my mind.

"But the bare thought that YOU had let yourself down to my level, and that I, in possessing myself of your night-gown, had also possessed myself of the means of shielding you from being discovered, and disgraced for life—I say, Sir, the bare thought of this seemed to open such a chance before me of winning your good-will, that I passed blindfold, as one may say, from suspecting to believing. I made up my mind, on the spot, that you had shown yourself the busiest of any body in fetching the police, as a blind to deceive us all; and that the hand which had taken Miss Rachel's jewel could by no possibility be any other hand than yours.

"The excitement of this new discovery of mine must, I think, have turned my head for a while. I felt such a devouring eagerness to see you—to try you with a word or two about the Diamond, and to make you look at me, and speak to me, in that way—that I put my hair tidy, and made myself as nice as I could, and went to you boldly in the library where I knew you were writing.

"You had left one of your rings up stairs, which made as good an excuse for my intrusion as I could have desired. But oh, Sir! if you have ever loved, you will understand how it was that all my courage cooled when I walked into the room and found myself in your presence. And then, you looked up at me so coldly, and you thanked me for finding your ring in such an indifferent manner that my knees trembled under me, and I felt as if I should drop on the floor at your feet. When you had thanked me you looked back, if you remember, at your writing. I was so mortified at being treated in this way that I plucked up spirit enough to speak. I said, 'This is a strange thing about the Diamond, Sir.' And you looked up again, and said, 'Yes, it is!' You spoke civilly (I can't deny that); but still you kept a distance—a cruel distance between us. Believing, as I did, that you had got the lost Diamond hidden about you while you were speaking, your coolness so provoked me that I got bold enough, in the heat of the moment, to give you a hint. I said, 'They will never find the Diamond, Sir, will they? No! nor the person who took it—I'll answer for that.' I nodded, and smiled at you, as much as to say, 'I know!' This time you looked up at me with something like interest in your eyes; and I felt that a few more words on your side and mine might bring out the truth. Just at that moment Mr. Betteredge spoiled it all by coming to the door. I knew his footstep, and I also knew that it was against his rules for me to be in the library at that time of day—let alone being there along with you. I had only just time to get out of my own accord before he could come in and tell me to go. I was angry and disappointed, but I was not entirely without hope for all that. The ice, you see, was broken between us—and I thought I would take care, on the next occasion, that Mr. Betteredge was out of the way.

"When I got back to the servants' hall the bell was going for our dinner. Afternoon already! and the materials for making the new night-gown were still to be got! There was but one chance of getting them. I shammed ill at dinner; and so secured the whole of the interval from then till tea-time to my own use.

"What I was about while the household believed me to be lying down in my own room, and how I spent the night, after shamming ill again at tea-time and having been sent up to bed, there is no need to tell you. Sergeant Cuff discovered that much if he discovered nothing more. And I can guess how. I was detected (though I kept my veil down) in the draper's shop at Frizinghall. There was a glass in front of me at the counter where I was buying the long-cloth; and—in that glass—I saw one of the shopmen point to my shoulder and whisper to another. At night again, when I was secretly at work, locked into my room, I heard the breathing of the women servants who suspected me outside my door.

"It didn't matter then; it doesn't matter now. On the Friday morning, hours before Sergeant Cuff entered the house, there was the new night-gown—to make up your number in place of the night-gown that I had got—made, wrung out, dried, ironed, marked, and folded as the laundry-woman folded all the others, safe in your drawer. There was no fear (if the linen in the house was examined) of the newness of the night-gown betraying me. All your underclothing had been renewed when you came to our house—I suppose on your return home from foreign parts.

"The next thing was the arrival of Sergeant Cuff; and the next great surprise was the announcement of what he thought about the smear on the door.

"I had believed you to be guilty (as I have owned) more because I wanted you to be guilty than for any other reason. And now, the Sergeant had come round by a totally different way to the same conclusion as mine! And I had got the dress that was the only proof against you! And not a living creature knew it—yourself included! I am afraid to tell you how I felt when I called these things to mind—you would hate my memory forever afterward."

At that place Betteredge looked up from the letter.

"Not a glimmer of light so far, Mr. Franklin," said the old man, taking off his heavy tortoise-shell spectacles, and pushing Rosanna Spearman's confession a little away from him. "Have you come to any conclusion, Sir, in your own mind, while I have been reading?"

"Finish the letter first, Betteredge; there may be something to enlighten us at the end of it. I shall have a word or two to say to you after that."

"Very good, Sir. I'll just rest my eyes, and then I'll go on again. In the mean time, Mr. Franklin—I don't want to hurry you—but would you mind telling me, in one word, whether you see your way out of this dreadful mess yet?"

"I see my way back to London," I said, "to consult Mr. Bruff. If he can't help me—"

"Yes, Sir?"

"And if the Sergeant won't leave his retirement at Dorking—"

"He won't, Mr. Franklin!"

"Then, Betteredge—as far as I can see now—I am at the end of my resources. After Mr. Bruff and the Sergeant, I don't know of a living creature who can be of the slightest use to me."

As the words passed my lips some person outside knocked at the door of the room.

Betteredge looked surprised as well as annoyed by the interruption.

"Come in," he called out irritably, "whoever you are!"

The door opened, and there entered to us, quietly, the most remarkable-looking man I had ever seen. Judging him by his figure and his movements, he was still young. Judging him by his face, and comparing him with Betteredge, he looked the elder of the two. His complexion was of a gipsy darkness; his fleshless cheeks had fallen into deep hollows, over which the bone projected like a pent-house. His nose presented the fine shape and modeling so often found among the ancient people of the East, so seldom visible among the newer races of the West. His forehead rose high and straight from the brow. His marks and wrinkles were innumerable. From this strange face eyes, stranger still, of the softest brown—eyes dreamy and mournful, and deeply sunk in their orbits—looked out at you, and (in my case, at least) took your attention captive at their will. Add to this a quantity of thick closely-curling hair, which, by some freak of Nature, had lost its color in the most startlingly partial and capricious manner. Over the top of his head it was still of the deep black which was its natural color. Round the sides of his head—without the slightest gradation of gray to break the force of the extraordinary contrast—it had turned completely white. The line between the two colors preserved no sort of regularity. At one place, the white hair ran up into the black; at another, the black hair ran down into the white. I looked at the man with a curiosity which, I am ashamed to say, I found it quite impossible to control. His soft brown eyes looked back at me gently; and he met my involuntary rudeness in staring at him, with an apology which I was conscious that I had not deserved.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "I had no idea that Mr. Betteredge was engaged." He took a slip of paper from his pocket, and handed it to Betteredge. "The list for next week," he said. His eyes just rested on me again—and he left the room as quietly as he had entered it.

"Who is that?" I asked.

"Mr. Candy's assistant," said Betteredge. "By-the-by, Mr. Franklin, you will be sorry to hear that the little doctor has never recovered that illness he caught, going home from the birthday dinner. He's pretty well in health; but he lost his memory in the fever, and he has never recovered more than the wreck of it since. The work all falls on his assistant. Not much of it now, except among the poor. They can't help themselves, you know. They must put up with the man with the piebald hair, and the gipsy complexion, or they would get no doctoring at all."

"You don't seem to like him, Betteredge?"

"Nobody likes him, Sir."

"Why is he so unpopular?"

"Well, Mr. Franklin, his appearance is against him, to begin with. And then there's a story that Mr. Candy took him with a very doubtful character. Nobody knows who he is—and he hasn't a friend in the place. How can you expect one to like him after that?"

"Quite impossible, of course. May I ask what he wanted with you when he gave you that bit of paper?"

"Only to bring me the weekly list of the sick people about here, Sir, who stand in need of a little wine. My lady always had a regular distribution of good sound port and sherry among the infirm poor; and Miss Rachel wishes the custom to be kept up. Times have changed; times have changed! I remember when Mr. Candy himself brought the list to my mistress. Now it's Mr. Candy's assistant who brings the list to me. I'll go on with the letter, if you will allow me, Sir," said Betteredge, drawing Rosanna Spearman's confession back to him. "It isn't lively reading, I grant you. But, there! it keeps me from getting sour with thinking of the past." He put on his spectacles, and wagged his head gloomily. "There's a bottom of good sense, Mr. Franklin, in our conduct to our mothers, when they first start us on the journey of life. We are all of us more or less unwilling to be brought into the world. And we are all of us right."

Mr. Candy's assistant had produced too strong an impression on me to be immediately dismissed from my thoughts. I passed over the last unanswerable utterance of the Betteredge philosophy, and returned to the subject of the man with the piebald hair.

"What is his name?" I asked.

"As ugly a name as need be," Betteredge answered, gruffly. "Ezra Jennings."

PEGGY'S WINDOW.

It was insignificant enough in itself, but every thing has value not for what it has, but for the use which it makes of what it has; and there was a great deal seen through Peggy's window.

First, one looked straight out upon a plat of grass spotted in with dandelions; and beyond, at the waters of a wide lake, where busy ships came and went; while between the green grass and the blue water ran a broad street, where all day long and far into the night heavy wagons, handsome carriages, and crowded coaches went to and fro; and along the edge of the bluff that looked down on the lake children played, and lovers walked under the lindens in summer evenings.

All this and a great deal more Peggy saw as she sat in her low willow chair by this window, that opened level with the ground; for Peggy's kitchen was in the basement of an ancient-looking house, built up of cobble-stones and mortar; a house that was new when the broad, busy street before it was only a bridle-path. This was the reason of the strip of yard in front and the deep garden behind, bought when land was plenty and low along what had since grown into the principal avenue of a crowded city.

Every day, precisely as the Cathedral clock struck three, Peggy came to her window, with a red mitten in her hand, and a green barége turban on her head. And here she sat until the clock went six, knitting the mitten, and looking through the small, clean panes at the passing world, which was her daily newspaper and her daily gossip; for Peggy never read, and she never spoke excepting when somebody asked her a question—nor then, if a nod or a shake of the head would possibly answer.

The clock was yet on the stroke of three one showery May afternoon when an emigrant ship sailed by "to its haven under the hill," and an hour later the passengers went past the window in scattered groups of quaint, bewildered men and women. Foremost among them and quite by himself was a young Welshman, blue-eyed, curly-haired, and full of resolute life and honest will.

It was not many days before he passed again, and just against Peggy's window a man with a vast deal of presence and manner met him.

"Ah, Apdallas! I was looking for you," he began. "I heard from my brother that you had arrived, and I have the impression you are just the man I want to see."

Then standing, solid and self-assured, with his gold-headed cane and his shining boots, Mr. Snowdoun began to talk—after the manner of men—all around the subject he wished to hit; till circling closer and closer, like a leaf in an eddy, he brought up at last at the object of his conversation. It appeared then that he wished to go into some kind of iron-works, but, with capital and brains, he had no practical knowledge of the business. It appeared also that young Apdallas, who had no capital, had just this desirable knowledge, having worked in iron-mills all his days, and known them thoroughly from beginning to end. Mr. Snowdoun had no need of any lengthy talk to find this out, and he knew perfectly well before he began that the interview would end in a union of Apdallas's experience with his money; yet Peggy had knit into her seam-needle, rolled up her mitten and gone away, long before he had come to the point of taking out his prosperous-looking memorandum-book and writing an agreement for young Apdallas to sign. Therefore only the window looked out upon the closing of the interview, that resulted after some months in several high, conical furnaces down on the lake-shore, whose tops came up above the bank and glared all night long with their burning eyes at Peggy's window.

One evening, a whole year after he first sailed into my story, Apdallas, sitting upon the wooden carriage-steps under the elm-tree in front of the window, took a letter from his pocket; and as he opened it a picture fell to the ground—the face of a young girl, rather bold perhaps, but very sensible and very sweet. The letter that inclosed it was like the face.

"My mother is dead now," it said, "my brother is married and needs me no more, and I write to ask you if there is any place and work for me in America. Your cousin, Charlotte Chisholm, who is a very good friend of mine, tells me you have found it to be a country where there is much to do and where every one may work, making themselves a place and a home. So may I give you the trouble to say if I would risk any thing in going a stranger to a strange land?"

This letter, signed "Ursula Fitzgibbon," was the first incident softer than iron that had fallen into Apdallas's life since he landed in America; he read it with a gentle stirring at his heart, and like April in a lilac bough.

A week later Peggy, through her window, saw him post a letter in the mail-box across the street. It was directed to "Miss Ursula Fitzgibbon, Carrighal, Wales," and was not the last of many that flew on yellow wings from that same letter-box across the sea.

All the while the light from the blast-furnaces shone brighter and brighter, for ore was plenty and iron was dear. So weeks came in and weeks went out, stretching themselves into months and then years, until, on a midsummer evening, just as the furnace-fires had begun to paint Peggy's poor little window a glowing crimson, turning it into something far more gorgeous than the stained altar-window at the Cathedral, another emigrant-ship sailed by, and the red glare was reflected from the window upon the face of a girl who stood upon deck looking off at the city. At the same time Apdallas passed in his best blue suit, going down to the boat-landing; and then by-and-by he came back in a carriage with the brave, honest face of Ursula Fitzgibbon beside him.

Now Peggy's window held itself at such a convenient angle that it looked as many ways as the wind blows, all at once, in any lake country; and among other sights it saw a peaked-roofed brick cottage, tangled over with trumpet-flowers and Michigan roses. And at the door of this house it saw Apdallas and the girl go in. For a little time they were lost to view, but directly somebody lighted the gas in the front parlor, and Peggy, coming to close her shutters just then, saw between the lace curtains of the long, open window Arthur Apdallas and Ursula Fitzgibbon kneeling side by side, while the white-haired rector stood before them with book and gown. And thus it was Ursula Fitzgibbon found her "work and place and home."

After that Mr. and Mrs. Apdallas often walked past together of summer evenings, stopping to sit and talk upon the carriage-steps under Peggy's elm-tree; and all the time the hot-mouthed furnaces, like wise old alchemists, were tirelessly turning iron ore all into gold for the fortunate pockets of their proprietors. Until, almost before they knew it, the firm of Snowdoun & Apdallas was among the wealthiest of that wealthy city.

At last Peggy, at her knitting, began to watch from her window a handsome stone-house going up on the margin of the bank that looked down on the lake. A house with gable and dormer and bay and oval and French windows; with all manner of quaint and fanciful architecture, as though it embodied memories of some strange, foreign land. Yet, withal, with a look of solid magnificence that of a certainty embodied solid wealth.

Finally it was finished and furnished with unbounded splendor, and then, one day, Mr. and Mrs. Apdallas went between the great stone lions that guarded the carved doorway, and took possession of their new home.

Several years have come and gone since then, and as Peggy sits to-night looking through her window she sees in the twilight children at play under the portico of the great house opposite, and behind them, in the stately doorway, she sees Mrs. Ursula Apdallas watching them with motherly gladness, while her husband smiles down upon the handsomest wife in the whole city with satisfied pride and love. And thus for once wealth and worthiness and happiness are joined hand in hand.

A PRESENTATION AT THE VATICAN.

ONE of the weaknesses of Americans abroad is to seek presentation to crowned heads. Our ministers at London, Paris, Vienna, and other Continental capitals are "bored to death"—to use the common expression—with requests for introduction at Court. By European etiquette any person presented to a sovereign must be of sufficient rank to be eligible to an introduction at his own Court. This rule works well enough in the case of subjects of all monarchical governments, whether absolute or limited, as the number of persons entitled to presentation is not large. But when applied to Americans it is very unsatisfactory; every man and woman among us is entitled to visit the White House and shake hands with the President. Probably our Republican Court receives more visitors every month than the sovereigns of England, France, Russia or any other first-class Power in a whole lifetime. We carry our Republicanism with us when we go abroad—quite as much as the Englishman carries his insularity—and one thing that we remember above all others is, that we are eligible to a state presentation at home, and therefore must have the same right abroad.

Woman, lovely woman—especially if of the class of nouveau riche—is quite as keen on the scent for royalty as her bearded and bigger half. To enter the penetralia of a palace and gaze upon the features of its presiding genius she will undergo any torture of body, mind, milliner, or bank account. Nay, she will even submit to array herself after a prescribed form, while at home she would laugh to utter refusal all dictation in the matter of dress. Husband, father, or big brother who may be traveling with her is kept in metaphorical hot water until he secures the desired invitation to Court, or is positively refused all admission. When she has been in the presence, and actually received the hundredth part of a smile from the august face, how perfect is her happiness, and with what ineffable contempt and scorn she ever after regards those who were rejected! A presentation at a Royal or Imperial Court is an event to be talked about on all convenient—and many inconvenient—occasions for the rest of her natural life.

Customs differ at the various European Courts, some of them being more easy of access than others. Some admit male civilians in ordinary evening dress, while others require that they shall be arrayed in uniform or in the prescribed costume of the Court. At the Palace of the Tuileries it is both interesting and amusing to witness the movements of some of our aspirants to distinction who are arrayed in uniform for the first time in their lives. Their suits fit them uneasily; they are generally too large or too small; their swords dangle between their legs, and occasionally trip them up; their cocked hats are inconvenient to dispose of, and altogether they appear like organ-grinders' monkeys in new jackets. As the presentation generally consists of standing in a row while His Majesty walks through the apartment, and hears the names of the visitors read, as an overseer calls the roll of his hod-carriers, there is a suspicion in the minds of many, as with the boy who studied the alphabet, that it is hardly worth while to go through so much to accomplish so little.

His Holiness, the Pope, is more easily accessible than most of the kingly and imperial personages of Europe, and especially so to Americans. Every little while there is an opportunity for presentation at the Vatican, and it is not required, as elsewhere, that application shall be made through the embassador of one's country. The leading bankers of Rome can procure invitations, and they generally do it by wholesale. They send lists of whatever names are registered, and I suspect they often procure a few dozens of papers in blank, to be filled up by themselves. The invitation specifies the dress to be worn on the occasion. Gentlemen must be in evening costume, with white cravats, while ladies must wear black dresses and veils, with no bonnets. I believe the costume is varied at times, and of late years it is less rigidly insisted upon than formerly.

Happening in Rome last year during Holy Week I found there was to be a Papal audience, and, on application to my banker, I received a ticket of invitation. At the appointed hour—4 P.M.—I rode to the Vatican, and passed under the colonnade of St. Peter's to the broad stairway that led to the audience-room. The harlequinish-looking soldiers called "the Pope's Own" (which the American Bishops have been requested to replace by a thousand good Americans) were ranged near the entrance at the foot of the stairway, and formed a close line through which no one unprovided with a ticket was allowed to pass. At the head of the stairway were chamberlains of the Pope's household, performing the easy, though necessary, duty of finger-posts to indicate the way. Winding along several passages of that huge building (it is said to contain four thousand rooms) there was a goodly number of visitors about, as one usually finds the crowd at a theatre door five minutes before the performance begins. I was escorting two ladies who hesitated to ride bareheaded from the hotel to the Vatican. Our valet de place accompanied us to the foot of the broad stairway, where he took possession of our superfluous garments, and waited until our return.

The last of the line of chamberlains stood at the door of a long and narrow apartment—proportioned more like a rope-walk or bowling-alley than any thing else I think of—where we were to await His Holiness. When I entered there were three or four hundred persons in the room, and before the time of presentation came the number had increased to a thousand. I think at least four-fifths of the assemblage were Americans and English, in the proportion of six to one. A few of the former had managed to evade the regulations and were arrayed in frock-coats, but their number was very small. There was a fair sprinkling of children, every mother being anxious that her darlings should receive the Papal blessing. Many brought rosaries and crosses to be made sacred by the presence of the Holy Father. Some carried them on their necks to the number of a dozen or more; others held them in their hands; and others were so liberally supplied that they brought them in bags or baskets. Near me stood a woman whom I have since met on Broadway. She held on her arm a basket large enough for a bachelor's marketing, and had it stuffed full of rosaries and other treasures of the Catholic heart. Several dealers in these articles had an eye to business, and secured the blessing of a large quantity of their wares. These would be sold at an advance of fifty per cent. over regular prices, and return a handsome profit to the enterprising merchant.

Many young priests, who had come from the interior of Italy to attend the ceremonies of Holy Week were in the assemblage, and wore an air of meek devotion while waiting the coming of the man who represented to them God upon earth. Several of them carried small crucifixes for which they sought the blessing, and would, no doubt, worship in the future with an increased faith.

There was a hum of conversation—chiefly in Anglo-Saxon—during the time we awaited the arrival of the Pope. There were but few seats—only a single bench on each side of the room—so that the great majority were obliged to stand. By-and-by the hum suddenly increased, and then sank almost to silence. All eyes were turned toward a door at one end of the long hall, and as it swung open we saw His Holiness entering. Preceded by two Cardinals—one of them the famous Antonelli—and by several chamberlains, he advanced along the apartment, one side of which had been kept vacant. Ordinarily, there should have been but a single line of visitors, but on this occasion the front was every where from four to a dozen deep, and not arranged in regular order. Nearly every body knelt—a few sturdy anti-Catholic Americans remaining firmly upon their feet, and some compromising with their consciences by dropping on one knee. At first the chamberlains took the ticket of each person and announced the name upon it; but as this delayed matters somewhat, they very soon contented themselves with announcing only those who bore titles of some kind or had more than ordinary distinction. As my name happened to bear a military prefix, and was followed by the magic words, "Etats Unis," I received special attention from the chamberlain who took my ticket, and consequently from His Holiness, Pius IX.

The Pope is a finely-preserved old man, and appeared as if good for ten years more of temporal power. His face is pleasing, and when I saw it there was a kindly smile that overspread it, and was well calculated to win admiration. He was dressed in the white costume familiar to all who have studied his picture, or are at all acquainted with the ordinary vestments of the Romish Church. He appeared to have special fondness for children, and bestowed his blessing upon them more liberally than upon adults. One of my lady companions took her little daughter to the presentation, and was greatly delighted at the attention she received.

Somehow the stiff-kneed Americans were frequently in the front rank, greatly to the annoyance of the more reverent ones in the rear. I presume that several were brought down who firmly resolved before going there that they would not kneel on any account. One rigid Puritan told me the next day that he had determined beforehand he would never kneel to the Pope or any other man; but the repeated cries of "a genoux," "a genoux," and the reluctance to wound the feelings of the Catholics present had been too much for his spirit.

After passing in front of the assemblage the Pope went to a sort of desk or pulpit, about midway of the hall, where he made a prayer and a short address, both in the French language, which he speaks with fluency and correctness. The address was in no way sectarian, but a wholesome, moral lecture fitted to any people professing Christian faith. Then followed his blessing and benediction, to which all bowed in silence, and then filed slowly to the outer air.

"ONLY A HEADACHE."

WHEN a man is a middle-aged man—what in these days is called "quite a young man"—he is in the height of his physical strength, while his mental vigor is still strengthening and increasing—a vigor, in many instances, susceptible of being strengthened and increased to the very last. A man then is, or ought to be, in the full flush of his powers, with added resources of every kind, and acquired skill and mastery over them. The sickness and languor of early years are left behind, and not much thought is given to the physical ills that may be screened by the curtain of the future. Men rarely pause to consider a wonderfully prolonged exemption from the sharper phenomena of suffering. Still, the healthiest life is not ordinarily free from touches of human ills. The middle-aged man, in the full tide of occupation, in the broad stream of his energies and activities, may be exempted from the presence of positive malady, but he is peculiarly liable to headaches.

Full and well-regulated employment is both the duty and the real happiness of a man. Men who can not get the full occupation they want are unhappy, whereas they might well derive consolation from the fact that they already possess that leisure which is often the busy man's chief aim in life, and that they are released from the perils and responsibilities which an over-crowded life presents. The successful man is often pre-eminent for failures. That man is to be pitied who is so very successful in his business that he has no time for literature and art; grudges evening parties; can rarely get a week's shooting, and scarcely ever a month's vacation. There is a time when a busy man's time is exceedingly valuable. The temptation is almost overwhelming to him when he finds that he can coin his minutes into dollars. Then the poor fellow sacrifices the real good of his life for the means of living. A great power of acquiring often disqualifies a man for expending.

The result of the multiplicity of engagements is, often enough, a headache. The headache has its uses in the economy of things. It accomplishes one of the benevolent intentions of pain, in giving a man a hint and forewarning that the delicate machinery of the brain is overtaxed. Sometimes a man works himself into a position, or a position has come upon him, to grapple adequately with which is really beyond his power; and even an active business man who delights in business will be dismayed by the accumulation of his correspondence and the multiplicity of his engagements. The speedy result of the frightful burden of cares borne by many men is anxious and haggard faces. So it is even with successful men, the lawyer or physician in full practice, the author in the full tide of literary success. Then a nervous headache very commonly sets in. A man ought to take this as a hint, not exactly that he should knock off work, but that he should take it more judiciously. A great deal depends upon arrangement. There are persons who, amidst a variety of engagements, begin with the least important and work their way to the most important, resembling the architects of Laputa, who begin with the roof in the air, and work downward to the foundation in the ground. That is a mistake. When you have arranged your business in the order of importance, the great thing is not to attempt too much, but to do things one at a time. Canning was greatly impressed with this notion. We find him writing to a friend: "Pozzo told me a story one day which was new to me, and made a strong impression on me. 'Such a a person,' said one of the speakers in the dialogue, 'was a great man; but how did he manage to do so many great things in his life?' 'By doing them,' was the answer, 'one after the other.'" Again, one ought to remember that, within certain limits, a man may be as busy as he likes, but outside those limits he has no business to be busy. A man ought never to allow himself to be so occupied that he becomes dyspeptic; that he can not play with his children and make love to his wife; that he can not thoroughly enjoy a book; that he can not attend to those higher thoughts that keep the life of intellect and spirit sweet and wholesome. However excited Sir Robert Peel might have been with parliamentary strife, he always made a point of reading some religious work for half an hour before he went to bed. Bishop Horne, writing to a friend, said, "The doctors wish me to have an illness, but I desire to leave that matter to God's goodness. I read a page or two of Bozzy every night, and my sleep is sweet after it." But it is so hard to make people renounce the shadow and grasp the substance. A chronic headache would, perhaps, bring them to a better mind.

Our headaches may be turned to some ethical account, first, by taxing our ingenuity how to avoid them; and next, our self-denial, by surrendering the tempting circumstances that induce them. They are a penalty for the exertion that has tired, a safeguard against exertion that will kill. Perhaps it may be arguing on too scanty an induction, but it often seems that the more acute the intellect the greater is the liability to nervous headache. One who is, perhaps, the most brilliant writer of the present day obtains the commiseration of all his friends for his dreadful headaches. We have all heard of Sydney Smith's wit and hilarity, but Sydney Smith was also subject to fits of deep depression, of which the public has heard little or nothing. Perhaps there are cares and anxieties which will morbidly fasten on the brain, and we find it impossible to shake them off. With all our philosophy and management, we may not be able at times to ward off a violent headache; but a word to the wise is sufficient; and if those subject to this evil will study the causes and consequences, and follow the teachings of reason, they may expect, at least, a modification of their headaches.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

VISIBLE NOISE—Plymouth Sound.

THE PERFUMER OF THE WORLD—The centre of the earth.

ON AN UMBRELLA.

I had a new, a cherished silk umbrella,
  Which I with care concealed behind the rack,
Until one night a friend—a thoughtless fellow—
  Desired its use, and never brought it back!
This friend upon my sister had been calling—
  That was all right; but when he rose to go,
And reached the door, behold! a rain was falling;
  So my umbrella went along with beau!

There, snug in bed, unconscious of the sorrow
  In all its bitterness to be revealed
To my unhappy gaze upon the morrow
  (A sorrow time, alas! has never healed)—
There, snug in bed, I lay, and, smiling, hearkened
  To the remorseless patter of the rain:
Why, let it pour, and let the sky be darkened!
  I was prepared, so why should I complain?

Ah! that sad morn when, breakfast being over,
  I took my hat, approached the faithful stand,
To draw my dear umbrella from its cover,
  And no umbrella met my eager hand!
'Twas gone. My sister soon explained the reason:
  "You were not out last night, my dear, you know,
And as he was a-coughin' and a-sneezin'
  When he went home, I—lent it to—my beau!"

It went, it staid. I never saw it after,
  Though days, and weeks, and months have passed away.
Nay, gentle reader, check, I pray, your laughter—
  My fate may be your own some rainy day!
I mourn my loss as though it were a brother,
  Or, what perhaps is better, a sweet wife!
One thing is sure—I'll never get another,
  But rather go umbrella-less through life.

RULES FOR BECOMING A MILLIONAIRE.

You must devote your life to the getting and keeping of other men's earnings.

You must eat the bread of carefulness, and you must rise early and lie down late.

You must care little or nothing about other men's wants or sufferings or disappointments.

You must not mind it, that your great wealth involves many others' poverty.

You must not give away money except for a material equivalent.

You must not go meandering about Nature, nor spend your time enjoying air, earth, sky, and water, for there is no money in it.

You must not distract your thoughts from the great purpose of your life with the charms of art and literature.

You must not let philosophy or religion engross you during the secular time.

You must not allow your wife or children to occupy much of your valuable time or thoughts.

You must never permit the fascinations of friendship to inveigle you into making loans, however small.

You must abandon all other ambitions or purposes; and, finally,

You must be prepared to sacrifice ease and all fanciful notion you may have about tastes and luxuries and enjoyments during most, if not all, of your natural life.

A little fellow of some three summers had presented to him three little sugar dolls. As he had already stuffed more than was proper, his mamma had made him promise that he would eat no more. A solemn engagement was entered into to that effect, but in a few moments the mother discovered that one of the dolls was gone. She scolded, and received the following irresistible explanation:

"I was obliged to eat one up. There was the papa, the mamma, and the little boy."

"Well, why should you eat one?"

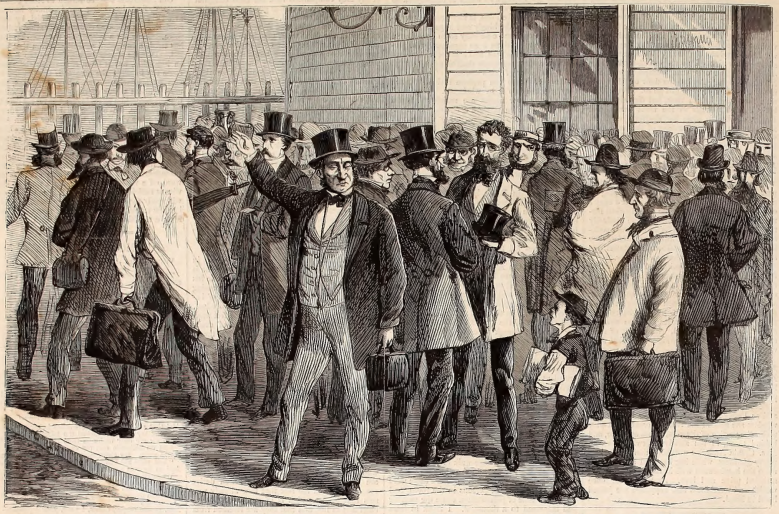
"The little boy was so disobedient."

A young lady—a sensible girl—gives the following catalogue of different kinds of love: "The sweetest, a mother's love; the longest, a brother's love; the strongest, a woman's love; the dearest, a man's love; and the sweetest, longest, strongest, dearest love, a 'love of a bonnet.'"

SIZE AND SEMBLANCE.—A photographer in one of the country towns in Massachusetts was recently visited by a young woman, who, with sweet simplicity, asked: "How long does it take to get a photograph after you leave your measure?"

RULES FOR PUNCTUATION.

By an Ancient Printer.

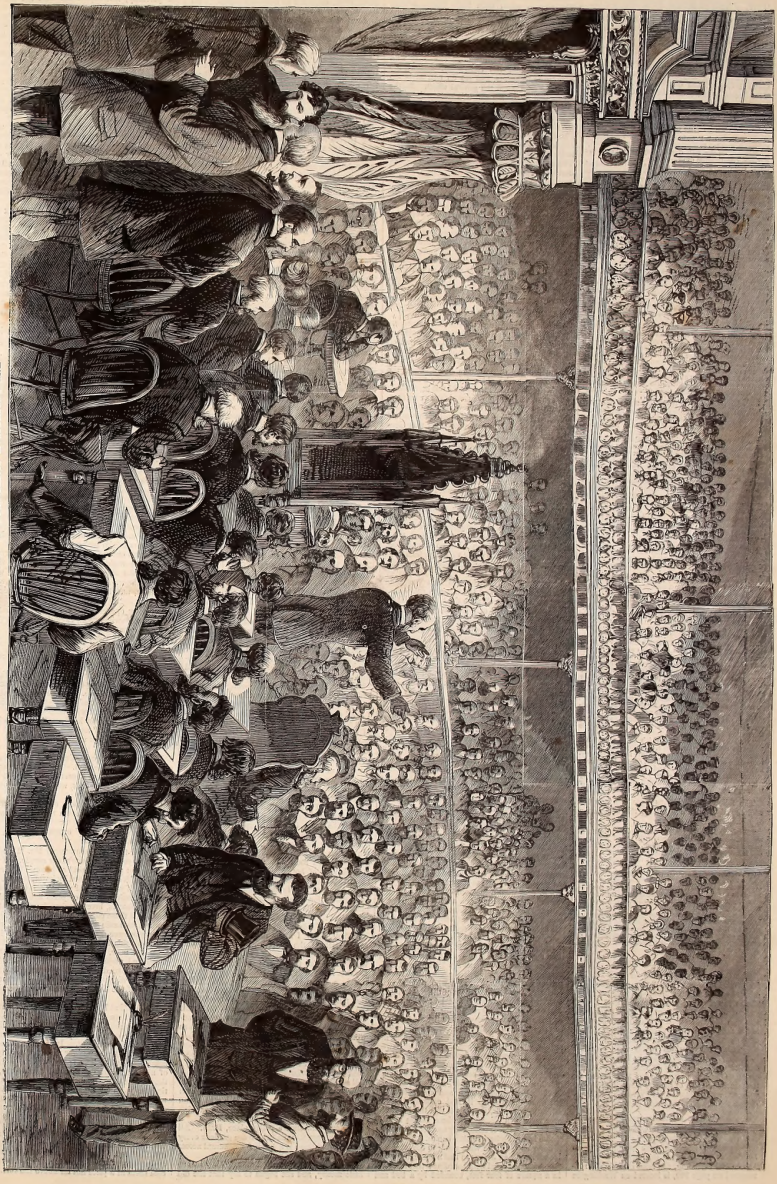


"I set up as long as I can hold my breath, then put in a comma; when I gape I insert a semicolon; when I sneeze a colon; and when I want to take another chew of tobacco I insert a period." We can not withhold these rules, so admirable in their simplicity, from the public.

They sat upon the front-door mat,
  Where softly shone the moon,
And listened to the music that
  Came from a beer saloon.

His manly arm did round her twine,
  Their lips in kisses met;
And when he asked "Wilt thou be mine?"
  She said "I will, you bet!"

One day at the table of the late Mr. Pease (Dean of Ely), just as the cloth was being removed, the subject of discourse happened to be that of an extraordinary mortality among the lawyers. "We have lost," said a gentleman, "not less than six eminent barristers in as many months." The dean, who was quite deaf, rose as his friend finished his remarks, and gave the company grace: "For this and every mercy the Lord's holy name be praised."



It is asserted that a man with glass eyes can't real eyes (realize) any thing.

ARRIVAL OF DELEGATES TO THE REPUBLICAN CONVENTION AT CHICAGO.—SKETCHED BY W. B. BAIRD.—[SEE PAGE 362.]

EXTERIOR OF CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, CHICAGO.—[SEE PAGE 362.]

THE REPUBLICAN CONVENTION IN SESSION.—VIEW FROM THE STAGE.—[SEE PAGE 362.]

THE REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

The six hundred and fifty delegates to the National Convention of the Republican party met at Chicago on May 20, and after adopting a brief but clear and explicit platform nominated General Ulysses S. Grant and Hon. Schuyler Colfax as its candidates for President and Vice-President. There was no opposition to General Grant, and on the fourth ballot for Vice-President the choice for Mr. Colfax was nearly unanimous.

THE PLATFORM.

The following is the platform as adopted:

"The National Republican Party of the United States, assembled in National Convention in the city of Chicago, on the 20th day of May, 1868, make the following declaration of principles:

"1. We congratulate the country on the assured success of the reconstruction policy of Congress, as evinced by the adoption, in the majority of the States lately in rebellion, of Constitutions securing equal civil and political rights to all; and it is the duty of the Government to sustain those Constitutions and to prevent the people of such States from being remitted to a state of anarchy.

"2. The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained, while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States.

"3. We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime, and the national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted.

"4. It is due to the labor of the nation that taxation should be equalized and reduced as rapidly as the national faith will permit.

"5. The national debt, contracted, as it has been, for the preservation of the Union for all time to come, should be extended over a fair period for redemption; and it is the duty of Congress to reduce the rate of interest thereon whenever it can be honestly done.

"6. That the best policy to diminish our burden of debt is to so improve our credit that capitalists will seek to loan us money at lower rates of interest than we now pay, and must continue to pay, so long as repudiation, partial or total, open or covert, is threatened or suspected.

"7. The Government of the United States should be administered with the strictest economy, and the corruptions which have been so shamefully nursed and fostered by Andrew Johnson call loudly for radical reform.

"8. We professedly deplore the untimely and tragic death of Abraham Lincoln, and regret the accession of Andrew Johnson to the Presidency, who has acted treacherously to the people who elected him, and the cause he was pledged to support—who has usurped high legislative and judicial functions—who has refused to execute the laws—who has used his high office to induce other officers to ignore and violate the laws—who has employed his executive powers to render insecure the property, the peace, liberty, and life of the citizen—who has abused the pardoning power—who has denounced the National Legislature as unconstitutional—persistently and corruptly resisted, by every measure in his power, every proper attempt at the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion—who has perverted the public patronage into an engine of wholesale corruption, and who has been justly impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and properly pronounced guilty thereof by the vote of thirty-five Senators.

"9. The doctrine of Great Britain and other European Powers, that because a man is once a subject he is always so, must be resisted at every hazard by the United States as a relic of the feudal times, not authorized by the law of nations, and at war with our national honor and independence. Naturalized citizens are entitled to be protected in all their rights of citizenship as though they were native born; and no citizen of the United States, native or naturalized, must be liable to arrest and imprisonment by any foreign Power for acts done or words spoken in this country; and if so arrested and imprisoned it is the duty of the Government to interfere in his behalf.

"10. Of all who were faithful in the trials of the late war there were none entitled to more especial honor than the brave soldiers and seamen who endured the hardships of campaign and cruise, and imperiled their lives in the service of the country. The bounties and pensions provided by the laws for these brave defenders of the nation are obligations never to be forgotten. The widows and orphans of the gallant dead are the wards of the people, a sacred legacy bequeathed to the nation's protecting care.

"11. Foreign emigration, which in the past has added so much to the wealth, development and resources, and increase of power to this nation, the asylum of the oppressed of all nations, should be fostered and encouraged by a liberal and just policy.

"12. This Convention declares itself in sympathy with all the oppressed people which are struggling for their rights."

The following resolutions were also adopted unanimously, and are added to the declaration of principles:

"Resolved, That we highly commend the spirit of magnanimity and forgiveness with which the men who have served in the rebellion, but now frankly and honestly co-operate with us in restoring the peace of the country and reconstructing the Southern State Governments upon the basis of impartial justice and equal rights, are received back into the communion of the loyal people. And we favor the removal of the disqualifications and restrictions placed upon the late rebels in the same measure as the spirit of loyalty will direct, and as may be consistent with the safety of the loyal people.

"Resolved, That we recognize the great principles laid down in the immortal Declaration of Independence as the true foundation of Democratic government; and we hail with gladness every effort toward making these principles a living reality on every inch of American soil."

ARRIVAL OF DELEGATES.

The Convention was called for May 20; but for several days before that time delegates and others interested in the proceedings began to arrive in the city. It was estimated that 25,000 persons were in attendance on the Convention, although the Opera-house, which had been selected for the use of the Convention, would hold only about 2500 spectators in addition to the delegates. The various hotels were crowded to suffocation, although they had run up their charges to $20 per day in anticipation of the crush. Our engraving on page 360, of one of the principal dépôts of the city emptying itself of delegates and spectators, will give the reader an idea of the nature of the rush.

THE OPERA-HOUSE.

Crosby's Opera-house, in which the Convention was held, is the finest public building in the West, and only excelled for its peculiar purposes by Pike's Opera-house in this city.

The main building, the front of which is represented on page 360, is located on Washington Street, between State and Dearborn streets. The view is taken from State Street, looking west. The building has a front on Washington Street of one hundred and forty feet; is four stories high, with a Mansard roof, and the architecture is Italian. It is built of marble quarried within forty miles of Chicago. The front of the building combines simplicity with massiveness, and the ornamental designs are sufficiently elaborate, and yet do not, as is too often the case, spoil the general effect. In the centre is a projection which is twenty-three feet wide, through which is an arched entrance to the building. Upon the parapet above this entrance are placed four statues, representing respectively Painting, Sculpture, Music, and Commerce. Higher in this same central projection are two large figures representing Music and the Drama. These are placed one on each side of an elaborate dormer window.

PRESIDENT OF THE CONVENTION.

The Convention was regularly organized on May 20 by the selection of General Joseph R. Hawley, ex-Governor of Connecticut, as permanent President. We give a good portrait of him on page 364. General Hawley entered the volunteer army in 1861 and fought through the war, receiving, as a reward for his personal gallantry and devotion to the cause, the rank of Brigadier-General. On his return to Connecticut he was put in nomination by the Republican party for the Governorship, and elected to that office by a large majority.

THE CONVENTION IN SESSION.

Our large engraving on page 361 represents the Convention in session for the transaction of business. General Hawley is represented on the stand addressing the assembled delegates and spectators. Many thousands of persons were prevented from entering the house, while the 2500 or 3000 who did get in were packed so closely that standing room could not be found.

On the nomination of General Grant by General John A. Logan, the wildest enthusiasm prevailed; but when, after the roll of States had been called, the President announced that General Grant had been nominated without opposition and without a dissenting vote, the vast audience rose to their feet, and cheer upon cheer was given for the nominee. The men, in their excitement, threw up their hats, yelled, and cheered; the women waved their handkerchiefs, and the band sent forth the sweet strains of a patriotic air.

During this excitement a scene was shifted at the rear of the stage representing General Grant stationed on one of the pedestals of the front of the White House, on which was inscribed, "Republican nominee of the Chicago Convention, May 20, 1868." The other vacant pedestal was inscribed, "Democratic nominee, New York Convention, July 4, 1868." The Goddess of Liberty stood between the two with one hand pointing to Grant, and the other to the vacant pedestal, and above all were the words, "Match him." In the height of the excitement a dove, painted in red, white, and blue, was let loose, and it flew forth and back from the stage over the heads of the assemblage.

RECEPTION OF THE NEWS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

From all parts of the Union come indications of the popularity of the ticket in the enthusiasm of the people for the nominees. In various cities of the country the announcement of the nomination was greeted with the firing of guns, while throughout the country the news was circulated not less thoroughly if with somewhat less rapidity. One of our artists sends us a sketch of the reception of the news in the country, which we give on page 364.

WHERE IS IT?

It was an imprudent marriage! Every body said so! Nobody could have dreamed of such a thing! "What Ruth saw in John, a penniless clerk," her friends did not know. "What John saw in Ruth, a girl with no money to help out his eight hundred a year," his friends would not pretend to say. How they were to live nobody knew. Society washed its hands of them. They had married for no better reason than that they loved, and as they had sown so must they reap.

Still, they were a pleasant couple to see. He was so kindly, she was such a little bud of a woman, and both believed so thoroughly in the baby, though it was an imprudent baby. Not that it had done any thing very decided. How could it, poor dear, when it had not yet discovered whether its little fat hands were its own or let down to it on a string? but all babies not born under the shadow of their own roofs are Pariahs and Nuisances. They are advertised against in the newspapers by the severe people who only receive adults. They are argued out of the right to their own existence by the political economist, and proved to be Wrongs, and Evils, and Disgraces, and Heaven knows what other dreadful things, in large capitals. This, in a general way, while, in an individual way, you must remember the people, who had your good at heart, and who came and wagged their heads in solemn disapprobation over your babies' unconscious cradles; and it is only another proof of Ruth and John's inability to reason that they, as I said, believed in their baby, and fondled and cuddled it, and fed it, and talked to it, and exhausted themselves to amuse it, thought it was the best baby ever seen in a steam-car, where babies usually turn vicious, lest it should cry and let itself down to the level of other people's babies.

John and his wife were going to the inaccessible wilds of New Jersey to find a home, as people who were disgusted with boarding: that is, living in a square of four feet, bounded by a bed and washing-stand, and eating they were afraid to think what, disguised as hash and stews. And they assert that they procured tickets and seats in the cars of a certain well-known Jersey road. But this is impossible, as the story of their subsequent adventures will prove.

First, as I have said, they addressed themselves to Baby; but, even while engaged in this arduous task, it occurred to them both that "something or other" was wanting. When Baby fell asleep they discovered that the missing "something" was the usual bumpety bump! with which our railway-coaches bounce over the rails. The train shot forward, smoothly, like a ray. The missing, "or other," was the dust. The air circulated in the cars through water. Nobody panted or gasped, and nobody became the under stratum of an upper crust of cinders and ashes. This was scarcely traveling, and Ruth and John, who seldom get a holiday, felt vaguely disappointed, as if cheated out of some of their traveling perquisites.

Furthermore, the train on which John and Ruth say that they started is down on the time-tables as a way-train. This train made no stop till it reached its terminus, which is a town called Juneroseville; and how John and Ruth can still persist that they traveled on the well-known railway, when there is no such station on the time-tables of the W. K. R. R., I am at a loss to understand. However, as the train stopped there, though the name was new to them, our young people did not see how they could avoid getting out. So they got out! with the Baby, the lunch-basket, the traveling-bag, the time-table, the umbrellas, and Ruth's cloak.

Ruth carried the Baby, awake and hungry. John carried the other incumbrances; and, of course, they looked about eagerly for the little den usually known as the railway station, but no little den met their view. In the place where it should stand somebody had erected a cottage of one story, surrounded by a wide piazza. About this cottage was a garden with well-kept walks and such fine flowers in its windows that Ruth and John felt positively aggravated. What right had any man to parade his home comforts and coziness under the very eyes of tired, hungry, and vagabondish travelers?

"Nice place!" growled John. "Sun broiling, and not even a platform on which to lay down your bundles."

"Yes," piped Ruth, "but what is that over the door this way? It looks like 'Ladies' Room.' John, I believe that this is the station."

"Nonsense!" answered John; but Ruth was right. It was the station. Oh, what a delightful discovery for people who had a Baby, and a traveling-bag, and a lunch-basket, and cloaks, and umbrellas, and the time-table!

Before going further I will say here that I do not expect what I am about to tell will be believed. I do not believe it myself. I have never seen it, and nothing less than the testimony of my own senses would convince me on such a point. I only repeat what was told to me, and at the express desire of my young friends, Ruth and John.

They say that this one-story cottage proved to be actually a railway station, as I have already declared, and that on the ladies' side it was divided into two apartments. The outer was cool, scrupulously clean, and furnished with an abundance of comfortable chairs, and ice-water, and that its windows were filled with fine plants. The inner apartment was a dressing-room. It had sofas, easy-chairs, a large mirror, and plenty of water, soap, and towels. Out of this opened a third door, over which was written "For Children and Babies." It was carpeted, and contained a bath, several rocking-chairs, a cradle, and two or three little berths ranged one above the other.

The coolness, the cleanliness of all this, and the scent of roses rose up to meet our tired people like a welcome. They looked about them, first in bewilderment. Then Ruth, still half afraid that this after all might prove somebody's house, slipped into the dressing-room, and was much surprised to find that water actually ran out of the pipes into the deep, clean, marble basins, because at most stations the pipes are superior to any such weakness. But when she saw the cradles, and the bath, and the cool, carpeted, flower-scented room, for the bathing, feeding, and hushing of hot, hungry, maddened babies, and tired, candy-smeared, woeful children, she uttered a scream that brought John to her side in an instant; for to tell the truth, he had his suspicions of all this cleanliness and flower-show.

"What is it?" cried John, and then stood staring; he finally delivered himself as follows:

"Well, Ruth, I know of one railway-station at least where the Company seems to suspect that their travelers may be Christians, and provides them with towels and water. But this is the first institution of any kind where I ever saw a Baby's existence recognized as a fact. Every where else you feel as if a Baby was something that the law does not allow, and you must smuggle it along as well as you can, and take your chances. This Juneroseville must be an uncommon place, a wonderful place, Ruth! I was wondering what I could do with you and Baby! But you can stay here and make Baby comfortable, and I will find a place where we can dine."

Ruth took off her bonnet and Baby's cap, and sank into a comfortable arm-chair. Baby soon fell asleep, and placing him in the cradle she fell asleep on a sofa. When John came back both the little woman and her Baby had a nap, and were fresh, washed, and brushed, and in high spirits. John was in high spirits also.

"Never saw such a pretty place, Ruth. All the houses are fine, and there are gardens every where; and there is a Ladies' Restaurant across the street, where we can dine."

Ruth quaked at the word dine. They had so little money, and she began to say that she did not need a dinner; but John, who understood her perfectly, interrupted her with the bill of fare.

"Coffee for two, six cents; rolls for two, four cents; steak (porter-house), eighteen cents; lettuce, two cents; peas, four cents; strawberries, six cents.

"Either we are about to eat the worst dinner that we have ever seen," said Ruth, handing back the bill, "or these people are crazy."

"My opinion," returned John, picking up the Baby. "But we can go and see."

Ruth followed, sniffing with secret scorn; she knew the ways of the world, and what to expect from such a programme.

Judge, then, of her surprise. The steak was tender, the rolls and butter delicious. The fruit and vegetables fresh, and the coffee as good as Ruth herself could make. Perplexity grew on our young friends. Were the Juneroseville-ites mad as their station and restaurant seemed to proclaim? They were discussing the probabilities, in a low voice, when John saw a familiar face—Jem M'Mahon's.

To see M'Mahon was quite as surprising as the dinner. Five years ago he had contracted an imprudent marriage; married a very good and accomplished girl, who was only a teacher, and sunk entirely out of society. Some said that he was living in South America, and more that he was dead. Yet here he was in Juneroseville, unchanged, except that he was stouter and jollier than of old, and had the air of a thriving man upon him. And he knew John in an instant; and having been introduced to "my wife," and after scanning her fresh face and trim figure a little he said:

"I beg pardon, John, but are you not another imprudent couple?"

Ruth reddened, and John laughed.

"Why, yes," he said, slowly. "I suppose that we are; or, at least, our friends think so."

"Then you are in the right place, returned M'Mahon, with great animation. "Pray come home with me. Mrs. M'Mahon will be charmed to see you."

"What will come next?" thought Ruth, bundling up herself and the baby.

A carriage was waiting without.

"So you keep your carriage," observed John, not without something like envy.

M'Mahon smiled.

"We keep our carriage, my dear fellow. Several of them, in fact. I will explain by-and-by. Here is my house."

It was one of the massive, handsome structures of which Juneroseville seemed to be composed. John looked at it with a sort of gaping, open-mouthed wonder. For how could M'Mahon have laid up so much wealth in the five years in which he had been lost to society?

M'Mahon opened the door, and they followed him up two flights of stairs. The flights were long, but the stairs were wide and easy, with many landings. Ruth observed that they were of marble, and beautifully kept, and wondered the more.

M'Mahon opened a door and led them into a handsome drawing-room, saying,

"This is our floor."

"Your floor! there are other families?"

"Yes, certainly."

Ruth's veneration for M'Mahon sank at once. He was living in a tenement-house after all. She looked about the drawing-room. It was furnished in fine taste. It had pictures and busts that she had desired all her life. The remaining rooms, Ruth saw, were a sort of sewing-room and library united, and bedrooms with deep closets.

"But where is your kitchen?" asked Ruth.

"We have none," answered her host.

"But how can you wash and bake?"

"We do neither."

Ruth looked soberly, first at Mr. M'Mahon and then at her husband. She thought that he was playing off some impertinent jest. M'Mahon understood the look, and brought forward chairs.

"Pray sit down," he said, earnestly, "and let me explain what must seem to you like inventions."

"I should think so," murmured Ruth; but she sat down.

"I said to you," commenced Mr. M'Mahon, "that, as you are an imprudent couple, you were in the right place. I said so because this entire town is built and sustained by imprudent couples, of which, if you please, I will sketch the history.

"A certain number of years ago several imprudent, that is, love matches, happened at one time. All these persons were friends. They attempted to settle themselves, and found, as no doubt you have done, what a small place is reserved in this large world for people, who like them are poor, and yet are burdened with the habits and prejudices of refinement and education. They tried the usual resource, a boarding-house, till disgusted, and quite agreed that this method of life destroyed the stomach and the morals."

He looked at Ruth, who looked at John, rather doubtful where all this was leading.

"It was then," continued M'Mahon, with evident relish, "that they said we are young, strong, and intelligent. It is impossible that there should be no way for us out of poverty and boarding-houses. This speech was the beginning of many anxious debates and discussions, and these discussions ended here; though at that time, as you may suppose, there was nothing of what you see now about you; only a farm, and a rambling old farm-house, of which our couples took possession. A share in it was appointed each family, and as disputes and difficulties must arise, a committee was appointed to settle them. The rent divided among so many was, of course, a mere song. They raised their own vegetables, and sent a portion of them to market, where they sold them at a price not far above the cost. The wages of house-servants, and farm-laborers were divided among them like the rent: also the small profits. A short experience in buying and selling decided them to establish a market and grocery for themselves. They bought at wholesale, and sold to outsiders at a small advance. Each family lived thus at one-third of the usual cost, and derived a small profit from the steadily increasing business. From this small beginning sprang all the flourishing town."

"Indeed," remarked John; seeing that he was expected to say something.

"Hundreds of 'ingredient couples' have joined us, at one time and another," continued M'Mahon, enthusiastically. "The old farm-house vanished long ago, before the first of such buildings as this. By uniting our salaries and our profits we have surrounded ourselves with elegance as well as luxuries. We have our common dwelling, that at which you dined. We order from there whatever dinners are on the card for that day, and get them at cost price, while we are actually making money on it, for all our institutions are sure to attract custom, because of the honesty which is our policy, and the small profits. In the same way we have several laundries in operation. That dread and terror of housewives, washing-day, and dinners are spared our wives, who retain their youth and health. We have also various clubs established, which I think solve the problem of getting the best living at the cheapest rate."

"All very fine!" answered John, skeptically; "only it sounds a little too much like a Utopia, just at the end, where all the good get rewarded, you know."

"There's a reason in it any way," said M'Mahon, determinedly. "See here. I want to send my girl to school, where she can receive the education of a lady. I can not pay fifteen hundred dollars, or forty or more, a quarter. But there are three hundred of us who do or will want such schooling. Say ten of us contribute one hundred a quarter. That is three thousand dollars a quarter to run a school. Say we contribute only five dollars. That is fifteen hundred dollars a quarter.

"Or again, I like to read rare and expensive books. I am unable to buy them. But when I want to read, and we put what we can spare together, we get a library—the finest one in the United States, and a museum of books not worth the name. Why should not the story read better when you set about life in the right way. Take your choice. What have you to say against you? Your prejudices. You would not be what you are without them, but it will cost you more to shelter, clothe, and feed them than you can. Next your poverty. You have exactly enough to live on long as you never have a day's ill health or slacken in your economy. In such a position you can never get ahead. You can only keep even. Some slight mischance happens, and you fall behind, and you can not get up again, for you have nothing out of which to draw the necessary funds. All the chances are against you, pulling your cart up hill. All the chances are for us, pulling our cart up hill. We divide the load, so that one trip we pull him up. We are sure of reaching the top, and shall have some money besides by drawing some load up in it. Do you see?"

"Why, yes; that sounds reasonable," returned John; "but how did you come here?"

"By accident, at my house down town. I was so well pleased with what I saw that I have never gone back. You will like the people. They are human, and a little out of the world; but they are restrained and controlled by the fact that each man is a property-owner, and has a share in every public institution."

"Yes, that sounds reasonable also," replied John, evidently meditating. "At least it would do no harm to try it. We have nothing to lose. But we must go back to-night."

"Better decide at once to stay," urged M'Mahon. "Why not? You have your wife and child here."

"Oh! but our clothes and things," cried Ruth, horror-stricken.

M'Mahon eyed her pityingly, and rose.

"You had better stay; but, if you must go, there is the whistle. You can just catch the train."

"Thank you," said John. "I won't say good-by. I shall see you again."

"Good-by," said M'Mahon, meaningly. "You should have staid."

And perhaps they should, for they have never found Juneroseville since. It is not on any of the railway routes, or in the maps, or the guidebooks. It is the child of it, and only those believes in it. Still John has not lost hope, but desires me to ask the public for the whereabouts of Juneroseville, and adds that all information will be thankfully received by John and Ruth.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE sufferings of the Cretan refugees have awakened the deepest sympathy throughout Christendom, and some substantial relief has been sent to the unhappy who were perishing. We scarcely realize the fact that more than forty thousand men, children, and women old men have been taken from Crete by European vessels and landed upon neighboring islands, or upon the shores of Continental Greece, to protect them from the atrocities of the returning Turks. They fled famishing, penniless, and half-naked, and are dependent upon the charities of the world, for the Greeks are too poor to take care of such a multitude.

The island of Crete, called Candia by the modern, is the largest and most beautiful of the Grecian Archipelago. It is about one hundred and sixty miles long by nearly thirty broad. A range of lofty and rugged mountains runs through the centre, from east to west. These send out spurs northward and southward, which extend nearly to the shore, thus breaking up the island into picturesque variety. The mountains and hills, being calcareous, abound in fine pasture-grasses, some of which are large and beautiful, but very intricate. Its climate is so mild, its skies so soft, its waters so sweet, its soil so rich, its productions so abundant, and all its natural conditions so favorable to human life and enjoyment that the ancients called it "The Island of the Blessed." Between the mountain-spurs, and along the shores, are plains and broken country of marvelous fertility. Oranges, lemons, figs, and other luscious fruits grow plenteously on the plains; the vine clambers the hills and the mountain-sides; and olive orchards spread over the whole island. Aromatic plants abound, and in the groves are many beautiful birds of song. The Turkish invaders of this beautiful land have indulged in the most horrible cruelty and violence upon the inhabitants—particularly upon women and children. At the time the insurrection broke out in August, 1866, the Cretans were not as much the helpless as was possible away from their brutal oppressors, for, in the first place, only eighteen men might remain to carry on the dreadful struggle for independence, and all the others were obliged to leave their husbands, and defend, with them, the interior of the island.

The contributions to the Cretans have been productive of immediate good. Food and clothing have been distributed, and the unburied were buried, but in the mountains of Crete: and at this moment thousands of wretched people are kept from starvation and nakedness by garments made by the hands of American women, and many despairing hearts have been gladdened and strengthened by the substantial evidence of genuine sympathy. Schools have also been established, and the orphans, sewing and knitting supplied to many of the women, and efficient measures instituted to relieve the diseases and evils of their peculiar condition. This rebellion against Mohammedanism is therefore regarded as having an important bearing upon Christian civilization, and the fate of the suffering has a double claim on the Christian public.

A singular fish is found in great numbers in the inland rivers of Alaska. It is about eight inches long, transparent, and the most fat of all the finny tribes. This fat, however, has not the oily, rancid taste of other fish, but is like fresh cream. The fish, as we described, the Indians often turn them to a novel and ingenious use. Having dried them, they make candles. They give a clear, brilliant light, and are not liable to be blown out by the wind. Mr. Mansee, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Alaska, says he should be lighted instead of the head, and that each fish has an additional wick.

A newspaper of Santiago, Chili, relates a wondrous story of a gigantic bird which made its appearance in the air one evening about the 15th of May, in the presence of a group of miners. It is described as being of immense size when it approached, but to shape like a grasshopper, with great, brown wings, with enormous eyes of wide expanse, and body and head covered with something like hair or bristles; the body, however, being itself small. At first of a serpent, was covered with brilliant scales, which emitted sparks of fire, and a strange animal moved itself along. The superstitious Spanish Boundary is but soil and climate, and will be a valuable production.

Among the latest bits of news we learn that the early Spanish settlers in Chili have left their names to late in the umbrella trade—that artificial hair is now largely used for the purpose. A Chilenean in California is fattening rats for the table—the latest style is to hitch peasnuts to the side like swords—that the most fashionable color of ladies' stockings is the wings of angels—that at a recent election for trustees in a church at Valparaiso five ladies were voted in without doing any harm; and that a learned German theologian has translated Hard Times into 45,635 Spanish devils.

Some rather irreverent verses on Bulwinkles "Mrs. Judge Jenkins," which he announces as the only genuine society thriller," by Bulwer Muller." The concluding couplets will indicate what this revised edition of Bulwer is, and what was the "sequel":

Alas for maiden! alas for Judge!
For the sentimental—that's one-half "fudge."
For Maud soon thought the baby born,
With all his learning and all his lore,
And the doctor's wife, and Mrs. Maud's fair face
For more refinement and social grace.
Full of words of tongue and pen,
The sudden end, "It laughs at men."
More and more these we daily see,
"Tis the "half" that's left by me.

Prussia, which country has but recently adopted the use of postage-stamps, disposed of no less than 68,-661,070 during the past year, thereby realizing a sum of $2,799,672.

The Bronze Gallery of Messrs. Tiffany & Co. constantly replenished by the choicest productions of Munich and other foreign articles, is a favorite resort for connoisseurs, and is frequented by the best collections of the metropolis. In 1859 this firm commenced the manufacture of sterling silver-ware, and from experience has shown that they are much more exactly and cleanly constructed than those of foreign production. It is said that Tiffany & Co. are the largest manufacturers of sterling silver-ware in the country. No article of jewelry except of the standard proof (925 parts of silver-ware departments, and the designers have constantly on hand a variety of patterns in the ways of theory and illustration. The growing fashionableness of public taste is constantly requiring something original, the commingle usage in the forms of ornamentation, and the resources of the Designing Department are called into daily requisition.

A chemist at Lyons has just poisoned two young ladies—by mistake, of course, giving them an infusion of belladonna instead of some other medicine. There is cause for apprehension, in the case of one of them, that the result may be fatal. The Gazette des Tribunaux states that about ten years ago a similar error was committed by one of the first physicians in Paris, the victim being the Italian tragédienne Adelaide Ristori, who was saved with much difficulty. A gentleman of the name of Rochereuil, who subscribes the general public are so completely powerless in their hands. He shall cause your enemy to be arrested and take what the doctor orders, and the chemist chooses to send us, in entire confidence. In half King Hal's reign an Act provided a very refined punishment for poisoners, viz., boiling to death. It was passed in consequence of the Bishop of Rochester's cook having poisoned seventeen persons, two of whom died. One hundred and seventy years ladies were publicly executed, 31 B.C., for poisoning their husbands. In the seventeenth century the Marchioness Brinvilla confessed to having been a party in poisoning fifty persons. A certain Exili gave poisoned cakes that was sold in small fat vials. The effect not being sudden, and the poison being as clear as water, no suspicion was caused for a long time.

An exact calculator has made an estimate based upon the salaries paid to ministers, and the number of sermons preached, and arrives at the conclusion that the average price paid for a sermon, to take the country through, is two cents apiece!

From a letter dated "Paris, April 19," we make the following quotation:

"Having noticed an article in your Weekly for March 28, relative to the boring of an Artesian well on Colt's estate in Hartford, I have referred it, as a subscriber to your Weekly, and knowing the interest which you take in all industrial enterprises, to mention a few Artesian wells in France.

"The largest well of this kind in France and probably in Europe, is at the Marine Hospital at Rochefort, which is on the left bank of the river Charente. Monsieur Charles Laurent & Co., of this city. This well was begun with the intention of obtaining fresh water for the use of the hospital. It was commenced at a diameter of 24 inches, and reduced at 9 inches. After having bored to the depth of 2126 feet they reached hot mineral water, the temperature of which is at degrees centigrade, and will probably be used for bathing and other purposes in the hospital. Another well has been commenced, and is now boring at a quarter known as "La Cayole" in Paris. It was commenced at a diameter of 5 feet 10 inches, and has attained the depth of 1,312 feet. Its actual diameter is 4 feet 4 inches, and boring is advancing at the rate of more than three feet per hour, day and night.

"The French Government has caused a large number of these wells to be bored in Algiers, but the two above-mentioned are really worthy of notice."

It is stated that there is a new invention in Chautauqua County, New York, a mimickry, sufficient in size to accommodate a large number of these animals; and it is believed that when the propagation of the rabbit is carried on extensively it will become a very profitable business. They are easily kept, and readily bred, tamed, and domesticated. The expense of feeding is merely nominal, and the necessary arrangements simple.

ILLUMINATING OUR INNER SELVES.

THE Chinese sword-swallowers at the Paris Exhibition were extraordinary performers in their way; but of what epoch of progress they have soon been distanced. Swallowing a sabre, at present, is nothing. The fashion now is to swallow a lighted lantern and brilliantly illuminate your inner man. You shall become a living and walking gas-light; that is all.

It is evident that swallowing a lantern is only one remove in advance of swallowing a sword. Now there happen to be little electric lanterns which give light without burning. They are called Lucernes. They are a little small glass cylinders, either empty or filled with azote, hydrogen, or carbonic acid gas, through which a voltaic current is made to pass. The tube become sufficiently luminous to allow you to read printed letters held at several inches distant from them. When this miniature tube is introduced into a stomach, the skin is transparent enough to permit a very strong reflection of the internal organs to be divulged; and Diogenes would be delighted to find that, instead of a mere superficial outside view of his man, he could honest man, he can now, with the newly-invented lantern, look right on through and through.

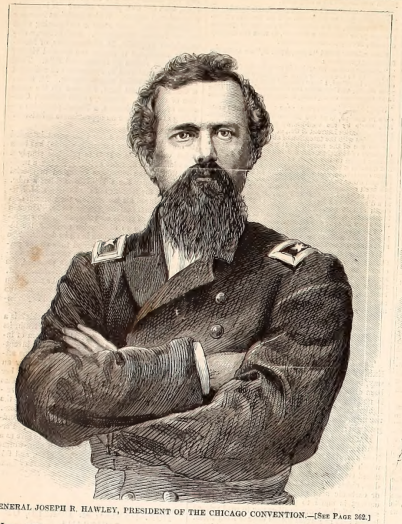
The experiment which may be considered accordingly curious until something still more strange is started, is only an extended copy of what has been practiced and carried out for some years past. For instance, there is the Ophthalmoscope, or Eye-inspector, of the German philosopher Helmholtz, a small tube with means of which the interior of the eye being lighted up, it is possible to explore successfully the deepest portions of that interesting organ. Similar instruments exist in the examination of divers internal parts of the human body. Not the least remarkable of these inquisitive apparatuses is the Laryngoscope, invented by a German physician named Czermak, for the inspection of the respiratory passages and the machinations of the throat-voice.

The vocal organ in man (which Dr. Tyndall truly describes as the most perfect of reed instruments) is placed in the top of the windpipe, the head of which is adjusted for the attachment of certain elastic bands, called "vocal chords," which stretch across the aperture. When the air from the lungs is forced through the slit which separates these vocal chords, they are thrown into vibration. By varying their tension the rate of vibration is varied, and the sound changed in pitch. The quantity and smoothness of the voice depend on the perfect closure of the slit of the glottis at regular intervals during the vibration.

The vocal chords may be illuminated and viewed in a mirror placed suitably at the back of the mouth. It is to this end once attempted to project M. Czermak's larynx upon a screen in his lecture-room, but with only partial success. The Laryngoscope, however, is capable of showing the Laryngoscope, its motions, both in singing, speaking, and coughing, being strikingly visible. The roughness of the surface may be detected according to the aforesaid Helmholtz (learned in Acoustics), to mucous flocculi, which get into the slit of the glottis, and affect the clear tone-quality of the Laryngoscope. The squeaking falsetto voice with which persons are afflicted, the same Helmholtz thinks, may be removed by the drawing aside of the mucous layer which ordinarily lies under and loads the vocal chords. Their edges then become free to exhibit their weight less; while their elasticity remaining the same, they are shaken into more rapid tremors. The promptness and accuracy with which the vocal chords can change their tension, their form, and the width of the slit between them render the voice the most perfect of musical instruments.

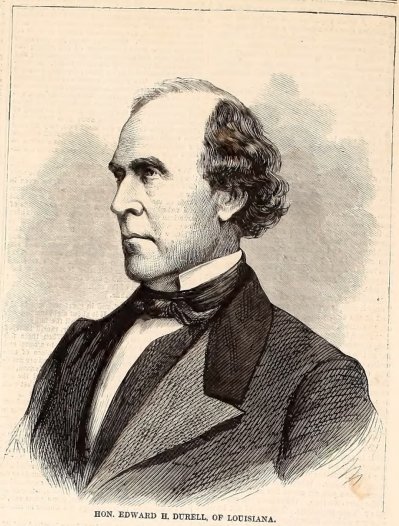
The order of the day, therefore, is that we should be able to see every thing, without exception. If we can look an animacule through and through by means of transmitted light; if, in the same way, we behold the blood circulating in the tail of a tadpole or the foot of a frog, with all the minute vessels thereto pertaining, why should we not do so with larger animals, with our own proper selves? It is merely a question of degree. With a sufficient intensity of illuminating power there is no knowing what may not become transparent. And, in fact, a distinguished hygienist, M. Jarrejeau, of Montpellier, attempted to render the internal viscera of the body visible by transmitted light. They were to be exhibited to by-standers as animated and most interesting transparencies. M. Brück, a German medical man, followed up the same line of research. Finally, at the Medical Congress of 1867, M. Milliot, a French physician residing at Algiers, gave an approximate solution of the problem.

His Splanchnoscope (or instrument intended to render the viscera internally visible) has been tried with success. It is in principle simply a Gessler's tube, or, more strictly speaking, a modification of the apparatus described in special treatises under the title of Mindeldorf's tube. At one of the meetings of the Congress, M. Milliot introduced his lantern into the stomach of a dog by means of an œsophagian probe. Through the skin, thus rendered transparent, the spectators were able to diagnosis perfectly the interior of the dog's stomach in all its details. The experiment was tried a second time on the person of a boy. The light in use quite recently referred to M. Henri de Parville's presence, the scientific collaborateur of the Constitutionnel. M. Milliot had meanwhile introduced a tube more than a yard in length into a man's œsophagus; and the internal appearance of the body-seated organ became perfectly distinguishable.



Cui bono? What is the good of all this? is a very natural question to ask. And, in truth, its utility is not very apparent. The question of internal lighting up having, however, been inventented, its useful application will probably come afterward. Meanwhile, it will doubtless furnish an absent dress-maker, while thinking where her next stitch is to be taken, the swallowed needles and pins instead of space pincushions. It may settle the question whether Master Tommy or the cat has emptied all the pots of strawberry jam. At worst, it will be a formidable rival to sword-swallowing and Japanese feats of dexterity. Perhaps even next season's pantomime will give us a "gas brilliant," danced by human glow-worms shining with all their might and main, and followed up by a new edition of the Fire and Lantern, with effects which no Chinese stage-manager ever dreamed of.

HON. DANIEL M. DURELL, OF LOUISIANA.



THE subject of this sketch was born in the town of Plymouth, New Hampshire, in the year 1811. He entered Harvard University in the year 1827, and throughout his four-years' course was remarkable for his eager thirst for general literature, especially that of the old masters. Here it was that he laid the broad and deep foundation for his vast store of learning. After graduating he studied law in the office of his father, Hon. DANIEL M. DURELL, who had been a Judge of the Land Lower, for two years, under the auspices of Mr. POLK, afterward President, but went to New Orleans and commenced the practice of the law.

His twenty-five years' life in New Orleans prior to the rebellion may be briefly stated. It was the period of his presenting a career under which the pluck of most men yields—namely, that of large capacity and unfailing opportunity. With an ardent love for mankind, and a keen appreciation of the derangement and demoralization produced by slavery, he was little in Southern society or institutions with which he felt a sympathy. He therefore devoted himself almost exclusively to the study of books. In the prosecution of his cases he was noticeable for the thoroughness with which he searched all the lore of the law for precedent or authority. He was generally the ardent love for mankind, and a keen appreciation of the derangement and demoralization produced by slavery, he was little in Southern society or institutions with which he felt a sympathy. He therefore devoted himself almost exclusively to the study of books. In the prosecution of his cases he was noticeable for the thoroughness with which he searched all the lore of the law for precedent or authority. He was generally the public mind at first opposed, gradually traveled up to, and ultimately adopted. He made, in some civil commotions, a very good, though unavailing struggle with which he clung to the great principles which they embodied. Once or twice he was chosen to the Senate of the State of Louisiana.

The year that brought General BUTLER to New Orleans, and developed that man of books had not read in vain, but had nurtured in his heart of learning a reverence for the genius and beneficence of free institutions as represented by the Federal Government. This quality, together with manifest ability to understand men and judge of measures, led the commanding general to place him at the head of the Bureau of Finances of that prostrated and depleted city. To say that he re-established its credit does not do him justice: he re-established it swiftly and in methods which enabled it to meet the needs and absence of commerce to meet its liabilities with promptness not surpassed in its extreme prosperity.

GENERAL JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, PRESIDENT OF THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.—[SEE PAGE 362.]

HON. EDWARD H. DURELL, OF LOUISIANA.

June, 1863, saw him placed upon the Bench of the United States District Court, where, sitting unaided both as District and Circuit Judge, were cast upon him the whole of Chancery, Common Law, and Admiralty Jurisdiction, together with the construction and application of the non-intercourse and confiscation acts and the settlement of the numerous delicate questions arising under the law of nations, on land and sea, in time of civil war. Truly these were the labors of Hercules, and performed, too, in the midst of a community for the greater part bitterly unfriendly to the Government whose interests he guarded and whose laws he enforced. But with firmness and kindness to all, following Lord BACON'S precept to Judges, he "raised the valleys and took down the hills." Not cumbering himself with authorities, except those of the leading cases, which seemed ineffaceably branded upon his mind, patient beyond praise in listening to well-digested and suggestive argument, curt to severity when sophistry would seek to pervert facts or principles, with a memory which seems never to have let go any material fact, he has unweariedly and exhaustively analyzed the perplexing questions brought before him, and with gigantic strength and upon broadest grounds solved them, until political foes listening to his luminous reasoning—so simple that a child could comprehend it—were compelled to admit its conclusiveness. "His very statement is argument; his inference seems demonstration." The common-sense justice of a case being always to him its atmosphere, he rests his decision upon principles which, when enunciated by him, are so evident that the wonder is that any one should have missed them. The force of his influence as Judge has changed the manner of reasoning, and more or less the practice in his own courts, and indirectly those of the State courts of Louisiana. For while he has preserved all the spirit of equity with which the civil law abounds, he has substituted, and prepared the way to substitute, for its looser methods the more clearly defined forms and modes of the common law.

READING THE NEWS OF THE NOMINATION OF GENERAL GRANT IN THE COUNTRY.—SKETCHED BY W. B. BAIRD.—[SEE PAGE 362.]

HONORING OUR DEAD HEROES.

The spring and summer of 1864 placed upon him fourfold duties of great magnitude. He was acting-Mayor of the city of New Orleans; he sat daily as Judge in his own thronged courts; he sat as Chief of the Finance Bureau, and from the chaos which had there reigned was steadily evoking system; and he presided over the Constitutional Convention of 1864, assembled under the orders of President LINCOLN, and largely through the weight of his personal character, notwithstanding their turbulence and acrimony in discussion, secured harmonious and, in a high degree, wise action in the Constitution promulgated; and as executive officer, financier, statesman, and jurist made his official duties appear rather as ornaments than burdens. He passed from one to the other as readily as a master musician changes the air or the strain—not perplexed by even these multiform demands—and performing all with wondrous ease and consummate ability.

It is unfortunate for the profession that his decisions have as yet not been reported. Involving as they do so wide a range of subjects, reached with such intellectual strides and elaborated with such research and learning, they are worthy of the age which produced a MARSHALL, and would be invaluable as a permanent element of American jurisprudence.

There is to be derived from his experience a lesson for the young and aspiring. The twenty-five years of his retirement, instead of being wasted in idleness or frivolity or mean pursuits, were day and night assiduously devoted to drawing from the sources of law and literature, what has proved a magnificent preparation for the high career toward which he was possibly unconsciously but surely advancing, and which he now finds to be powerful auxiliaries, all the tributes which he so patiently and earnestly levied from the whole realm of reading. Let, then, native talent take courage and labor without cessation or weariness for the opportunities which, though unseen and undeveloped, near or far off, God by his appointments ever vouchsafes to the great and greatly industrious.

HONORING OUR DEAD HEROES.

THE 30th of May was appointed, by General JOHN A. LOGAN, commanding the Grand Army of the Republic, as a day on which the late soldiers of the Union belonging to that organization should unite in strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of their comrades who fell in the late war. In this observance no form of ceremony was prescribed, but each Post of the Grand Army was urged to arrange in its own way such fitting service and testimonial of respect as circumstances would permit. "Let us," said General LOGAN, in his address, "at the time appointed gather around their sacred remains and garland the passionless mounds above them with the choicest flowers of spring-time; let us raise above them the dear old flag they saved from dishonor; let us in this solemn presence renew our pledges to aid and assist those whom they have left among us a sacred charge upon a nation's gratitude, the soldier's and sailor's widow and orphan."

It is hoped and believed that this ceremony

thus inaugurated may grow into a custom which will be kept up from year to year. Our engraving on the preceding page, from a design by CHARLES PARSONS, is intended to commemorate the order, and as a tribute to our fallen heroes.

HOW SURNAMES CAME INTO USE.

In primitive and scanty communities men neither received nor required more than a single name apiece. There is no reason to suppose that this name ever consisted of a word intrinsically chosen, and conferred without object as a mere appellative. It expressed either some fact relative to the birth or personal appearance of the newly-born child, or—perhaps more commonly—some aspiration as to the infant's future character or career on the part of the parents. Such names as were originated in the latter manner would naturally enough be closely associated with the religious belief of those who chose them.

The mythology of the ancient Teutons and their nomenclature were intimately connected. The deities whom they dreaded and worshipped, and the heroic qualities which they attributed to those deities, supplied a large proportion of their personal titles. Their simple root names, however, were soon to a great extent merged in combinations, although among our monosyllabic surnames of the present time some are to be found which are held to have come down to us unaltered from the highest Teutonic antiquity. Such combinations adopted were frequently suitable and suggestive. But this can not be said of all, or even of most of them. In the course of time names were coupled with but little regard to appropriateness, being evidently the titles of different heroes, as they had been invested with appellations denoting various and sometimes incongruous qualities. So that at an early period the influence, in the formation of the nomenclature of our progenitors begun to assert its supremacy over that of regard for titular propriety; in other words, the power of human association soon superseded the love of verbal consistency. It is interesting to note in the Teutonic names the prominence with which usage paid to work and will to the virtues of firmness and determination; and while we contrast these titles with the more highly romantic and poetical denominations of the Kelt, we can not fail to recognize in the two classes of names the early manifestation of those diverse qualities which have appropriated to the races their widely different rôles in the drama of history.

But this single personal name was sufficient only under the most primitive conditions of human life. Growing numbers rendered the frequent repetition of similar titles unavailable, and further methods of distinction became necessary. In common with most other races, the Anglo-Saxons resorted to two or three simple means for meeting the necessity. Men came to be called the sons of their fathers, while personal peculiarities originated nicknames which also soonest served to distinguish individuals. The situation of a man's residence, or his occupation, however, frequently supplied a description of him which answered, to a certain extent, as an additional name. There must have been, however, in the generality of cases, a great deal of uncertainty attendant upon the use of these modes of distinction. And even in those instances in which the second title, from being constantly applied, answered most of the ends of a modern surname, it failed to do the individual any, and involved nothing like a system of family nomenclature.

The first movement toward distinctive family titles seems, indeed, to have been made in a different direction, and to have consisted not in the adoption of a second name at all, but in the modification of the personal or fore-name. A prefix was selected, which was made common to the appellations of all the members of a family; and with this prefix the different and distinguishing terminations were compounded. Æthel-, Ead-, and Ecf- were prefix of this description; and these, with many other similar ones, were employed in a great variety of combinations. This system, however, was but rarely employed, and was not even perfectly carried out by those who in a measure adopted it.

The year 1000 has been mentioned as the probable period at which surnames—in the present acceptation of the word—were first generally employed. To the Normans belongs the credit of having instituted them.

The feudal system naturally tended to create surnames out of landed possessions, and at the same time to limit their use to the upper classes. For a long time, therefore, they were the privileged titles of the few, and not the means of family distinction employed by the people in general. It may be added that few customs changed from the date of their importation to that of their general adoption throughout the country—during which interval they were but slowly progressing downward through society. It is difficult now to follow closely the gradual process by which the ancient forms of designation became, as it were, crystallized into the consistency of permanent and hereditary surnames; but it is certain that a large proportion of our family titles of today are substantially identical with the mere descriptive terms which originally distinguish individual, from the early years of Anglo-Saxon history downward. Thus it has happened that names representing many personal cogries and peculiarity have taken their places among those originated in more regular ways, and that the patronymics, the titles derived from lands, from situation of residences, from trades and qualities, have been handed down to us amidst a heterogeneous multitude of other appellations, which, as we have seen, are surprising from their variety, and often perplexing from their extreme oddness. The process by which the ancient personal names of pre-Norman times have been perpetuated in the form of surnames demands a moment's separate consideration. It was probably a not uncommon practice among the various Anglo-Saxon race as were enabled by their energy of character to obtain their deliverance from serfdom under Norman rule, and to regain something of the social position which they had lost at the Conquest, to recur, in choosing their family name, to the honored title of some ancestor of their own. Had it not been for this loving adoption of ancestral names, we should probably find among those of our family denominations which follow the patronymic form scarcely any thing of a personal character; for by the time that surnames were beginning to come into general use the old Saxon baptismal appellations had mostly given way to the Johns, Jameses, Thomases, Williams, and Roberts of Norman introduction.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE is one of the most excellent and beautifying hair preparations to be found in this or any other country.—Charleston Mercury.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN. The only reliable Remedy for those Brown Discolorations from the Face, Neck, and Hands is PERRY'S MOLE AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. 12mo. Sold by every where.

FOR THOSE DISFIGURING DISEASES, Black Worms and Pimples on the Face, use PERRY'S COMEDONE and PIMPLE REMEDY. Prepared from Druggist, or send to Dr. B. C. Perry, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

S. T.—1860.—X.

Mercetto sold of his wound,
"It was not as deep as a well, nor as wide
As a gate, but it would do."
PLANTATION BITTERS will not raise the dead,
But they will restore the weak and nervous,
And render life a thing to be enjoyed.

We believe there are millions of living witnesses to this fact. Dyspepsia is a horrid disease, but Plantation Bitters will cure it. It is the most invigorating tonic for weakness and mentral despondency. Those who are "out of sorts" should try Plantation Bitters.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—A delightful toilet article —superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

THE MASKELL BALL, and other tales; Useful for Recitation, Scientific Articles; Sketches; Illustrations, etc., etc., will be found in "MAPLE LEAVES" for 1868. Only 60 cents a year. Address, post-paid, JOHN BURROUGHS, Publisher, 102 Nassau Street, New York.

BOOSEY & CO'S
CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. A Complete ORATORIOS and MASSES in vocal score, with organ or pianoforte accompaniments, for ALL the INSTRUMENTS; and THE MUSICAL CABINET—a complete Library of Vocal and Instrumental Music in 60 volumes—all 50 cents each. Other important musical works equally cheap. Catalogues mailed free. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, New York, and Holles Street, London.

CAUTION. All genuine BARTLETT SEWING MACHINES are now provided with a guarantee bearing the trademark and signature of H. BARTLETT, the Patentee, from the Depot, 569 Broadway, New York City.

☞ Beware of bogus Machines and Agents. ☜

"Blessings Brighten as they take Higher Flights."

Rome, friends, and all the enjoyments of life seem lonesome more dear to the sufferer from nervous debility when the probability is that, ere long, he must leave them for ever. When the health has become impaired, and the constitution is failing, then life looks more alluring. Stimulants are the only means of restoration in cases of nervous debility. The great difficulty has been to provide a stimulant possessing not only medicinal virtues, but one affording permanent relief. If HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is resorted to in such cases, its beneficial effects will soon become manifest in the increased vigor and renewed strength of the brittern dejected patient. Experience has proved this preparation to be "THE REMEDY OF THE AGE" for NERVOUS DEBILITY, as well as all diseases arising from derangement of the stomach and liver.

Persons advanced in life, and feeling the hand of time weighing heavily upon them, with a failing constitution, will find in the use of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS a powerful vigor to instill new life into their veins; restore, in a measure, the ardor and energy of more youthful days; build up their shrunken forms, and fill out their wasted limbs with healthful muscle. Those who are in the least afflicted with Dyspepsia, Ague, Biliousness, or any other troublesome and dangerous disease arising from a disordered system, should not hesitate to avail themselves of the benefits to be derived from this great remedy.

The immense quantities of this invaluable tonic that are consumed, and which is steadily increasing year by year, is sufficient in itself to disarm the most skeptical.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE
Novelty Iron Works,
Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Dey Street, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

WELLS'S EVERY MAN HIS OWN LAWYER AND BUSINESS-FORM BOOK is a complete guide in all matters of law and business transactions for every State in the Union. It is worth many times its cost to any man or woman who has or expects to have any interests to protect. 12mo, 600 pages. Price, in full leather binding, $2 50; sent postpaid on receipt of price. Address mention this paper. Address H. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 98 Spring St., New York.

GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES, $5. Sent C.O.D., express superb Watches, $10 each, C.O.D., warranted five years.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN,
MOTH-PATCHES, SUNBURN,
and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by
PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."
Renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION
SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.
This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for the above disfigurements. It has always established its fame.
For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance. Gentlemen will find it always allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.
PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"
for the toilet, nursery, and bath. Delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PHALON & SON, 517 Broadway, N. Y.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 569 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the No loose-grip reliable Machines. Examine different styles, or send stamp for circular to Depot, 569 Broadly.

WANTED, AGENTS. To sell by sample a combined SQUARE, LEVEL, and BEVEL. Great inducements offered. Address L. DE LOS SANTOS, Pittsburg, Pa. For particulars, address
W. S. BATCHELDER & CO., Pittsburg, Pa.

TO ADVERTISERS.

THE NEWSPAPER PRESS. A weekly paper published at Manchester, N. H., in the leading FARMING AND FAMILY PAPER in the Eastern States. It is a good medium to use of the New England Weekly Tribune. Specimen copies sent free upon receipt of a 10-cent envelope with prepay postage. Terms of advertising: Ten Cents for a line of space each insertion. Twenty Cents for a line, each time. Twenty Dollars per column single insertion.
JOHN B. CLARKE, Editor and Proprietor.

A sample of Prof. ROBB'S CURLIQUE will be sent free to any lady who will send her address and cut this straightest hair on the first application (without injury) in soft, luxuriant, beautiful, flowing curls.
Address, with stamp,
Prof. B. H. ROBB, Parkman, Ohio.

C. O. D.
American (WALTHAM) Watches,
NOW UNIVERSALLY ACKNOWLEDGED THE BEST AND CHEAPEST WATCH
IN THE WORLD,
CHRONOMETER BALANCE, EXTRA JEWELED,
And in fine Plain or Elegantly-Decorated Silver Case,
FOR $25.
To be paid on delivery, accompanied with certificate of American Watch Company, guaranteeing it to be the best and cheapest watch in the world. BUYER TO HAVE PRIVILEGE OF EXAMINATION AT POSSESSION OF EXPRESS COMPANY. (No dealer in metal watches need address.) Address
EUGENE BADGELEY, 157 Fulton St., N.Y.

THE BRUEN MANUFACTURING CO.'S
NEW CLOTH PLATE
for the WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE. By substituting this for the old one, three distinct and different stitches can be made, viz., the Lock, Double-Loop Elastic, and Grover & Baker's. And the newly-patented Three-Thread Embroidery Stitch. Price of Plate, $1 50.

The Bruen Manufacturing Co.,
871 Broadway, New York.

SEWING MACHINES, ONE $3 SALE. Send 25c. for two Checks. Circulars free. BANKS, LORD, & CO., 721 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

HOWARD'S HARMONIUM, MASONIC, also for MELODEON, CABINET ORGAN, GUITAR, ACCORDEON, CONCERTINA, GERMAN ACCORDEON, FLUTINA, FLUTE, CLARIONET, FLAGEOLET, FIFE. Each Book contains easy and progressive instructions, rules and exercises, and from one to four hundred pieces of popular music, fingered expressly for similar instruments. Price 50 cents each, sent postpaid.
ELIAS HOWE, 163 Court St., Boston.

AGENTS WANTED—FOR THE best and most reliable LIFE OF ANDREW JOHNSON, Ever Published. Now ready. In one handsome Vol. 12mo. Also, the best and cheapest THE NATIONAL HAND-BOOK of Facts and Figures from the formation of the Government to the present time. Price $1 00. Sent Post paid.
E. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 644 Broadway, N.Y.

M'Clintock & Strong's Cyclopædia.
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have in Preparation:
THE SECOND VOLUME OF A NEW
CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. By Rev. JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D., and JAMES STRONG, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. To be completed in about SIX Volumes, Royal 8vo, of about One Thousand Pages each. Vol. I., comprising the Letters A and B, is now ready. The remaining Volumes are in rapid progress, and will appear at short intervals. Price per Volume, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00; Half Morocco, $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

CHEAP EDITION
OF
QUEEN VICTORIA'S BOOKS.
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
Have just Published:
THE EARLY YEARS OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CONSORT. Compiled, under the direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREVILLE. Two Portraits. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal, giving an account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, Tours in England and Ireland, and Yearly Excursions. Engravings. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS.
12mo, Paper, 25 CENTS EACH. Cloth, 75 CENTS EACH.
CHEAP EDITION.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$5 to $10
ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.
Selpho's Patent Limbs are the best. Cheapest, lightest, and durable—have stood the longest test of any, and contain latest improvements. Pamphlets free. Address SELPHO & SON, 816 Broadway, New York.

ROCKLAND FEMALE INSTITUTE, Nyack, on the Hudson. Beautiful location of this Seminary for Education of Young Ladies commences April 16. Address Rev. L. DE LOS SANTOS, Principal.

THE NEW $1 WATCH.—The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, handsome case, glass crystal, warranted, also steel and metal watches, good order; will denote correct time. Warranted for Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Sent $1; $ for $2; or by Express, C.O.D., on receipt of order. AGENTS WANTED. HEBER & CO., Boston.

EMPLOYMENT. $15 00 to $30 00 a day guaranteed. Male or Female Agents wanted in every town—description Free. Address JAMES C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

THE LITTLE JOKER.—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents.
W. HEPBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."
Harper's Magazine.
In the Number for January was commenced "The Wessex Tales. A New Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.
Harper's Bazar.
In it is now being published "The Curd and Cresse," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

THE BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will always become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

☞ HARPER'S PERIODICALS will be delivered to City Subscribers without extra charge.

The Volume of the MAGAZINE, or any Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $1 00 each, by express, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for a year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage which the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, quarterly, or half-yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be remitted in advance with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to order the discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be very carefully written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new address must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's MAGAZINE.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $155; Quarter Page, $78—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

PERIODICAL DEALERS supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S BAZAR at Seven Dollars per hundred each.

Superior Imitation Gold Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color so long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These cases are made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled throughout with the finest Swiss movements, and in respect to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by medium priced watches ever offered to the public. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an elegant watch, equal in appearance and time-keeping to a gold one, for which one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the goods can be sold and delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches. In one instance stating that they are made by the "Oroide Watch Company." We have but one company we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the New York Independent.

Our readers have probably observed in our advertising columns that of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to keep good time-keeping qualities, and in a case which is ornamental and durable, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in all classes of society who can not afford to pay a price of $40 or $50 for a first-class silver watch, nor $100 to $150 for a gold one, yet would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time. The Oroide Watch appears to suit this class exactly.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: WEST BANGOR, December 3, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I have received the watch you sent per the Adams Express, and like it very well. It keeps good time, and is of a handsome appearance. I have disposed of it to a friend of mine, and now wish you to send me one of the same kind. I may be able to get you a number of orders, as I am in a position to do so. Send it to Havre de Grace, Md., as that is the nearest point for me to get it. Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, yours, &c., REDFORD.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: YORK, PA., December 10, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—I received the Watch to-day, and I am very much pleased with it. Please send me three more like you advertise. There are five persons who will send for the same watch in a few days. Yours respectfully, EDWARD ZINKAND.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: OFFICE MERCHANTS' UNION EXPRESS, Sutquin, Dec. 4, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I have send me a half dozen Oroide Watches—small, medium, and large sizes. The watch you sent on the 16th of November is all sound, and keeps good time. I have had several times to send watches. Please send me samples of your chains. I am going to keep two or three men travelling all the time. Very truly yours, SAMUEL GROVES.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: GREENWOOD, Nov. 28, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—Myself and three others wish you to send four of your Imitation Gold Watches, $15 each, gentlemen's size, and receive payment on delivery. Address Greenwood Furns, Marquette County, Lake Superior, Michigan, by express to Negaun; for Michael Cooney, Michael Cooney, Jr., Patrick Hayes, Richmond.—all OROIDE WATCHES. Your watches stand in great esteem here. Yours, &c., MICHAEL LUCEY.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: HALLEN, HARBER, KANSAS, Nov. 27, 1867.

SIRS.—I wish you to send me a watch. I made quite a spec. on the last watch. I want this watch well finished, for they will sell well. Several of my friends have received watches from you, and they like them very well. Send by the U. S. Express. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, HENRY A. LAUGHLIN, Cor.

P.S.—Forward to Ellsworth City, Ks. SAMUEL GROVES, December 12, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: GENTS.—I did not reach this place as soon as I expected when I wrote to you from Idaho, but was pleased when I arrived yesterday to find that my order was filled, and the watches all delivered. I like the watches well, especially the large one. My brother will start for New York soon, and will call and see you. Thanking you for your promptness, I remain, yours, &c., MICHAEL CONEY, Jr.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: LA GRANGE, ORO, January 14, 1868.

SIRS,—I am glad to say that the watch for my friend gave entire satisfaction. I send you an order in the article, you may expect further orders; and, as we put confidence in you, we will forward the money by mail, having it registered, for the new $1 paying expenses back on the money. If you will deal promptly with us, we remain your most obedient servants, JAMES A. RUSSELL, HARRISON CORNELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: WEST NEWTON, January 15, 1868.

GENTS,—Please send me, C. O. D., two of your Oroide Watches, gent's size, and if they prove to be as good as plain a case as you have, the other one carved. Also two of your two-dollar chains. Send to Lima, Ally Co., Ohio, by M. R. Express. Respectfully yours, D. A. WASSON.

P.S.—The Ladies' Watch you sent me was all that I could ask for the money. It keeps good time, and is a splendid article for the price. MICHAEL CONEY, Jr.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: PORT HURON, N. Y., January 15, 1868.

Please send by express two watches, gents' size; and if they prove to be as good as the one you sent me, I think I will want more. D. A. WASSON.

New Spring Goods

FOR GENTLEMEN.

ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!

Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in all MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us with certainty and dispatch, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Price-List sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & BURR, Clothiers, Warehouse, 124 Fulton St., and 90 Nassau St., N. Y.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, of Aluminium Silver. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It does not easily occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to furnish them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $10 to $20.

Further notice will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of Jewelry, also Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with privilege to examine.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
Box 44 Station D, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.

DAVID WATSON, Agt., Adams Press Co.,
25 Courtlandt Street, New York.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made: 3 New Patents received.
MARTINGALE RINGS, $18 and $20 single gross.
SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross.
BILLIARD BALLS, $9 and $10 per set.
CHECKS, $8, $10, and $12 per 100.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $3 to $150 per gross pair.
WM. M. WELLING, 371 Broadway, New York.

Superior Imitation Gold Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color so long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These cases are made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled throughout with the finest Swiss movements, and in respect to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by medium priced watches ever offered to the public. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an elegant watch, equal in appearance and time-keeping to a gold one, for which one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the goods can be sold and delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches. In one instance stating that they are made by the "Oroide Watch Company." We have but one company we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

Live in My Heart

AND PAY NO RENT. New Song . . . . . 35c.
THE EVE THAT BRIGHTENS WHEN I COME. " . . . . . 30c.
PULLING HARD AGAINST THE STREAM. " . . . . . 30c.
DREAM OF THE BLUE WATERS—GOTTSCHE. " . . . . . 40c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Music mailed.

FREDERICK BLUME, 1120 Broadway, Union Square, New York.
Branch, 205 Bowery. 2d door above 25th St.

SOMETHING NEW.

THE BALLARD BREECH-LOADING SHOT-GUN.
This gun, so much called for, is now ready for delivery. Price, $30.00. Sole, accurately packed, on receipt of price. Also the well-known BALLARD RIFLES, the Southerner Pistols, Eagle Revolvers. American Metallic Ammunition, all sizes. Superior quality. Send for circular. Address MERWIN, TAYLOR, & SIMPKINS, Sole Agents, 262 Broadway, New York. After May 1st, 103 Reade.

P. S.—A full assortment of all goods in our line.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

The Great New England Remedy.
DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, having been proved by the test of several years use in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known as to require no recommendation. It is a remarkable remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Brick Dust Deposits in the Kidneys and Bladder, Gravel, and other complaints.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces. Prepared at the NEW ENGLAND BOTANICAL DEPOT, Boston, Mass. JOHN W. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio; O. BURNHAM AND VAN SCHAICK, Ill.—General Agents for the West.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

TO THE BUSINESS PUBLIC.—Additional Capital for Responsible Manufacturing Companies, Merchants, and Manufacturers. Stock negotiated. American and European Financial and Commercial Agency, 19 Wall Street, N.Y.

EPITAPPANY & CO., Fireworks Agents and Brokers, 19 Wall Street, N.Y.

References.—"E. Tiffany & Co. are an honorable and reliable firm." GEO. T. STEVENS, Jeweler, Cincinnati. JAMES BROTO, O. H. DE FOREST, D. M. HICKSTEIN, H. W. STOUTS, R. C. ALLEN, J. D. TUTTLE, Pres. First National Bank, Hartford, Conn.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,
19,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for flavor and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., best $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., best $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90, $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 50c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1, $1 10, best $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at 30c. per pound. We warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 10 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our unequaled facilities for purchasing, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in New York.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he or she wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. When the names, kinds, and amounts plainly and legibly written, and when the club is complete, we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in the distribution of packages, and each party will receive what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The club may be formed for goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $20, we will, if desired, credit the club for a reasonable time.

Everyone will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as possible. We will send a complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

PURE WATER.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER, manufactured by ALEXANDER MCKENZIE, No. 86 Fourth Street, is the kind of Porous Filter to which I alluded in my recent Report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and requires to be reversed occasionally, to insure its action.

JAMES B. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

Materials for filters in the country, and workmen who can apply water usefully with economy. Particular attention paid to the repairing of filters. Offering the absence of families in the country, ALEX. MCKENZIE & CO., Plumbers and Gasfitters, 86 Fourth St., N.Y.

1841. S. DAVIS, JR'S
Celebrated DIAMOND HAMS,
Cincinnati. Sold by leading Grocers in chief cities. HEAD & ROUNDEY, Cor. Beaver and New Sts., N.Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published:

I.

BELLOWS'S OLD WORLD. The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

II.

LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. With a Collection of Meteorological Tables. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and Author of a "Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $2 00.

III.

KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Prophetic History and the Book of Psalms. By FREDERICK WILLIAM KRUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite," &c. Translated under the express Sanction of the Author by the Rev. M. G. EASTON, M.A. With a Letter from Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A., D.D. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers in Europe. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By PETER PENDOZE FETRIDGE, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe and Palestine." With couches and explicit Rules for Pronunciation. In the Italian, French, and German Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

VI.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. 1584-1618. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Complete in Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $10 00.

VII.

BARNES'S THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS. History of the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States. By WILLIAM BARNES, A.M., Author of "The Holy Politic," &c. With Eighteen Steel Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

VIII.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Death of Victoria. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engraving on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

IX.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. With Recollections of Early and Later Days from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Days, Residences, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

Uniform with Queen Victoria's Memoir of the Prince Consort.

X.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

XI.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

A LOST NAME. By J. S. LE FANU, Author of "All in the Dark," "Uncle Silas," "Guy Deverell," "Uncle Silas," "Tenants of Malory," &c. Svo, Paper, 50 cents.

BRAKESPEARE; or, The Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

POOR HUMANITY. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Mattie: a Story," "Carry's Confession," "No Man's Friend," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Lady Audley's Secret," "Henry Dunbar," &c., &c. The Sequel to "Birds of Prey." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SOONER OR LATER. By SHIRLEY BROOKS, Author of "The Gordian Knot," &c. Illustrated by DU MAURIER. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

MY HUSBAND'S CRIME. With Illustrations by HARRY FURNISS. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ONE OF THE FAMILY. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

BROWNLOWS. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RESPONSES AND REFLECTIONS.

LADY. Responding, "From pride, vain glory, and hypocrisy, Good Lord deliver us."—Reflecting, (What odd bonnets Mrs. MARYGOLD will wear.)

GENT. Responding, "From all deceits of the world, the flesh, and the devil, Good Lord deliver us."—Reflecting, (I wonder how GRANT's nomination will affect Gold.)

TRY THE PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue. Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat box. Price 10 and 20 cts. Sold by all Grocers and by Plymouth Color Co. (C. T. Raynolds & Co.,) 106 & 108 Fulton St., New York.

ASK FOR A

WALTHAM WATCH.

It is the Best. It is the Cheapest.
T. B. BYNNER, No. 199 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED.

Presidential Campaign Chart

Now ready, giving large, clear, and striking likenesses of the Republican Candidates for President and Vice-President. Party Platform in full. The whole is surmounted by the American Eagle and Flag, and beautifully colored. This affords the best chance for Agents to make money for the year 1868. Send for Catalogue giving full particulars of my Maps and Charts.
Address GAYLORD WILSON,
No. 16 Beekman St., New York.

STANDARD PUFFINGS

LAWN, SWISS, LINEN, and CAMBRIC

IN FOUR (QUADRUPLE),
FIVE (QUINTUPLE), and
EIGHT (OCTUPLE) ROWS,

TRADE-MARK.

For making and trimming
Ladies' and Children's Wear.
WARRANTED TO WASH
and retain its original
BEAUTY AND FULLNESS,
PATENT.
For Sale by the Fancy and Dry Goods Houses throughout the country.

(LOCKE'S PATENTS.)

SELF-LIGHTING GAS BURNER

TURN THE KEY, AND THE GAS IS LIGHTED.
Applied to any Gas Fixtures without alteration.

NO ELECTRICITY. NO FRICTION. NO MATCHES.

Price $1 each. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1. Liberal discount to the trade.
New York and Brooklyn Agency,
P. S. SANDERSON,
No. 661 Broadway, opp. Bond St., N. Y. City.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

Sir Robert Edgar's Celebrated English Life Bitters, cures Dyspepsia and preserves the general health.

Extract from fashion article, Harper's Bazar, May 9: "The fire does the work of the laundress without necessitating any unusual labor," etc.

THE AUTOMATIC
CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER

Does the work in 20 minutes, without labor. Fits any stove or range. Warranted to do the work. No. 8, Medium Size, $16 00. Sent, C.O.D. Send stamp for Circular.

State and County Rights for sale, except Conn., N. J., Pa., Del., Md., New York City and Vicinity. Agents wanted for this territory. Address
GENERAL AGENT AUTOMATIC CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER Co., No. 19 Courtlandt Street, New York.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, and Dissolving View Apparatus, with the improved Calcium Light, and several thousand artistically-colored Photographic Views on Glass, illustrating Art, Science, History, Travels, &c., &c. Priced and illustrated Catalogue free on application. T. H. McALISTER, Optician, No. 49 Nassau Street, New York.

GRANT MEDALS and PINS.

AGENTS WANTED to sell our celebrated GRANT Medals and Pins. Send 25 Cents for sample of our new Pin, the handsomest in the market. Samples of 6 different styles sent for $1 00. Sample of new SONG BOOK for 25 Cents. Send for Circular to RICE & CO., 132 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

THE POPULAR LIBRARY EDITION OF DICKENS'S WORKS.

A splendid work for Canvassers. Agents wanted in every town in the country. A great chance for active men and women to make money. Address
D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers, New York.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

News comes from Prussia that most astounding cures of diseases of the kidneys have lately occurred at the Seltzer Spring. Bear in mind that TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT contains in due proportion every ingredient of that famous mineral water, and is warranted by the highest scientific authority to produce the same effects. Sold by all Druggists.

ORANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed ware by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

WOODWARD'S
Country Homes.
150 Designs, $1 50, post-paid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect,
191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

Agents Wanted.

FOUNTAIN PEN. Non-corrosive. Durable. Warranted. Writes three pages with one dipping. Sells quick. $10 a day. Sample by mail, 75 Cents. 12 Pens for 25 cents. 12 Boxes for $2. Address MORSE FOUNTAIN PEN CO., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Boxes

Playing from 1 to 24 tunes, costing from $3 50 to $2000 00. Every variety of the newest accompaniments. Also, Voix Celestes (Celestial Voices), Organochordes, Mandolines, Expressives, Piccolos, Bells, Drums, Cymbals, &c., &c. Musical Boxes are very durable. They are fine ornaments for the Parlor, as well as pleasing companions for the Invalid. Having given our special attention to that trade for over 15 years, we are able to supply every want quicker and better than any house in this country.
M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers, No. 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired.

Steel Collars, enameled white, mailed on receipt of $1. Bilton & Foggan, Mfrs., 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

NORTHWESTERN
MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

CENTRAL OFFICE, 416 MAIN STREET, MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN.

Cash Assets	$3,500,000
Membership	22,000
Policies issued, 1867	10,000
Risks covered by new Policies in 1867	20,250,000

THIS VIGOROUS COMPANY now ranks among the twenty-five New York Companies third in number of Numbers, fifth in amount of Assets.

IT IS A PURELY MUTUAL COMPANY;

That is, an Association of Policy-holders managed by men selected by themselves, from themselves, for themselves. Thus all officers and members are alike interested. Each member is a full partner in the whole business, with liability limited to the amount actually invested.

It thus adopts its place to the benefit of its members, adopts all real improvements, and aims to be

A MODEL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

It was one of the first to adopt the popular feature known in Insurance circles as the NON-FORFEITING PLAN, and now applies it to all the Policies it issues.

IT IS THE ONLY COMPANY that adopts the full benefit of the Note system without doing a credit business or destroying the cash principal, and also gives the Note privilege to the poor man, who needs it most, and takes a small Policy.

IT IS THE ONLY COMPANY which gives proportionate amount of full-paid Insurance after two annual premiums (if other premiums are not paid), on ordinary Life and Endowment Policies.

IT WILL LOAN A MEMBER a sum equivalent to the surrender value of his Policy, and thus often helps a member in extremity to keep his Policy in force. Policy-holders permitted to travel any where in the United States and Europe, but risks in the far South not sought.

WHY SHOULD MEN INSURE IN A WESTERN COMPANY?

WITH MORE REASON IT MIGHT BE ASKED: WHY SHOULD THEY INSURE ELSEWHERE?

Not for greater security, certainly; for it will not be denied that money can be as safely invested at the West, where property is rapidly enhancing in value, as elsewhere. Nor will it be claimed that as honest, capable, and efficient managers can not be found here.

Not for greater cheapness; for the premiums are the same, or lower than the average of companies at the East, while the more rapid accumulations at the West on equally safe investments, together with the acknowledged low rate of mortality, promise as large or larger dividends.

But there are positive and weighty reasons, prompting to the patronage of THIS Company.

1. The rapid accumulation at the West. The money is kept at the West, where it is in greater demand, and where it will secure better interest and more constant investment, with equally good security, for people can afford to pay more for it than in the older States.

The advantages of such investment to the Company (which means all the insured), appear in the following startling figures:

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS LOANED FOR FIFTY YEARS,

At 6 per cent. compound interest, produces	$18,420.15
At 8 per cent. compound interest, produces	46,901.61
At 10 per cent., compound interest, produces	$117,390.85

2. Its risks are chiefly in the healthiest portion of the country, and its rate of mortality consequently low.

3. It is the oldest and largest Life Insurance Company west of the sea-board, and its managers are among the best men in the Northwest (than whom there are no better any where), whose well-known character and ability are the best guarantee of good management.

4. All its profits are equitably divided among its policy-holders.

5. It combines the advantages of both the cash and note system.

6. It makes the payment of premiums easy and equitable by loaning, to the small insurer as well as the larger, just so much of the premium as is secured by the "value of the policy" itself, and no more, thus really confining its business to the cash plan.

7. A Member who has paid his premium in cash for a number of years, may, if circumstances require it, pay subsequent premiums wholly in notes until the amount of the notes equals the "value of the policy," or may at any time borrow of the Company the "surrender value of his policy," and thus frequently save his policy from lapsing, or help himself over some temporary difficulty.

8. The premiums on ten-year policies are lower than those of any other Company having the same plan.

9. The first payment secures its proportionate share of a ten-year policy.

10. Its dividends, made annually, commencing three years from the date of the policy, are not arbitrarily fixed, but are mathematically calculated with great care, so as to give to each member the equitable portion of the surplus.

11. The reversionary insurance purchased by the dividends, and once issued, is not forfeited by non-payment of premiums on the policy.

12. This Company, it is believed, pays a larger surrender value for its policies than any other.

13. All its policies are non-forfeiting.

14. It permits its members to travel to or reside in any part of the Western Hemisphere north of the Tropics, or any part of Europe; to travel to or from California by land or water; but does not seek business in the far or unhealthy South.

15. In short, the Company aims, not to take advantage of its members or of their misfortunes, but to conduct its business upon the basis of the strictest equity and an enlarged liberality.

GENERAL AGENTS:

H. G. WILSON & CO., Gen'l Agents, Mass., Maine, New Hamp., and Vt., 114 Washington St., Boston.
MUNSELL & SMITH, Gen'l Agents, Eastern Pennsylvania, 428 Walnut St., Philadelphia.
GEORGE DART, Gen'l Agent, Western Pennsylvania, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
BATES BROS., State Agents, Eastern Ohio and Western Virginia, Wooster, Ohio.
JOHN LORIE, State Agent, Western Ohio, Toledo.
MARTIN & HOPKINS, State Agents, Indiana and Kentucky, Journal Building, Indianapolis, Indiana.
SHUGART & DEAN, State Agents for Illinois, 83 Washington St., Chicago.
MARTIN & PERKINS, State Agents, Iowa and Nebraska, 49 Brady St., Davenport, Iowa.
CHAS. AUBINGER, State Agent, Michigan, 111 Jefferson Avenue, Detroit.
SNOW & SEELY, State Agents, Missouri, 216 Chestnut St., St. Louis.
F. E. SHANDREW, State Agent, Minnesota, Winona.
FISHER & ADAMS, State Agents, Kansas, cor. 5th and Delaware Sts., Leavenworth.
J. S. CHAPIN, State Agent, Tennessee, 34 Union St., Memphis.
J. A. MELCHER, State Agent, Northern Alabama, Selma.
DAVIS & SEELYE, Gen'l Agents, Northern Georgia and South Carolina, Atlanta, Georgia.
ELMORE & ROWE, Gen'l Agents, Pacific Coast, 315 Montgomery St., San Francisco.

For a Policy or an Agency, address

A. W. KELLOGG Secretary. S. S. DAGGETT, President.
HEBER SMITH, General Superintendent.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 598.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

PARADE OF THE BROOKLYN SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHILDREN, MAY 26, 1868.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE BROOKLYN SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

THE Sunday-school teachers and children of Brooklyn are accustomed each spring to celebrate the anniversary of their Union by a parade; and it is this custom and procession which we illustrate on the preceding page. The Union which is thus celebrated took place in 1829, and was formed in the hope of thereby increasing the power of the schools for good. The Union at this time embraces 112 schools, and about 25,000 children, nearly all of whom were in the procession on May 26, the thirty-ninth anniversary of the Union.

The children early assembled at their respective schools, and after a few hymns and short speeches were marshaled for the parade. Our illustration represents the scene on Montague Terrace. A thousand banners were borne about in the various lines, many of them bearing mottoes quoted from passages in the New Testament, and bearing the titles of the schools and classes in which they were carried. Every school bore a beautiful silk national flag. From the City Hall floated the national and city flags, and from the County Court-House waved its fine new flag, greeting the children passing that way as they hurried to their places of meeting. Just before breaking up the children were provided with cakes, lemonade, ice-cream, and confectionery, which they appeared in every case to enjoy most thoroughly.

THEODORE WINTHROP.

KILLED AT GREAT BETHEL JUNE 10, 1861.

How often in the strange old days,
Before the war's sharp summons blew,
We strolled through all these woodland ways,
While loud the blackbird sang and flew!

How gayly of a thousand things
We talked; and rustling through the leaves,
We sang the songs of other springs,
And dreamed the dreams of summer eves!

To this bold height our footsteps came,
Our eyes beheld that distant sea;
To-day I sit and call his name,
And know he will not answer me.

O friend, beyond this voice of mine,
Beyond these eyes, that, baffled hand,
Immortal in a world divine,
I see thy gracious figure stand.

We do not count each other lost,
Divided though our ways may be;
Two ships in port, though oceans tost,
Still sailing the familiar sea.

No cloud of death can long obscure
Nor touch with any doubt or fear,
The love that, like the old faith pure,
Contented whether there or here.

G. W. C.

STATEN ISLAND, June, 1868.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1868.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND THE PRESIDENCY.

IN politics as in matrimony nothing should be surprising. The constant reports from Washington of the efforts to make the Chief Justice a Democratic candidate for the Presidency—the announcement from Albany that Mr. SEYMOUR gives the proposition "respectful consideration"—the public approbation of Captain RYDERS, who "does not like him when he was a Democrat," and who knows that "he is now a State-rights Democrat, and is sound on the currency question"—the advocacy of D. W. VOORHEES—the reported sudden popularity of Mr. CHASE among Virginia Conservatives—Mr. CHASE'S conspicuous and consuming passion for the Presidency, and the utter bewilderment of the Democratic party in presence of the nomination of GRANT and COLFAX, and of the singularly quiescent action of the Chicago Convention, combine to give importance to a suggestion that would otherwise seem absurd.

Mr. CHASE'S public career is identified with the Anti-slavery movement. He was one of the Republican chiefs who utterly baffled the Democratic policy, and overthrew the Democratic party. He originated the financial system of the war, which the Democratic party opposed. He was one of the earliest and frankest supporters of equal suffrage in the Southern States. He was President of the American Freedmen's Commission. He does not favor any principle or policy which the Democratic party has recently professed; and yet some of the managers of this party whose double cry is repudiation and "Down with the nigger: this is a white man's government!" are trying to compass Mr. CHASE'S nomination, which HORATIO SEYMOUR will respectfully consider, and Captain RYDERS cautiously approves. Could there be any more imposing proof of the utter demoralization of that party, and of its consciousness of the hopelessness of nominating any Democrat against General GRANT?

But the arrangement could not be completed without an understanding. What must that understanding be? Mr. CHASE is, like Mr. SUMNER, politically identified with the negro. Would or could the Democratic party pretend to be the friend of justice to the colored race? It is impossible. Could Mr. CHASE deliberately renounce his fidelity to it? It is equally impossible. What, then, could be done? What is always done when two differing parties are anxious to agree on a common policy? There is a compromise. Suppose the proposition made that the negro is really out of politics; that he is emancipated, has his civil and political rights, is a citizen of reconstructed States, and need not, therefore, be mentioned. Suppose that, upon the presumption of a restored Union, the whole reconstruction problem is considered settled, and a platform of State rights, with planks resounding with retrenchment, reform, a specie currency, and universal amnesty be adopted, and Mr. CHASE ignore the fact that the party would say nothing against his colored friends; the Democracy would say nothing against reconstruction. The past would be left to rest in peace, and the future alone would be consulted. Is such a compromise probable?

No! There is nothing in the history of the Democratic party, nor in the character of its adherents, which favors the possibility of such an understanding. Its conventions every where insist upon the white man's government; the party organs declare that Congressional reconstruction shall not stand if the Democracy can carry the country; and the prejudice and ignorance of the party, which is essential to the existence of the Union, can be aroused without the appeal to the most contemptible of passions. Moreover, the Democratic party has not shown the least tendency or desire to be taught by events. It fights as furiously for the corpse of slavery as it did for slavery living and powerful. It went to Chicago toward the end of the war, after three years' experience of the resolution and spirit of the people, and sneered at their efforts, and advised surrender to the rebellion. It sees the moral logic of history, the restoration of the Union upon the American principle of equal rights, and merely snarls that if it could only get into power it would undo the work and give politics entirely over again to the rebel class. This is not a party that will be wiser in 1868 than it was in 1864. It is as likely to declare for reconstruction now as it did for surrender then. It will not nominate a "Conservative," but a Democrat, counting upon Conservative support, as of course. And whether Mr. SEYMOUR will be a Conservative, a secessionist, and a repudiator, like PENDLETON, or a soldier like HANCOCK, is a question for the factions of the party to settle.

Whatever is the organization of the party, therefore—whatever the respectful consideration of it gentleman whose refusal to be himself a candidate is treated by his party friends as purely Pickwickian—whatever the wishes of the Chief Justice, the reports of which we speak, the efforts, and the astute editorials, the nomination of Mr. CHASE is not probable. If it could be made it would not divert Republican votes from General GRANT, and it would not unite Democrats more than Democrats. For the Chief Justice himself it would be no honor. Indeed, is the use of his name in all kinds of wretched political intrigues altogether an honor? It is no stain upon that name, but after service so illustrious and fidelity so conspicuous, it should be hawked about—with his consent if not with his wish—among Tammany ring-masters and Fewter Mug humorists.

GRANT AND THE POPULAR WILL.

GENERAL GRANT said in his brief and modest speech accepting the nomination for the Presidency, that if he were elected he should have no policy of his own, but should execute the will of the people. This is a simple recognition of the fact that under our system the people govern. It is in general an admitted truth, but the course of the Executive has often made its pointed re-statement necessary. The President, although he is constitutionally only the chief executive, has practically at every way to dictate the laws and to impose upon the country, despite its chosen representatives, his will as the national policy. And in this extraordinary, revolutionary, and disastrous course he has had the applause and support of the Democratic party.

General GRANT, therefore, very properly recurs to the principles of the government. He believes that the people make laws through Congress, and execute them through the President. He does not believe that he has the moral authorities to thwart and perplex each other. And although the Constitution conservatively provides that the one may, under certain circumstances, veto the will of the other, it is only for the purpose that, upon reconsideration, and by a two-thirds vote, the will of the other may be fairly proved, upon a disputed point, to be undoubtedly the will of the people. That being ascertained, the power of the Executive veto is exhausted, and his duty is to execute the law or to resign.

Had President JOHNSON recognized this fundamental principle of the Constitution of which he so constantly speaks, and followed it in spirit as well as in letter, the contest with Congress which he has so obstinately waged to the immense injury of the public welfare would have been avoided. A President elected for four years who assumes to be the exponent of the popular will against representatives elected every two years commits an act of preposterous folly. Even if his function were legislative this would be so—when it is executive merely it is only the more evident. The question of President JOHNSON'S administration has been reconstruction. It was in its very nature a legislative question. But he endeavored to take it bodily into his own discretion, and actually denied in words the authority of Congress to deal with it at all. Had he decided it in acts it would have been summarily removed by the authority he affected to despise.

It is indispensable, therefore, that people should know whether their will expressed through representatives is chosen for that purpose is to prevail, or whether the will of an officer chosen by them for another purpose is to be the government. If it be the former, then there will be unity, harmony, peace, and rapidly increasing national prosperity. If it be the latter, the fierce and agitating contest of the JOHNSON administration will be renewed. In one apt sentence General GRANT expresses his view of the subject, which is that of the American principle of popular government and of the Constitution. With them he declares for harmony, peace, and prosperity, and against the disorganizing doctrine which President JOHNSON has practically asserted, the Democratic party has approved. The few words which the General has spoken command him only more closely, if that were possible, to the respect and confidence of intelligent and loyal men.

EDWIN M. STANTON.

SENATOR EDMUNDS, of Vermont, upon the day after Mr. STANTON'S withdrawal, presented the following resolution:

"Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives, that the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered to EDWIN M. STANTON, for the great ability, purity, and fidelity to the country with which he has discharged the duties of Secretary of War, as well amidst the open danger of a great rebellion as in the later period, when assailed by the opposition he spired by hostility to the pacification measures adopted by Congress for the restoration of a real and permanent peace."

This is an expression of gratitude in which the loyal heart of the country will most warmly unite. Mr. STANTON will be a historical name by great, and will be always most honorably remembered. From the moment that he assumed the direction as the War Department there was a clear discernment, an inflexible will, a fertility of resource, an organizing and administrative force whose essential value to the triumphant procedure of the war can not be overestimated. Faithful, laboring, unflinching to the very verge of dangerous illness, the centre of a system of affairs as extended and complicated as any known to history, ever to manage, Mr. STANTON never sought notoriety, and was known chiefly by the great events whose progress ended in universal and unconditional triumph.

The time demanded peremptory action, his position exposed him to the suspicion and hostility of every form of the most sensitive jealousy; the shadow of every failure fell black upon his Department; but with an unquailing tenacity and dauntless energy, resolved that every man in the country if need be, and if it depended upon him should be, called into service, Mr. STANTON never doubted, and inspired in others the profoundest confidence. When President LINCOLN was murdered it was the Secretary of War who, for a time, seemed to be the Government, nor was there any body in the country who did not feel that Mr. STANTON was the man whom all would have selected for that exact emergency.

It is since the war that Mr. STANTON'S conduct has been most severely criticised. It is complained that he remained in the War Department against the wishes of the President. So he did; but not against the wishes of the country. It was ordered that his position was disgraceful, indecent, indelicate toward the President. But the question was not of delicacy, but of fidelity and of duty to the country. When Mr. STANTON discovered that the President was a man who was betraying the principles that had elected him, and that he was endeavoring under the name of a policy of reconstruction to baffle the results of the war, his course was taken, and taken as it should be taken. He resolved to remain so long as he could lawfully do so. He may have had doubts of the constitutionality of the Tenure-of-Office Act; but when it became a law he acknowledged its force, and his post having become a most important point in the defense of the liberties of the citizen against the efforts of the President, he could not leave it until compelled to do so.

When, however, the Senate decided that the appointment of General THOMAS as ad interim Secretary was not a high crime and misdemeanor, it certainly seemed to determine that it was not a violation of law, or at least that no violation had been proved. In view of the express declaration of Senator SHERMAN and other Senators during the debate upon the passage of the Tenure Act, that the Secretary of War was not included in its terms, it is not surprising that upon the Impeachment verdict Mr. STANTON felt that the vote confirmed that view, and that he ought to relinquish his office. He chose not to resign, and not to recognize the appointment of General THOMAS, and placing all the papers of the Department in the hands of the Adjutant-General, subject to the order of the President, he retired.

Yet in his retirement, whatever its precise form, he is followed by the grateful regard of the country—a regard which tradition will perpetuate, and which recent events have not diminished. The duty that he discharged in resisting rebellion in the Cabinet of JAMES BUCHANAN he has continued to discharge in resisting treachery under every form in the Cabinet of ANDREW JOHNSON. He has few of the arts that conjure ordinary popularity; but Mr. STANTON'S name will be forever associated with those of LINCOLN and GRANT as the most critical and sublime period in our history.

A PARTY VIEW.

THE papers report that Senators WADE, CHANDLER, CATTELL, and some others left a caucus of their party brethren because six of the Republican Senators who voted for the acquittal of the President were present.

Surely these Senators and the sensible men of the party ought to ask themselves whether this policy is wise. Suppose that its logic had prevailed at Chicago. Suppose that Mr. WADE had been nominated for President and General BUTLER for Vice-President. Is there any understanding that Mr. STEVENS was to be Secretary of the Treasury, Senator CHANDLER Secretary of War, and that the other offices were to be filled in the same manner. Suppose, further, that Senators FESSENDEN, TRUMBULL, and GRIMES had been denounced in the platform as "infamous," and solemnly expelled, so far as they could by the party fellowship of the party, would the Republican prospect of success in the Presidential election be more or less promising?

It seems to us after the National Convention of the party has deliberately refused to repudiate the Senators in question, that Mr. WADE and Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. CATTELL have no right, as party men, to refuse them the party fellowship; and should their conduct be widely followed, should the Senators who honestly voted for acquittal upon the evidence, and those who maintain the duty of conscientious public action as paramount to obedience to certain party assumptions be thrust from party fellowship, what can possibly be gained but a reduced vote and an imperiled success?

Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS said, upon the floor of the House, as reported, that he did not think a little perjury would hurt the Senators. Is, then, a little perjury in the discharge of public duty to be also a party test, and party men who are unwilling to perjure themselves a little prepare to depart from Republican fellowship?

This seems to us mere childish folly. Mr. WADE is a stern and stanch Republican, whose position has never been obscure, and whose speech in the very beginning of the rebel tempest in Congress in the winter of 1860-61 was frank and brave assertion of the principles that the war maintained. Such services are not to be forgotten. But the cause demands every friend of service. If Mr. CHASE is unwilling, from whatever reason, longer to act with the great party with which his name is most honorably identified, let us hope that Mr. WADE will not yield to any pique, however natural and pardonable it may seem, which will make his political associates regret his action. The cause of true liberty and civilization in this country is now intrusted to the Republican party and its candidates. Whoever will support them is not to be repelled because of differences upon points not vital, and which the national party authority has refused to adopt as articles of party faith. We gladly record that this truth was recognized by the great ratification meeting at the Cooper Institute in New York by the unanimous vote of all the Senators.

JUDGED BY ITSELF.

We should not again have alluded to the late flagrant offenses of the New York Tribune against public morality if it had not attempted to escape the censure of intelligent men by sneering that some people would have nothing to do if there were no Tribune to abuse, and by swallowing its own words with the assertion that it never uttered them. A charge is not disproved because it may be repeated to a proverb. DICK TURPIN was not less a thief because his name is the synonym of robber. Let the Tribune be judged by itself.

After the first vote was taken, the Tribune said:

"We concede the right and the duty of each Senator to vote (however mistakenly) as he saw fit."

Let us see in what way it had conceded this right. It headed its article upon the opinion of Senator GRIMES, "JUDAS'S THIRTY REASONS." The synopsis of it read:

"WE have had BENEDICT ARNOLD, AARON BURR, JEFFERSON DAVIS, and now we have JAMES W. GRIMES."

"He is governed by nothing but passion and chagrin."

"....Make him an example to renegades for all time to come."

"Grimes is dead."

The gross rhiabolry of the Washington correspondent of the Tribune, in speaking of Senator Grimes, we shall not again reproduce. It was a disgrace to American journalism.

In its series of articles before the vote, and intended to influence it, the Tribune said:

"To pronounce that my President will deliberately vote to acquit Mr. Johnson is to assume that hitherto his course has been a fraud. The cast we hear about the responsibility of an oath is absurd."

"No Republican can vote against it (conviction) without making himself infamous."

"If Johnson is acquitted then the whole course of these men is a lie, and their deception is infamous."

"If they have been honest in this, then impeachment is as wise as the sun."

"Any Republican vote but one of impeachment is therefore a lie."

"The Republican who votes against it seeks a lot with the men who have wanted and plotted for the destruction of the Republic."

"The Republican Senator who rises in his seat to-morrow and votes not guilty virtually says, 'I am the same as Andrew Johnson.'.... His deeds are my deeds; his speeches are my speeches.... The massacres in New Orleans and Memphis....now receive my commendation'.... Republican Senators,....may well pause before, by their votes, they write their names with the infamous and degraded men who in times of national trial have been false to their country."

"If Benedict Arnold were a Senator to-day, elected by Republican votes, and moved by the same ambition, or a morbid, insatiate greed of office, we should never call him a traitor because of the weakness of the President's office, eager to discuss the question of the President's intent, and painfully conscious of the responsibility of his oath. A decisive amount of money would finish him."

This is a specimen of the tone of a series of articles of the Tribune before the vote. Its verdict, or the vote it said that it conceded the right and the duty of each Senator to vote (however mistakenly) to be one of fraud. The statement is not true, and the proof is in the words we have quoted.

When the Senate finally adjourned as a Court of Impeachment the Tribune varied the adjudgment "a tainted verdict." It meant by this that it was a verdict obtained by corrupt means; by influences not addressed to the reason or conscience of the Senators. It said: "All we know is that money was used to secure the acquittal of the President." If this asserted fact, and there is a Committee of the House and one of the Senate now engaged in the investigation, there is no doubt that any Senator whose vote was influenced by improper considerations will be promptly expelled and forever disgraced.

But improper influences are of more than one kind. Men are not moved only by their fears, by threats, by denunciations; they are bribed by their ambition. There is no moral difference between the honesty of one man whose vote is bought for money and that of another who, scorning money, yields to promise and place. It was not with guineas only that Sir Robert Walpole and Lord North corrupted Parliament. Nor is the Tribune's continued iteration of the guilt of "Republican" Senators who voted according to their sense of duty; its unmanned attempt to hold Iowa to make an example of Mr. Grimes as a renegade; its warning that Republican Senators who did not vote to convict must expect to be ranked with rebels and look for promotion outside of the party; its assertion that a Republican vote for acquittal was a lie; that the Republican party speaking by its papers, its orators, and its conventions was a unit for impeachment, were all parts of a palpable and shameful attempt to influence a judicial decision by motives of political interest and ambition, and language intended to reach and affect men whom the Tribune knew that money could not buy, but whom political ambition might seduce or any party censure terrify. Could this effort, which was as much an attempt at corruption as that made with money by the Astor House ring, have succeeded in carrying the vote of Mr. Fessenden or of Mr. Trumbull or of Mr. Grimes against his sincere conviction, the verdict of the Senate would have been as much "tainted" as the Tribune declares it to be now, and would be controlled against its judicial oath by party terrorism would have deserved the doom which any Senator known to be bought would be sure to meet.

This is not, as the Tribune affects to suppose, "a fine frenzy." It is the verdict of the great body of honorable and intelligent citizens upon its reckless denunciations, by which we hope to have no further occasion to allude. But, in the interest of Liberty, which has its surest bulwark in the moral sentiment and in that of the Republican party, which maintains liberty and justice, we shall not fail to expose every such betrayal both of the cause and the party, especially when made by an influential journal.

THE LETTERS OF ACCEPTANCE.

The letter of General Grant, accepting the nomination, is brief, dignified, and simple. He approves the resolutions of the Convention, and promises, if elected, that his endeavor will be to give peace and protection to the country—a promise which, from him, is not a mere unmeaning phrase. He is one of the men whose words are things. The General does not undertake to prescribe a policy. He declares that the President must be free to execute the will of the people. This, as we have elsewhere intimated, is the true doctrine of our Government, and it is the one upon which the Republican party has constantly insisted in the contest with President Johnson. The General does not enter into detail, but states his belief that the resolutions of the Convention express the sentiment of those who sustained the Government during the war, and therefore the nomination is the spirit in which it is offered.

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1868.

To General Joseph R. Hawley, President of the National Republican Convention:

In formally accepting the nomination of the National Union Republican Convention of the 21st of May instant, it seems proper that some statement of views beyond the resolutions of the said nomination should be expressed. The proceedings of the Convention were marked with unanimity, moderation, and patriotism, and, I believe, express the feelings of the great majority of those who have given me their support in its recent trials. I endorse the resolutions. If elected to the office of President of the United States, it will be my endeavor to administer the laws in good faith, with economy, and with the view of giving peace, quiet, and protection everywhere. In times like the present it is impossible, or at least eminently improper, to lay down a policy to be adhered to, right or wrong, through an administration of four years. New political issues, not foreseen, are constantly arising; the views of the public on old ones are constantly changing, and a purely administrative officer should always be left free to act in accord with all of the people. I always have respected that will, and always shall. Peace, and such relations with our late enemies as will secure a permanent restoration of the Union, with economy of administration, will lighten the burden of taxation, while it constantly reduces the national debt. Let us have peace.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

U. S. Grant.

Mr. Colfax writes at greater length, and with more ardor. He enters into a brief survey of the most important legislation of Congress, which he heartily justifies; applauds the impregnable position of equal rights upon which the Republican party is planted; warmly expresses the devotion in favor of the rights of citizens; and briefly and eloquently recapitulates the good works of the party. It is a glowing, characteristic letter, but rather too long for our space.

With two such men how enthusiastically and confidently the great party of liberty and justice and prosperity enters upon its campaign! But we must not forget that enthusiasm will not supply the want of organization, nor confidence of hard work. Let the country be as closely organized as the army, and the result in the victory may be as signal. Our line of battle should be fully formed while the enemy is deciding under which commander it will be defeated.

THE PLATFORM AND REPUDIATION.

Mr. Cary in Congress, and a great many Democratic journals, insist that the declaration of the Chicago Convention in regard to the payment of the debt is vague and intentionally delusive. Mr. Cary, who is a repudiator, offered a resolution covering the position taken by General Butler last summer, which is an attempt by an apparently fair literal reading of the law to pay part of the debt in paper, or, in a word, to repudiate. The whole of the Democratic Congress very promptly declined to entertain the suggestion.

There has been no more decisive and honest mind of the majority of the Chicago Convention than of the intention of the law itself. The honest opinion of the country has always been that the Government meant to pay in gold the dollars the dollars it borrowed. Every body knows that, had the law been explained at the time as meaning payment in paper, the loans could not have been raised. Mr. Cary, Mr. Voorhees, Mr. Nicholson, and all the agents of the Department, explained when the question was raised that the intention was as honorable as could be imagined. But the foreign capitalist took their share of the loan upon the same understanding.

Therefore, when the resolutions of the Convention explicitly declared that the law as well as the language of the law must be respected, there was but one interpretation fairly possible. The doctrine of General Butler was bold enough, but it was not the first ingenious lawyer's plea. It was pettifogging, not statesmanship. The ringing, prolonged, and immense shout in the Convention as the Convention saluted the reading of the resolution showed how true were the heart and the conscience of the party, and the skillful sophistries that had been whispered in the committee of the platform were instantly and forever dispersed. But the party that sees repudiation lying like a lion in its path could not bear to think that its opponent had already disposed of it, and have made a few feeble struggles to show that when the Convention said honesty it meant knavery.

The subject, however, was put even beyond the cavil of party malignity in the eloquent and truly inspiring and honorable speech of General Hawley in announcing the nomination to General Grant. "You will see," said he, "that the Convention believes that integrity, simplicity, and economy in governmental affairs are the duties of good citizens and honorable men. It makes the strict fulfillment of national obligations a point of honor never to be waived. What the civilized world recognizes as full and final payment is the only payment the Union party will ever consent to tender."

There is no mistaking such words. They are indeed the authorized interpretation of the resolution, although such interpretation is not necessary. The resolution so interpreted General Grant approves. The Republican party approves it. Honest men every where approve it. It is in harmony with the honorable instincts of human society. Any other view of it would be a disgrace to the United States and a disaster to civilization.

TRICKS UPON TRAVELERS.

We warn all travelers who buy in New York tickets to Chicago by the sleeping-cars upon the Pennsylvania Central Railroad to look closely and be very sure that they are not deceived. A passenger recently bought a state-room of three berths upon a particular train, and upon presenting himself at the hour, showing his ticket, and asking for her room, was shown into a room with six berths, half of which were occupied. To her remonstrance the guard said that that was her place, and if she wished to be alone with her companions, she might pay eight dollars more, which, finding that there was no alternative, she did. When complaint was made at the office in the Astor House the agent claimed the right to sell half a state-room for a whole one, and remarked that in this particular instance he believed he had forgot to mention that it was only the half, which was the more remarkable, as the buyer distinctly stated that a whole state-room was wished, in which the travelers might be entirely secluded. If some disinterested person should call the proceeding a wretched swindle, we really do not see what satisfactory answer could be made to him. And to avoid the consequences arising from this extremely defective memory, we again advise Western travelers to buy their tickets over the Pennsylvania Central Railroad at the office in the Astor House.

Since this illustration of lapse of memory came to our notice we have received the following from one who travels constantly:

"Sir,—It is so very human to err that it is not surprising that mistakes happen daily where care is taken to prevent them. It is not surprising that in the matter of petty swindles (mistakes?) upon travelers so little is done by those interested to prevent it. Here is a case in point: Recently in a sleeping-car I engaged a berth. The price was $5 from Syracuse to Rochester over the route—but when I came to pay the conductor it had suddenly risen to $1 25. Here is another case: Going from Syracuse to Albany I entered the sleeping-car previously asking the train conductor the extra rate. Fifty cents was the sum. Arriving at Albany the car the porter was extracting some bolted beets from a sort of stew in a kettle. I very earnestly for a moment, and then, with a charming frankness, responded, 'Oh yes! I forgot.' As I remarked, these mistakes will happen, but I do not like to be the victim of them. It would be more satisfactory to travelers, and quite as remunerative to corporations, if printed rates were more conspicuously posted in every sleeping-car or other public conveyance, so that people would know what was right. If they were, I think I should be fifty cents richer than the poor mother; that would be an act of charity which no one would regret performing.

"The instances above given are only two of many which I have met with in my family door to them, and that is a reason why it should be. E. P. W."

SIGNS OF CIVILIZATION.

Mr. A. Gallatin Lawrence, United States Minister to Costa Rica, having violated the act of Congress forbidding dueling within the District of Columbia, has been superseded by the nomination of a successor. The Secretary of State has also advised the Prussian Minister at Rio de Janeiro, Von Gerolt, the Secretary of Legation, and Count Lotzum, an attaché, have been guilty of the same violation of law, and has requested that the fact be communicated to the Prussian Government, that the Baron and the Count may be made sensible of its displeasure.

This is another dying gasp of Middle Age barbarism in Washington. Slaves are no longer sold there, and duels, or mutual murder are punished. Shall we not now have some exquisite James bewailing the decline of the "social life" of Washington, and lamenting the delightful days when "chivalry" was supreme?

POOR WHITES AND BLACKS.

In a late generalization we incorrectly estimated the number of Freedmen who had received national aid, and we are very glad to receive the following correction by a most competent authority:

"Greenville, Alabama, May 25, 1868.

"....The charity of the nation has been bestowed almost entirely through the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau. But, as a matter of fact, gained while serving as an officer of the Bureau for three years, it is wholly a mistake that the freedmen have been a rule of action in the two Sub-Districts of Alabama, which have been under my authority under my command, bracing in all fourteen counties, to issue supplies to none of the able-bodied of those districts, and to the earning a livelihood by reason of actual disability, temporary or permanent. More than three-fifths of the whole amount has been issued to whites, in whose favor the rule has been construed for less rigidity than with the blacks for obvious reasons, principally on account of their manifest inability to endure the toil of plantation labor.

"The blacks who have been a charge upon the Government, so far as my observation has extended, are, as a class, found with those unfortunates who in the Northern States are cared for as paupers by the local authorities. As it was in the Slave States and no public charities under slavery, and upon the plea of improvishment most of the counties declare themselves unable to assume the support of the public poor. It is the truth, however, that they are quite as unwilling as unable; and further, that the tender mercies of ex-masters toward their profitless enslaves would be likely to put the worst annals of British Unions to shame...."

THE COOPER ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

Our friends of the National Academy of Design must look to their laurels. There is rising another Academy of Design at the Cooper Institute; and the industry, interest, and zeal which it has already developed, and the works which it has already produced, promise a dangerous rivalry. It is a school of women only, apparently not widely known, nor exciting much interest beyond the immediate circle of the pupils and their friends, but deserving the most thoughtful attention. Its annual exhibition, with the commencement exercises of the Cooper Union, was held during the last week in May in the great gallery of the Cooper Building, and the prizes and medals for excellence in the fine arts were publicly presented. The exercises and exhibition altogether occupy three days and evenings. There is a reception when it is always crowded, and so is the meeting for the award of prizes. But the fact of the exhibition is practically unknown to the great public, and that the work of the art-school is not appreciated.

The classes in drawing and sculpture are under the charge of Mr. and Dr. Rimmer, both of the best of teachers. He is master of his subject, and his method is thorough and severe. Its results are evident in the works exhibited. The young women come from all parts of the country and remain a regular course. Besides the technical excellence of their work, the freedom of invention is very striking. Indeed, in the sculpture of this year, the talent displayed was remarkable. The figure of a girlish mastery of life-size, a statuette of Cinderella, and a life-size Andromeda watching the combat between Perseus and the monster, were those that in the National Academy would have made the sculptors distinguished popular men. Dr. Rimmer truly said that were the Andromeda to be found without the head in an old ruin, it would be acclaimed as a glorious specimen of antique art.

Another year we hope to call attention to the exhibition betimes.

WANTED—A LEG.

The Surgeon-General has replied to the following letter that it is impossible for him under the law to furnish another leg to the soldier mentioned, who is worthy of the old saying:

"Sir,—I beg to inquire whether in any case a wooden leg would be given by the Government to a seriously discharged soldier a second time, and to state to my mind a case where I think such would be justifiable. Company E, First Regiment, United States Colored Infantry, who took his right leg at Vicksburg in 1863, and subsequently received one of the substitutes that Congress allowed, which he is using from a hay-loft, and sustained such serious injuries in mutilating the work laboring for his family, that now he is recovering, and his wife, who has stood by him in fortune as he was in his country's cause, begs to raise money to equip him again; but it's hard work and slow—and he has not had a holiday a day since—and as I thought as it isn't often a soldier loses two legs, and if any one deserved the one too, by-the-way—Uncle Sam might give him another; and, if he has not enough to dress with by way that was the one which some other soldier might have lost, but, by a kind Providence, didn't. Can't you see many thousands could that be said as well as of you and

"Yours, respectfully,

"Charmond Kennedy,

"Late Chaplain Second Colored Regiment New York Vols."

Mr. Kennedy gladly subscribes five dollars toward buying the leg that he might himself have lost. And if any other person in the state who went to the war and returned with both legs, or who did not go but sent a substitute, or who, unable to go either, wished and prayed for those who did, wishes to help this soldier, and will send the money to the Editor of Harper's Weekly, it will be faithfully applied to buying the leg.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

The Senate voted, on May 30, to extend the time allowed for the completion of the Pacific Railroad two years.

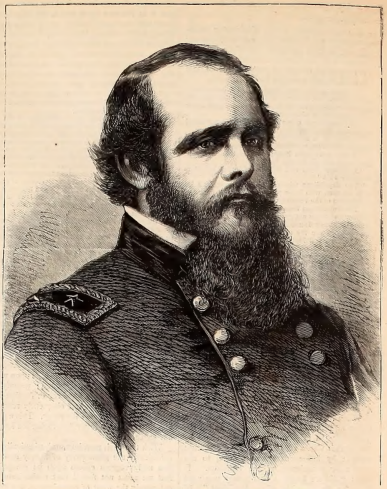
The House, on May 30, passed the Indian Appropriation Bill. The most important other action was to vote the Constitution by abolishing the Vice-Presidency, and making the President eligible for any number of years, radically changing the system of election.

The Senate, on June 1, passed the House bill with an amendment providing that no denial or abridgment of the right of suffrage or any other right shall be enacted on account of race or color, Indians not taxed excepted. It goes back to the House for its concurrence.

NEWS ITEMS.

The statue of Thomas H. Benton, in St. Louis, was unveiled May 30 with a grand demonstration, Jessie Francis Benton unveiling the statue, and Hon. Frank P. Blair pronouncing the eulogium.

The Democratic Convention of Georgia, Wheatland, Pennsylvania, on June 1, aged 76.

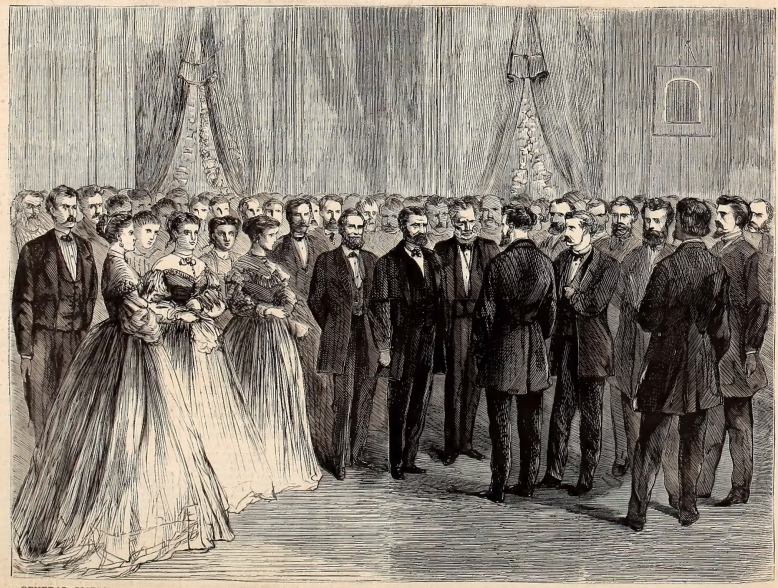


FOREIGN NEWS.

The foreign news for the past week has been brief and unimportant. The Abyssinian difficulty has been fully supplied her infantry with what the French Emperor calls the chassepot rifle. The Chassepot Argument is still putting her Persian subjects to the very best advantage. The Fenian Head Centre, the Fore and disturbing Galicia: North Germany has abolished imprisonment for debt: Russia and Bavaria have signed Bancroft's Naturalization treaty with the United States.

The most important foreign news is from Central Asia, and marks the progress of the Russian invasion of that region. The invasion of Chinese Turkestan by the Russians began in 1866, simultaneous with a movement under the direction of the British authorities in India but conducted by an Indian prince, Shere Ali Khan, into Afghanistan, the country adjoining Turkestan. The question involved is one of Russian and British power in Central Asia, and the ultimate object of the Russians is to possess all of Central Asia as far south as the borders of British India, and between China on the east and Persia on the west.

THE CLOISTERS.—[See the Poem, Page 375.]



GENERAL JOHN M. SCHOFIELD, THE NEW SECRETARY OF WAR.

THE NEW SECRETARY OF WAR.

On the announcement of the vote on Impeachment, and the discovery that the Senate had sustained the President by acquitting him of the charge of illegally removing Secretary STANTON, that officer promptly withdrew from the Department, leaving it in charge of the Adjutant-General. President JOHNSON nominated General SCHOFIELD as Secretary of War, and the Senate confirmed him.

General SCHOFIELD's war record is well known to our readers. He was the commander of a wing of SHERMAN's army in the campaign of Atlanta, and the leader of the force which captured Wilmington and pushed into the interior of North Carolina to meet SHERMAN. Since the war he has been in command in Virginia. Of his political principles little is known at present.

GENERAL JOSEPH B. HAWLEY FORMALLY TENDERING THE REPUBLICAN NOMINATIONS TO GENERAL GRANT AND MR. COLFAX.—[See Page 375.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER V.

HAVING told me the name of Mr. Candy's assistant, Betteredge appeared to think that we had wasted enough of our time on an insignificant subject. He resumed the perusal of Rosanna Spearman's letter.

On my side, I sat at the window, waiting until he had done. Little by little, the impression produced on me by Ezra Jennings—it seemed perfectly unaccountable, in such a situation as mine, that any human being should have produced an impression on me at all!—faded from my mind. My thoughts flowed back into their former channel. Once more, I forced myself to look my own incredible position resolutely in the face. Once more, I reviewed in my own mind the course which I had at last summoned composure enough to plan out for the future.

To go back to London that day; to put the whole case before Mr. Bruff; and, last and most important, to obtain (no matter by what means or at what sacrifice) a personal interview with Rachel—this was my plan of action, so far as I was capable of forming it at the time. There was more than an hour still to spare before the train started. And there was the bare chance that Betteredge might discover something in the unread portion of Rosanna Spearman's letter, which it might be useful for me to know before I left the house in which the Diamond had been lost. For that chance I was now waiting.

The letter ended in these terms:

"You have no need to be angry, Mr. Franklin, even if I did feel some little triumph at knowing that I held all your prospects in life in my own hands. Anxieties and fears soon came back to me. With the view Sergeant Cuff took of the loss of the Diamond, he would be sure to end in examining our linen and our dresses. There was no place in my room—there was no place in the house—which I could feel satisfied would be safe from him. How to hide the nightgown so that not even the Sergeant could find it? and how to do that without losing one moment of precious time?—these were not easy questions to answer. My uncertainties ended in my taking a way that may make you laugh. I undressed, and put the night-gown on me. You had worn it—and I had another little moment of pleasure in wearing it after you.

"The next news that reached us in the servants' hall showed that I had not made sure of the night-gown a moment too soon. Sergeant Cuff wanted to see the washing-book.

"I found it, and took it to him in my lady's sitting-room. The Sergeant and I had come across each other more than once in former days. I was certain he would know me again—and I was not certain of what he might do when he found me employed as servant in a house in which a valuable jewel had been lost. In this suspense, I felt it would be a relief to me to get the meeting between us over, and to know the worst of it at once.

"He looked at me as if I was a stranger, when I handed him the washing-book; and he was very specially polite in thanking me for bringing it. I thought those were both bad signs. There was no knowing what he might say of me behind my back; there was no knowing how soon I might not find myself taken in custody on suspicion, and searched. It was then time for your return from seeing Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite off by the railway; and I went to your favorite walk in the shrubbery, to try for another chance of speaking to you—the last chance, for all I knew to the contrary, that I might have.

"You never appeared; and, what was worse still, Mr. Betteredge and Sergeant Cuff passed by the place where I was hiding—and the Sergeant saw me.

"I had no choice, after that, but to return to my proper place and my proper work, before more disasters happened to me. Just as I was going to step across the path you came back from the railway. You were making straight for the shrubbery, when you saw me. I am certain, Sir, you saw me—and you turned away as if I had got the plague, and went into the house."

"I made the best of my way indoors again, returning by the servants' entrance. There was nobody in the laundry-room at that time; and I sat down there alone. I have told you already of the thoughts which the Shivering Sand put into my head. Those thoughts came back to me now. I wondered in myself which it would be hardest to do, if things went on in this way—to bear Mr. Franklin Blake's indifference for me, or to jump into the quicksand and end it forever in that way?

"It's useless to ask me to account for my own conduct, at this time. I try—and I can't understand it myself.

"Why didn't I stop you, when you avoided me in that cruel manner? Why didn't I call out, 'Mr. Franklin, I have got something to say to you; it concerns yourself, and you must, and shall, hear it?' You were at my mercy—I had got the whiphand of you. Why did I say anything rather than that, I had the means (if I could only make you trust me) of being useful to you in the future. Of course, I never supposed that you—a gentleman—had stolen the Diamond for the mere pleasure of stealing it. No. People had borrowed Miss Rachel, and had heard Mr. Betteredge, talk about your extravagance and your debts. It was plain enough to me that you had taken the Diamond to sell it, or pledge it, and so to get the money of which you stood in need. Why did I could have told you of a man in London who would have advanced a good large sum on the jewel, and who would have asked no awkward questions about it either.

"Why didn't I speak to you? why didn't I speak to you!

"I wonder whether the risks and difficulties of keeping the night-gown were as great, that I could manage, without having other risks and difficulties to contend with, them? This might have been the case with some women—but they could it be the case with me? In the days when I was a thief, I had run risks of greater risks, and found my way out of difficulties by means of this difficulty was mere child's play. I had been accustomed to make the most of my chances and deceptions—some of them on such a grand scale, and managed so cleverly, that they became famous, and passed from mouth to mouth. Was such a little thing as the keeping of the night-gown likely to weigh on my spirits, and to set my heart sinking within me, at the time when I ought to have spoken to you? What nonsense to ask the question! the thing couldn't be.

"There is the sum of my dwelling in this way on my own folly? The plain truth is plain enough, surely? Behind your back, I loved you with all my heart and soul. Before your face—there's no denying it—I was frightened of you; frightened of making you angry with me; frightened of what you might say to me (though you had taken the Diamond) if I presumed to tell you that I had found it out. I had gone as near to it as I dared when I spoke to you in the library. You had not turned your back on me then. You had not started away from me as if I had got the plague. I tried to provoke myself into feeling angry with you, and to rouse up my courage in that way. No! I couldn't feel any thing but the misery and the mortification of it. 'You're a plain girl; you have got a crooked shoulder; you're only a house-maid—what do you mean by attempting to speak to Me?' You never uttered a word of that, Mr. Franklin; but you said it all to me, nevertheless. Is such madness as this to be accounted for? No. There is nothing to be done but to confess it, and let it be.

"I ask your pardon, once more, for this wandering of my pen. There is no fear of its happening again. I am close at the end now.

"The first person who disturbed me by coming into the empty room was Penelope. She had found out my secret long since, and she had done her best to bring me to my senses—and done it kindly too.

"'Ah!' she said, 'I know why you're sitting here, and fretting, all by yourself. The best thing that can happen for your advantage, Rosanna, will be for Mr. Franklin's visit here to come to an end. It's my belief that he won't be long now before he leaves the house.'

"In all my thoughts of you I had never thought of your going away. I couldn't speak to Penelope. I could only look at her.

"'I've just left Miss Rachel,' Penelope went on. 'And a hard matter I have had of it to get up with her temper. She says the house is unbearable to her with the police in it; and she's determined to speak to my lady this evening, and to go to her Aunt Ablewhite to-morrow. If she does that, Mr. Franklin will be the next to find a reason for going away, you may depend on it!'

"I recovered the use of my tongue at that. 'Do you mean to say Mr. Franklin will go with her?' I asked.

"'Only too gladly, if she would let him; but she won't. He has been made to feel her temper; he is in her black books too—and that after having done all he can to help her, poor fellow! No, no! If they don't make it up before to-morrow, you will see Miss Rachel go one way, and Mr. Franklin another. Where he may betake himself to I can't say. But he will never stay here, Rosanna, after Miss Rachel has left us.'

"I managed to master the despair I felt at the prospect of your going away. To own the truth, I saw a little glimpse of hope for myself if there was really a serious disagreement between Miss Rachel and you. 'Do you know,' I asked, 'what the quarrel is between them?'

"'It's all on Miss Rachel's side,' Penelope said. 'And, for any thing I know to the contrary, it's all Miss Rachel's temper, and nothing else.'

"I am loth to distress you, Rosanna; but don't run away with the notion that Mr. Franklin is ever likely to quarrel with her. He's a great deal too fond of her for that!'

"She had only just spoken those cruel words when there came a call to us from Mr. Betteredge. All the indoor servants were to assemble in the hall. And then we were to go in, one by one, and be questioned in Mr. Betteredge's room by Sergeant Cuff.

"It came to my turn to go in, after her lady-ship's maid and the upper house-maid had been questioned first. Sergeant Cuff's inquiries—though he wrapped them up very cunningly—soon showed me that those two women (the bitterest enemies I had in the house) had made their discoveries outside my door, on the Thursday afternoon, and again on the Thursday night. They had told the Sergeant enough to open his eyes to some part of the truth. He rightly believed me to have made a new night-gown secretly, but he wrongly believed the paint-stained night-gown to be mine. I felt satisfied of another thing, from what he said, which it puzzled me to understand. He suspected me, of course, of being concerned in the disappearance of the Diamond. But, at the same time, he let me see —purposely, as I thought—that he did not consider me as the person chiefly answerable for the loss of the jewel. He appeared to think that I had been acting under the direction of somebody else. Who that person might be, I couldn't guess then, and can't guess now.

"In this uncertainty, one thing was plain—that Sergeant Cuff was miles away from knowing the whole truth. You were safe as long as the night-gown was safe—and not a moment longer.

"I quite despair of making you understand the distress and terror which pressed upon me now. It was impossible for me to risk wearing your night-gown any longer. I might find myself taken off, at a moment's notice, to the police court at Frizinghall, to be charged on suspicion, and searched accordingly. While Sergeant Cuff still left me free, I had to choose—and that at once—between destroying the night-gown, or hiding it in some safe place, at some safe distance from the house.

"If I had only been a little less fond of you, I think I should have destroyed it. But, oh! how could I destroy the only thing I had which proved that I had saved you from discovery? How did I come to an explanation together, and if you suspected me of having some bad motive, and denied it all, how could I win upon you to trust me, unless I had the night-gown to produce? Was it wronging you to believe, as I did, and do still, that you might hesitate to let a poor girl like me be the sharer of your secret, and your accomplice in the theft which your moneytroubles had tempted you to commit? Think of your cold behavior to me, Sir, and you will hardly wonder at my unwillingness to destroy the only claim on your confidence and your gratitude which it was my fortune to possess.

"I determined to hide it; and the place I fixed on was the place I knew best—the Shivering Sand.

"As soon as the questioning was over I made the first excuse that came into my head, and got leave to go out for a breath of fresh air. I went straight to Cobb's Hole, to Mr. Yollond's cottage. His wife and daughter were the best friends I had. Don't suppose I trusted them with your secret—I have trusted nobody. All I wanted was to write this letter to you, and to have a safe opportunity of taking the night-gown off me. Suspected as I was, I could do neither of these things, with any sort of security, up at the house.

"And now I have nearly got through my long letter, writing it alone in Lucy Yollond's bedroom. When it is done I shall go down stairs with the night-gown rolled up, and hidden under my cloak. I shall find the means I want, for keeping it safe and dry in its hiding-place, among the litter of old things in Mrs. Yollond's kitchen. And then I shall go to the Shivering Sand—don't be afraid of my letting my footmarks betray me!—and hide the night-gown down in the sand, where no living creature can find it without being first let into the secret by myself.

"And, when that is done, what then?

"Then, Mr. Franklin, I shall have two reasons for making another attempt to say my say to you which I have not said yet. If you leave the house, as Penelope believes you will leave it, and if I haven't spoken to you before that, I shall lose my opportunity forever. That is one reason. Then, again, there is the comforting knowledge—if my speaking does make you angry—that I have got the night-gown ready to plead my cause for me as nothing else can. That is my other reason. If these two together don't harden my heart against the coldness which has hitherto frozen it up (I mean the coldness of

"AS I LAID MY HAND ON THE DOOR OPPOSITE, I HEARD A FEW PLAINTIVE CHORDS STRUCK ON THE PIANO IN THE ROOM WITHIN."

* NOTE, by Franklin Blake.—The writer is entirely mistaken, poor creature. I never noticed her. My intention was certainly to have taken a turn in the shrubbery. But, remembering at the same moment that my aunt might wish to see me, after my return from the railway, I altered my mind, and went into the house.

your treatment of me), there will be the end of my efforts—and the end of my life.

"Yes. If I miss my next opportunity—if you are as cruel as ever, and if I feel it again as I have felt it already—good-by to the world which has grudged me the happiness that it gives to others. Good-by to life, which nothing but a little kindness from you can ever make pleasurable to me again. Don't blame yourself, Sir, if it ends in this way. But try—do try—to feel some forgiving sorrow for me! I shall take care that you find out what I have done for you when I am past helping you of myself. Will you find something kind of me then—in the same gentle way that you have when you speak to Miss Rachel? If you do that, and if there are such things as ghosts, I believe my ghost will hear it, and tremble with the pleasure of it.

"I'll leave off. I am making myself cry. How am I to see my way to the hiding-place if I let these useless tears come and blind me?

"Besides, why should I look at the gloomy side? Why not believe, while I can, that it will all end well after all? I may find you in a good humor to-night—or, if not, I may succeed better to-morrow morning. I think I improve my poor plain face by fretting—shall I? Who knows but I may have filled all those weary long pages of paper for nothing? They will go into the waste-paper basket (never mind now for what other reason) into the hiding-place, along with the night-gown. It has been hard, hard work writing my letter. And if we only end in understanding each other, how I shall enjoy tearing it up!

"I hope to remain, Sir, your true lover and humble servant,

"ROSANNA SPEARMAN."

The rending of the letter was completed by Betteredge in silence. After carefully putting it back in the envelope, he sat thinking, with his head bowed down, and his eyes on the ground.

"Betteredge," I said, "is there any hint to guide us at the end of the letter?"

He looked up slowly, with a heavy sigh.

"There is nothing to guide you, Mr. Franklin," he answered. "If you will take my advice, you will keep the letter in the cover till these present anxieties of yours have come to an end. It will surely relieve you, whenever you read it. Don't read it now."

I put the letter away in my pocket-book.

A glance back at the sixteenth and seventeenth chapters of Betteredge's Narrative will show that there really was a reason for my thus tearing myself, at a time when my feelings had been already cruelly tried. Twice over, the unhappy woman had made her last attempt to speak to me. And twice over, it had been my misfortune (God knows how innocently!) to repel the advances that she made to me. On the fifteenth night, as Betteredge truly describes it, she had found me alone at the billiard-table. Her manner and her language had suggested to me—and would have suggested to any man, under the circumstances—that she was about to confess a guilty knowledge of the disappearance of the Diamond. For her own sake, I had purposely shown no special interest in what was coming. For her own sake, I had impressively locked at the billiard-balls, instead of looking at her—and what had been the result? I had sent her away from me, wounded to the heart. On the Saturday again—on the day when she must have foreseen, after what Penelope had told her, that my departure was close at hand—the same fatality still pursued us. She had once more attempted to meet me in the shrubbery walk, and she had found me in the company with Betteredge and Sergeant Cuff. In her hearing, the Sergeant, with his own underhand object in view, had appealed to my interest in Rosanna Spearman. Again for the poor creature's own sake, I had met the police officer with a flat denial, and had declared—loudly declared, so that she might hear me too—that I felt "no interest whatever in Rosanna Spearman." At those words, solely designed to warn her against attempting to gain my private ear, she had turned away, and left the place in a moment of her despair, as I then believed; self-doomed to destruction, as I knew now. From that point, I have already traced the succession of events which led me to the astounding discovery at the quicksand. The retrospect is now complete. I may leave the miserable story of Rosanna Spearman—in which, even at this distance of time, I can not revert without a pang of distress—to suggest for itself all that is here purposely left untold. I may pass from the suicide at the Shivering Sand, with its strange and terrible influence on my present position and my future prospects, to interests which concern the living people of this narrative, and to events which were already paving my way for the slow and tolsome journey from the darkness to the light.

CHAPTER VI.

I WALKED to the railway station accompanied, it is needless to say, by Gabriel Betteredge. I had the letter in my pocket, and the night-gown safely packed in a little bag—both to be submitted, before I slept that night, to the investigation of Mr. Bruff.

We left the house in silence. For the first time in my experience of him, I found that Betteredge in my company without a word to say to me. Having something to say on my side, I opened the conversation as soon as we were clear of the lodge gates.

"Before I go to London," I began, "I have two questions to ask you. They relate to myself, and I believe they will rather surprise you."

If they will put that poor creature's letter out of my head, Mr. Franklin, they may do anything else they like with me. Please to begin surprising me, Sir, as soon as you can."

"Mr. Franklin Blake," said the old gentleman, "this is a very serious matter; in more respects than one. In my opinion, it concerns Rachel quite as nearly as it concerns you. Her extraordinary conduct is no mystery now. She believes you have stolen the Diamond."

I had expected from reasoning my own way fairly to that revolting conclusion. But it had pained itself on several occasions. My resolution to obtain a personal interview with Rachel rested really and truly on the ground just stated by Mr. Bruff.

"The first step to take in this investigation," the lawyer proceeded, "is to appeal to Rachel. She has been silent hitherto, from motives which I (who know her character) can readily understand. It is impossible, after what has happened, to remain silent much longer. She must be persuaded to tell us, or she must be forced to tell us, on what grounds she bases her belief that you are the Moonstone. The chances are, that the whole of this case, serious as it seems now, will tumble to pieces, if we can only break through that girl's inveterate reserve, and prevail upon her to speak out."

"That is a very comforting opinion for me," I said. "I am sorry I should take to leave it."

"You would like to know how I can justify it," interposed Mr. Bruff. I can tell you in two minutes. Rachel, in the first place, is that I look at this matter from a lawyer's point of view. It's a question of evidence, with me. Very well. Rachel breaks down, at the outset, on one important point."

"On what point?"

"You shall see. I admit that the mark of the name proves the night-gown to be yours. I admit that the mark of the paint proves the night-gown to have been in the smear on Rachel's door. But what evidence is there, before you or before me, to prove that you are the person who wore the night-gown?"

The objection electrified me. It had never occurred to my mind until that moment.

"As to Miss Rachel," the lawyer, taking up Rosanna Spearman's confession, "I can understand that the letter is a distressing one to you. I can understand that you may hesitate to subjective it from a purely impartial point of view. But I am not in your position. I can bring my professional experience to bear on this document, just as I should bring it to bear on any other. Without alluding to the woman's career as a thief, I will merely remark that the letter proves her to have been an adept at deception, on her own showing; and I argue from that, that I am justified in assuming her of not having told the whole truth. I won't start any theory, at present, as to what she may or may not have done. I will only say that she had the strongest motive on the evidence of the night-gown only, the chances are ninety-nine to a hundred that Rosanna Spearman was the night-gown's avowed lie to her. In that case, there is the woman's letter, confessing that she was jealous of Rachel, confessing that she changed the night-dressing that she saw a glimpse of hope for herself, in the prospect of a quarrel between Rachel and you. I don't stop to ask who took the Moonstone (as a means to be sure, Rosanna Spearman would have taken fifty Moonstones)—I only say that the disappearance of the jewel would have enchanted her: she was in love with you, an opportunity of setting you and Rachel at variance for the rest of your lives. She had the strongest possible motive for self, then, remember; and, having the opportunity, I fairly assert that it was in her character, and in her position at the time, to take it. What do you say to that?"

"Some such suggestion," I answered, "crossed my own mind, as soon as I opened the letter."

"Exactly! And when you had read the letter, you gave the unhappy creature, and could find it in your heart to suspect her. Does you credit, my dear Sir—does you credit!"

"But suppose," I objected, "that I did wear the night-gown? What then?"

"I don't see how that fact is to be proved," said Mr. Bruff, "in the present state of things. It is possible, the vindication of your innocence would be no easy matter. We won't go into that, now. You have not said yet whether you must suspected you on the evidence of the night-gown only."

"Good God, how coolly you talk of Rachel suspecting me!" I broke out. "What right has she to suspect Me, on any evidence, of being a thief?"

"A very sensible question, my dear Sir. Rather hotly put—but well worth considering for all that. Will you excuse me, gentlemen, while I search your memory, and tell me this. Did any thing happen while you were staying at the house party, of unusual interest to Rachel's belief in your honor—but, let us say, to shake her belief (no matter with how little reason) in your principles generally?"

I started, in ungovernable agitation, to my feet. The lawyer's question reminded me, for the first time since I had left England, that something had happened.

In the eighth chapter of Betteredge's Narrative, you will find allusion to the arrival of a foreigner and a stranger at my aunt's house, who came to see me on business. The nature of his business was thus.

I had been foolish enough (being, as usual, straightened for money at the time) to accept a loan from the keeper of a small restaurant in Paris, to whom I was well known as a customer. A time was settled between us for paying the money back; and when the time came, I found it (as thousands of other honest men have found it) impossible to keep my engagement. I sent the man a bill. My name was unfortunately too well known on such documents: he failed to negotiate it. His affairs had fallen into disorder, in the interval since I had borrowed of him; bankruptcy stared him in the face; and a relative of his, a French lawyer, came to England to find me, and to insist on the payment of my debt. He was a man of violent temper; and he took the wrong way with me. High words passed on both sides; and my adhé and Rachel were unfortunately in the next room, and heard us. Lady Verinder came to me, and insisted on knowing what was the matter. The Frenchman produced his credentials, and declared me to be responsible for the ruin of a poor man, who had trusted in my honor. My aunt instantly paid him the money, and got him off. She knew me better of course than to take the Frenchman's view of the transaction. But she was shocked at my carelessness, and justly angry with me for placing myself in a position which, but for her interference, might have become a very disgraceful one. Rachel heard of it, and what she heard what passed—I can't say which. She took her own romantic, high-flown view of the matter. I was "dishonorable;" I was "dishonorable;" I had "no principles;" there was "no knowing what I might do next"—in short, she said some of the severest things to me which I had ever heard from a young lady's lips. The breach between us lasted for the whole of the next day. The day after, I succeeded in making my peace, and thought no more of it. Had Rachel reverted to this unlucky accident, at the critical moment when my honor in her estimation was again, and far more seriously, assailed? Mr. Bruff, when I had mentioned the circumstances to him, answered that question at once in the affirmative.

"It would have its effect on her mind," he said, gravely. "I wish, for your sake, that the thing had not happened. However, we have discovered that there was a predisposing influence against you—and there is one uncertainty cleared out of our way, at any rate. I see nothing more that we can do now. Our next step in this inquiry must be the step that takes us to Rachel."

He rose, and began thinking thoughtfully up and down the room. Twice, I was on the point of telling him that I had determined on seeing Rachel personally; and twice, having regard to his age and to his character, I hesitated to take him by surprise at an unfavorable moment.

"The grand difficulty is," he resumed, "how to make the best use of Rachel's doubt in the matter, without reserve. Have you any suggestion to offer?"

"I have made up my mind, Mr. Bruff, to speak to Rachel myself."

"You!" He suddenly stopped in his walk, and looked at me as if I had thought I had taken leave of my senses. "You, of all the people in the world!" He abruptly checked himself, and took another turn in the room. "Wait a little," he said. "In cases of this extraordinary kind, the rash way is sometimes the best way." He considered with himself for a moment or two, under that new light, and ended boldly by a decision in my favor. "Nothing venture, nothing have," was his gentlemanly reason. "You have a chance in your favor which I don't possess —and you shall be the first to try the experiment."

"A chance in my favor?" I repeated, in the greatest surprise.

Mr. Bruff's face softened, for the first time, into a smile.

"This is how it stands," he said. "I tell you fairly, I don't trust your discretion, and I don't trust your temper. But I do trust in Rachel's still preserving, in some remote little corner of her heart, a certain perverse regard for you. Touch that—and trust to the consequences for the fullest disclosure that can flow from a woman's lips! The question is—how are you to see her?"

"She has been the guest of yours at this house," I answered. "My interview to-morrow—if nothing was said about me beforehand—that I might see her here?"

"Cool!" said Mr. Bruff. With that one word of comment on the reply that I had made to him, he took another turn up and down the room.

"In plain English," he said, "my house is to be turned into a trap to catch Rachel; with a bait to match, in the shape of an invitation from my wife and daughters. If you were any body else but Franklin Blake, and if this matter was one atom less serious than it really is, I should refuse point-blank. As things are, I firmly believe Rachel will live to thank me for turning traitor to her, in my old character of your accomplice. Rachel shall be asked to spend the day here; and you shall receive due notice of it."

"When? To-morrow?"

"To-morrow won't give us time enough to get her answer. Say the day after."

"How shall I hear from you?"

"Stay at home all the morning and expect me to call on you."

I thanked him for the inestimable assistance which he was rendering to me, with the gratitude which I really felt; and, declining a hospitable invitation to sleep that night at Hampstead, returned to my lodgings in London.

Of the day that followed, I have only to say that it was the longest day of my life. Innocent as I knew myself to be, curious as I was that the abominable imputation which rested on me must sooner or later be cleared off, there was nevertheless a sense of self-abasement in my mind which instinctively disinclined me to see any of my friends. We often hear (almost invariably, however, from superficial observers) that guilt can look like innocence. I believe it to be infinitely the truer axiom of the two that innocence can look like guilt. I ceased myself to be denied, all day, to every visitor who called; and I only ventured out under cover of the night.

The next morning Mr. Bruff surprised me at the breakfast-table. He handed me a large key, and announced that he felt ashamed of himself for the first time in his life.

"Is she coming?"

"She is coming to-day, to lunch and spend the afternoon with my wife and my girls."

"Are Mrs. Bruff, and your daughters, in the secret?"

"Inevitably. But women, as you may have observed, have no principles. My family don't feel my pangs of conscience. The end being to bring you and Rachel together again, my wife and daughters pass over the means employed to gain it, as composedly as if they were Jesuits."

"I am infinitely obliged to them. What is this key?"

"The key of the gate in my back-garden wall. Be there at three this afternoon. Let yourself into the garden, and make your way in by the conservatory door. Cross the small drawing-room, and open the door in front of you which leads into the music-room. There, you will find Rachel—and find her, alone."

"How can I thank you?"

"I will tell you how. Don't blame me for what happens afterward."

With those words, he went out.

I had many weary hours still to wait through. To while away the time, I looked at my letters. Among them was a letter from Betteredge.

I opened it eagerly. To my surprise and disappointment, it began with an apology warning me to expect no news of any importance. In the next sentence the everlasting Ezra Jennings appeared again! He had stopped Betteredge on the way out of the station, and had asked who I was. Informed on this point, he had mentioned having seen me to his master, Mr. Candy. Mr. Candy hearing of this, had himself driven over to Betteredge, to express his regret at our having missed each other. He had a reason for wishing particularly to speak to me; and when I was next in the neighborhood of Frizinghall, he begged I would let him know. Apart from a few characteristic touches of the Betteredge philosophy, this was the sum and substance of my correspondent's letter. The writer hearted, faithful old man, had acknowledged that he had written "mainly for the pleasure of writing to me."

I completed up the letter in my pocket, and forgot it the moment after, in the all-absorbing interest of my coming interview with Rachel.

As the clocks of Hampstead church struck three, I put Mr. Bruff's key into the lock of the door in the wall. When I had stepped into the garden, and while I was securing the door again on the inner side, I own to having felt a certain guilty doubtfulness about what might happen next. I looked furtively on either side of me, suspicious of the presence of some unexpected witness in some unknown part of the garden. Nothing appeared, to justify my apprehensions. The walks were, one and all, solitudes; and the birds and the bees were the only witnesses.

I passed through the garden; entered the conservatory; and crossed the small drawing-room. As I laid my hand on the door opposite, I heard a few plaintive chords struck on the piano in the room within. She had often played over the instrument in this way, when I was staying at her mother's house. I was obliged to wait a little, to steady myself. The past came crowding back, side by side, at that supreme moment—and the contrast shook me.

After the lapse of a few moments, I roused my manhood, and opened the door.

MAGDALA.

JUDGING by our engraving on page 380, the strong-hold of His late Abyssinian Majesty, King THEODORE, must have been endowed by very formidable fortress, and in the hands of a civilized and educated soldier would have laughed the siege and assault of Sir ROBERT NAPIER and his warriors to scorn. Magdala is situated on a high narrow plateau on the south side of the river Beshlo, or Bashilo, which forms the boundary between the Gallas territory and Abyssinia, the entrance to the valley on the east being guarded by the strong precipitous fortresses of Antota Gabit and Amba Geshen. On the west it is divided from the plateau of Worrie Gimmano by Amara Saint by a rugged and precipitous ridge, and on the east by an exceedingly deep and narrow gulch from the village of Dasha. On the south the enormous majestic mountain mass known as the Kollo rises high up into the blue sky, its glittering glaciers flashing in the bright sunlight with all the sublime beauty of Alpine scenery. It was through the defiles and passes of this mountain that the advance of the troops took place, for though the approach is very nearly as difficult as from the north or east, still the most difficult portions are not so immediately commanded as in the other quarters.

In our sketch the fortress of Magdala is represented in the centre back-ground, with the village of King THEODORE visible therein; the village of Tanta is seen in the fore-ground. The fortress was protected by twenty cannon, all of which it will be remembered were captured. The fortress covered an area of two miles square.

TENDERING THE NOMINATIONS.

THE Committees of the late Republican and the Soldiers' and Sailors' Conventions, headed by General HAWLEY and Colonel ALLEMAN, waited upon their nominees, General GRANT and Mr. COLFAX, on May 29, and formally announced to them the result of the choice of the Conventions. In reply to the remarks of Colonel ALLEMAN General GRANT significantly alluded to his gratification at possessing the confidence and support of the soldiers and sailors who had followed him during the war.

The Committee of the Republican Convention waited on General GRANT in the evening at his residence. We illustrate the scene on page 372.

The spacious parlors were well filled. Among those present were Speaker COLFAX, who was, by arrangement previously made, to be addressed at the same time; Mr. and Miss MATHEWS; Mrs. GRANT; her sister, Mrs. CASEY; Mrs. General DENT; their father, Mr. DENT; the members of the General's Staff; General LOGAN; General ELLIS and HARDY, of New Jersey; VAN HORN, of New York; VAN HORN, of Missouri; Governor HAWLEY, the President of the Convention; most of the officers thereof, several members of the National Committee, and many delegates, including J. H. HARRIS, the well-known colored orator of North Carolina.

In reply to the speech of General HAWLEY General GRANT said:

"If General Grant is the high office for which you have selected me I will give to its duties the same energy, the same spirit, and the same will that I have given to the duties assigned to me. duties which have devolved upon me heretofore. Whether I shall be able to perform these duties to your entire satisfaction I cannot undertake. You have truly said, in the course of your address, that I shall have no policy of my own to interfere against the will of the people."

THE CLOISTERS.

Come with me to the cloisters, Kate; the sultry heat of day
Has wearied me—I long to seek the shadows cool and gray.
Too brightly on the world without the summer sunshine falls,
But there is rest and shade within the old cathedral walls.

Beneath these dark-grain'd arches, where no wander to and fro,
In bygone mediæval times the monks paced long ago;
They told their beads and murmur'd prayers, while, ever between whiles,
The swell of chanting voices down the sweet down distant aisles.

Was theirs a calmer life than ours? or did they carry here
The pension of a throbbing heart, kept down for many a year,
And struggling madly with its bonds? Did longings wild and vain
Of grief deep pathos to the tones that breath'd the holy strain?

It might have been so; yet I think that outward calm is weak,
For sorrow sought the sombre cell, and shunn'd the crowded mart,
And better 'neath the cowl or veil to let the tears run free,
Than force them back to flood the heart, lest all the world should see!

Ah, Kate! those honest eyes of yours, how plainly do they say,
And have you, then, some secret woe?—you, courtest, rich, and gay,
The cherish'd wife, whose lightest wish her husband loves to grant,
What hidden burden can you bear to crush your spirit down?

I know my own heart's bitterness. There is a lonely cell,
Deep in our dear old woods at home, and, Kate, we know it well,
Where all the place by tangled paths no stranger could have trod:
The soul has secret nooks like this, which none can find but God.

My life has such an unseen bower. I go on summer eyes,
And hear my story of the past low whisper'd by the leaves:
Where mourn I still o'er perish'd hopes I would have died to save,
And there my tears fall down like rain upon my first love's grave.

Kate, you are young and happy yet, but years will touch the cheek
That seldom does a woman wed the lover of her youth,
It may be that her idol falls and crumbles into clay, or death steals in upon her shrine and carries it away.

The desolation comes to most, and few escape the fate;
But better weep o'er empty shrines than shelter'd idols, Kate!
And when those wrecks in other lives I look around and see,
I think how very merciful my God has been to me.

We both were young, but he was poor—for gold is hard to win,
And many knock at Fortune's gate, but few can enter in.
And youth and love impatient urge the folly of delay:
I was to earn a home for me that Jamie went away.

He left me in the autumn days, the time of falling leaves,
When all the wide-spread harvest fields were bare of yellow sheaves;
But I looked forward through my tears to brighter hours to come,
When Jamie should return once more, and bring his harvest home.

But Heaven will'd it otherwise. It never came, that time,
For Jamie wither'd in the sun of yon fierce Indian clime.
Thank God that Christian priests were there to whisper comfort down
And with our Church's exiled ones they laid him down to rest.

Well! there can be no doubting now to chill my thoughts of him,
No shadow of a vague distrust that clear, true light can dim:
I know that never other love that poiseless heart can fill.
And Jamie in his far-off grave is my own Jamie still.

But time has brought me comfort, Kate, and ties unbreak'd of then.
Listen! Far down the cloister floats the last solemn strain
Let us go out into the world—I feel that solemn strain
Will echo in my aching heart, and make it calm again.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"We are going to have some more rain, I think," wisely remarked a gentleman, the other day, to a friend in the car. "We haven't had any late yet," was the terse reply. And indeed May has been an uncanny thing every way, and has quite lost its good reputation. Umbrellas, over-shoes, and water-proofs have been in constant demand; and we have enjoyed a mighty series of long storms and April-like showers. So we gladly welcome June, trusting that the "rainy season" is about over, and that warmer days really come.

Scarcely any thing in the outward world gives one a fit of the "blues" so thoroughly as a succession of dull, damp, chilly and rainy weeks. No doubt there is considerable ground for the physiologists' theory that we are very seldom really satisfied with the weather—it is either too hot or too cold, too dry or too wet, too dry or too wet; and we fret, and fancy ourselves ill-used, in a manner. It is a pity that there are so many human thermometers and barometers, rising and falling with the changes of life's atmosphere, for those who habitually fret and fume about the weather usually find a great deal of friction whichever way they turn. The truth is, that no basic or stimulant is half so inspiring, while plodding through life's journey, as a cheerful temper. The habit, too, of reiterating that this is a world of trial and trouble, and going about with the air of "I trust a year's long?" Make the best of every thing! Do not forget yourself in fretful weather, or in any other. Look for the "silver lining" of the clouds; catch the sunbeams that fall across your path; be pleasantly wroke in the home circle; frolic with the children; in short, stop grumbling, forget your troubles, and make others forget and find that you have discovered the "true philosopher's stone"!

Two old familiar buildings are fast disappearing—the Church of the Puritans and St. George's Chapel. The former, which is in Union Square, between 16th and Fifteenth Street, was built about 1846; the latter, on the corner of Beekman and Cliff streets, was erected about 1826, as well as we can learn. It was burned down, and was rebuilt in 1834. At one time this was the fashionable church of the more select section of New York city. But with the general "up town" movement, St. George's ceased to be so much in vogue as it was steadily diminished, and now it is being torn down.

A resident of Detroit has conceived the idea of making the perilous passage over the Falls of Niagara in an India rubber boat of great strength and safety. A contract for building the boat has been let to the Goodyear Rubber Company for $1000. The boat will be an oval in form, the outside diameter of feet, six inches thick at the top and sides, and three feet thick at the bottom. Around the top a strong netting will extend from side to side in the centre, on which will be swung on a pivot a seat, to which the adventurous occupant will be fastened. Opening at the top will be an aperture sufficiently large for him to get inside, which will then be filled with air and closed up. It is calculated that sufficient air can be obtained from the water to breathe for hours. A small cable will be attached to the ball by which it will be towed after the passage of the Falls is made, for which purpose parties will be stationed below the Falls. The building of this novel craft is now in Detroit, and there is no doubt but the attempt to carry this startling project into execution will be made during the present season.

A writer in a recent number of the Galaxy does not approve of pronouncing the words either and neither by giving the i the sound of ī. He remarks that "the analogically correct pronunciation of these words is what we should expect from ether, either and say ther: the diphthong having the sound it has in a large family of words in which the diphthong has the emphasized vowel sound—weight, freight, deign, feign, sleigh, neighbor, weigher, neither, being antiquated and Irish, analogy and the best usage require the common pronunciation either and neither. For the pronunciation ither and nither, with the i which is sometimes heard, there is not the authority either of analogy or of learned speakers." The quotation, and, in this country, a copy of a second-rate British affectation. Some of the best authorities and of the highest social position in England say either and neither."

The great revolution of Manua Loa on the Island of Hawaii is said to be one of the most—if not the most—extensive volcanic eruptions ever known. On the 28th of March the shocks began, and continued with more or less severity until the final catastrophe, which occurred on the 2d April. The evidences of the convulsion, the sea rose in extraordinary waves, villages were destroyed, and every thing was in ruins and chaos. The whole island of Hawaii was enveloped in smoke, the glows of which was lighted up by the vivid and burning lava flowing down the side of the mountain. Upward of 2000 shocks occurred within twelve days. An eye-witness describes the scene at the crater as a most melancholy one. There were hundreds of fire of the mountain, and the fiery lava-streams which the lava streams surrounded them and hemmed them in. The roar simultaneously was terrific. Escape was out of the way to escape. The fiery lava drew nearer and nearer till the heat made them restless, but they would not run. The fiery torrent reached the bridge by the 3d, and blood-red stream, then fell into the stream as a sudden flood of water, and the bridge was gone. remained. From the huge mouth of the crater four great fissures were seen, and from these the lava, spurting and roaring like a cataract with a fury perfectly inconceivable. The lava poured from the fissures, ran to the bed in width, and ran at the rate of ten miles an hour. A singular phenomenon occurred. The lava, instead of at was passing the south point of the island, about three miles from the shore, a conical island, 1000 feet high, rose out of the sea, midway between the vessel and the land, emitting a column of steam and smoke. The lava river divided, one to the island, the other to the land, and has extended the shore out to it one mile at least, so that it is now not an island, but a hill. Captain Lee says never when this island burst up that the mud was scattered on the deck of the vessel like sleet.

Somewhat less than two years ago a warm discussion took place in Congress, on the introduction of a resolution to confer the honor of a statue in the life-size model and statue of Abraham Lincoln, at a price not exceeding $10,000. The topic was made a variety of opinions; some declaring that no woman, certainly not a young and comparatively beautiful one, was capable of being successful in such an undertaking; others expressing themselves as confident that the unusual genius of the artiste in question was a guaranty of success. The resolution was adopted, and for many months Miss REDIN has been working on the model, which, of course, has been the subject of much adverse criticism. She made her study from life, and many consider that she has been very successful with the model. What will be the popular verdict when fully completed and cut in marble yet remains to be seen. As so many are skeptical about a woman's ability to produce any great work the young artiste must expect an unusual amount of criticism. Apparently she pursues her work industriously and enthusiastically. The busts and statettes in her studio indicate that she has not neglected An allegorical group representing the North, South, East and West has engaged a good deal of her attention, and indicates originality of conception, and an object of art in creation. Miss REDIN is a native of Madison, Wisconsin, but has resided for some years in Washington. She was engaged in working in one of the Departments at the time when she made her first attempt in the plastic art. She has had little regular artistic training, what she has accomplished being chiefly the results of natural genius and perseverance. Her studies were for her own use and amusement, and it was not her intention to devote herself to the profession of sculpture, but her friends, who observed or understood, so often a beta and urged her to the grand. Real genius, wherever it exists, will, in time, be cordially acknowledged and appreciated by the lovers of art.

A letter at the Paris Exposition, desirous of acquiring information what was the relative price of different joints of mutton in the Paris market, asked a well-known restaurateur, "What is the prime joint?" He answered, "The prime joint, beyond all comparison, is the neck." "What is the next joint?" "The neck." "What is the your lowest priced joint?" The reply was, "The leg." The fact is, the small outlet and the large inlet. He is to say, the neck and the loin, require very little for cooking them, whereas the leg requires a considerable great deal of fuel. On the Continent fuel is very dear, and therefore the joints vary in price according to the of the fuel they consequently put on the necks and loins dear, and legs cheap.

Not long ago the Grand Bank of New Orleans was robbed of $50,000. The skill and ingenuity of the detectives in discovering the robber was really wonderful. On visiting the bank premises the detectives at once judged that the thief must be a tall man with long arms, owing to the manner in which the money and bonds had been deposited; and on a minute examination of the premises it was found that a window had recently been stepped, they discovered the imprint of a tack. Hence they argued that the man evidently had worn a machine-cut boot or shoe, as in no other manner the tack or rivet is always driven about the centre or just beyond the sole. Next, consequently upon this, they set themselves to the study of feet, hoping to catch the thief by the size of his foot. This proved useless, for they sought long and vainly. At length one day in the City Hall they observed a man who was sitting in the reading-room with one foot on his knee, and proceeding to bend down a tack in his boot with his penknife. The tack was driven in exactly as those taken from his boot! It was but the work of a moment to arrest the man. He "peached," and being taken to the Police-office confessed his guilt.

"I wish your sermons hadn't so much wrapping paper" was the remark of a man who ventured to criticise his really excellent pastor. His thoughts were covered with a long sermon, and it was hard to find them.

The Parisian snail-vendor is a curious sight. He trundles through the street a large, shallow hand-cart covered with a sloping roof of wire-work. The snails be purchased for the small sum of two sous; you can also have them cooked on the premises, and eat on the bags. Some people eat them raw, like oysters; others roast them with savory herbs. The best snails are those from Burgundy in the autumn, and are fattened on the vine leaves. The ordinary kinds are gathered in every direction, and the market is generally overstocked yielding the largest supplies.

"Now, my dear," a country lady from the country bumpkined to be walking in a part of the city where the "squatters" reside, and houses are more numerous than elsewhere. One "edifice" attracted her attention, which she described as "a little better than her'n" (her's here, but not better, as she meant to say of the house." On the door, however, were the portentous words, "Beware of the bull!"

Heller is exhibiting a new trick in London which he calls the "Girl of the Period." He throws a young woman, aged about 18 years, into a trance.

There is a proposition to establish homes in Chicago for working-men, with board and lodging at three dollars per week.

There are now congregated at Jerome Park about two hundred horses, which are in a course of preparation for the coming contests. Some of the most celebrated horses in all sections of the country are among the seekers for racing honors.

As the Chinese Embassy were passing from a photograph gallery to their carriages, they came to a little delay upon the sidewalk. An over-inquisitive "Lady," standing on the curbstone, forgetful of good breeding in her desire for knowledge, deliberately took in her ungloved hand his long and elaborately plaited cue, and began to examine it. The polite gentleman eyed the "lady" a moment, then, a smile on his face, made a low bowing, he placed in his own neiture, said, "All mine! All mine!" The incident drew a crowd, but the turmoil ceased. While the crowd grew broader on Mr. Tung's visage as he entered his carriage and was driven off.

There are, when the Erie Canal was first begun, the subject was brought up for discussion in a Quaker meeting. It was proposed to build a railroad instead on the ground of its being a speculation. Among other objections to the canal was one, "How could the water get to the top?" Another answer was given by a Quaker, "Why, it would run down hill, and the world if he had wished canals he would have made them." Thereupon "a weighty Friend" rose up and said slowly, in the leaning voice with which they always speak in meeting, "And Jacob stayed a well." Then, leaving the utterance to be drawn, he sat down without another word.

The following "marriage maxims" are worthy of more than a mere reading: "Contentment is better than wealth by, for they are designed for wives; and ladies should not despise them, for they are also suited to husbands:

The very necessary approach to domestic felicity consists in the mutual cultivation of an absolute unselfishness.

Never talk at one another either alone or in company.

Never both manifest anger at once.

Never speak loud to one another, unless the house is on fire.

Never reflect on a past action, which was done with a good motive and with the best judgment at the time.

Let each one strive to yield oftenest to the wishes of the other.

Let self-obliteration be the daily aim and effort of each.

Never find fault, unless it is perfectly certain that a fault has been committed; and then always speak lovingly.

Never taunt with a past mistake.

Neglect the whole world besides rather than one another.

Never allow a request to be repeated.

Never make a reason an excuse for the other's fault.

It is a necessity to love your self for a day without loving words to think of during absence.

THE CHINESE EMBASSY.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 377.]

PROPOSED SUSPENSION BRIDGE OVER THE HUDSON RIVER, NEAR ANTHONY'S NOSE, IN THE HIGHLANDS, AS PLANNED BY GENERAL EDWARD W. SERRELL, ENGINEER-IN-CHIEF.—[DRAWN BY A. W. THOMPSON.]

NEW SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

WE present our readers to-day with an engraving, by A. W. THOMPSON, of the bridge which is to cross the Hudson River at a point about seven miles south of the Military Academy at West Point, and is to connect the railways on the west side of the river directly with the city of New York and the New England States. The highlands of the Hudson afford the means of crossing the river with one span, at an elevation sufficient to allow vessels of any size to pass under it without obstruction.

The enormous coal trade of the Eastern States, which is growing greater every year, has for a long time called the attention of capitalists to the procurement of additional facilities, and this, in connection with the desire of the citizens of New York, that the great railway system of the States should terminate directly in the city, instead of, as it now does, on the west bank of the river, within the limits of another jurisdiction, last year resulted in the organization of an association of which Hon. N. P. STANTON, well known in leading railroad circles, is President.

This association took upon themselves the formation of a railroad corporation, to connect the Erie Railway with the railroads on the east side of the Hudson, and they organized the Erie and New England Railroad Company, to run from Turners, on the Erie Railway, to Derby, in Connecticut. The same association has recently procured from the Legislature of the State of New York the exclusive right to bridge the Hudson River within certain limits, and having elected General EDWARD W. SERRELL their engineer, they intrusted this experienced gentleman with the location of their lines of railway in this State, and Colonel M. O. DAVISON, the Chief Engineer of the New Haven and Derby Railway, with that part of their road which lies in Connecticut; and General SERRELL was called upon to select the position and prepare the plans for the Great Bridge. That part of the railway contemplated by the association in the State of New York is already commenced, and active preparations are being made in Connecticut.

The following are some of the dimensions of the proposed bridge: Clear span, 1600 feet; length of bridge between the towers, 1665 feet; total length, including approaches, 2499 feet; height of bridge above high-water, 155 feet; height of towers above the water, 260 feet; working safe load for the railroad lines, 2400 tons; working safe load for the highways, 2880 tons; total safe load for the bridge, 5280 tons; load that would break the bridge, 25,171 tons; miles of steel wire in cables, 70,302; total weight of iron and steel in the bridge, 17,605 tons; total amount of masonry, 58,084 cubic yards; total suspended weight, 9651 tons.

There will be twenty cables, in four systems; each cable will be 14 inches in diameter. The bridge will carry at one time 32 passenger cars: it would carry safely 48,000 people and 60 locomotives, if they could be placed upon it at once; 18,000 people and 53 locomotives would fill it. From the dimensions given above, it will be seen that this bridge will be longer than any one yet built on the continent, though a span of 1610 feet is projected in the bridge undertaken to be built across the St. Lawrence at Quebec.

These figures will show the enormous strength it is proposed it shall possess. New York city and every part of the country, east and west, are interested in it, and it is to be hoped the work upon the ground will soon be entered upon vigorously.

THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

IN a previous Number of the Weekly we gave some particulars relative to the purposes of the Embassy from China which Mr. ANSON BURLINGAME heads. We give on page 376 the portraits of the personages of the Embassy.

The Embassy proper is composed of Mr. BURLINGAME and the two Chinese dignitaries who appear in the engraving seated on his right and left. These are CHIH-TAJIN and SUN-TAJIN, mandarins of the second rank in the Flowery Kingdom. They are called "Mandarins of the Peacock's Feather," from the fact that they are entitled to wear that emblem of nobility. CHIH-TAJIN is of Tartar extraction; a man of about 60 years of age, about five feet eight inches high, and has a pale and somewhat studious cast of countenance. This is increased by a pair of spectacles which his weak eyesight compels him to wear. SUN-TAJIN, who is a "true blue CHINAMAN," appears about 50 years of age, is taller and more stoutly framed than his fellow-nobleman. Both are very observant, every thing having the appearance of novelty is simultaneously inquired about and criticised with impartiality. They wear small mustaches, and all the portion of the head in front of the ears is shaved, the rest of the hair is suffered to grow long, and, being plaited tightly, falls nearly to the ground.

The attaches of the Embassy consist of J. MACLEAVY BROWN, First Secretary of Legation; Monsieur EDOUARD DE CHAMPS, Second Secretary of Legation; six native interpreters—two speaking English, two French, and two Russian—and a native physician and two writers to the Embassy.

STEADFAST.

As one entranced will sometimes gaze afar
Into the deep blue night,
At the sweet radiance of some special star
That shines supremely bright:

His look concentred—all the rest unreckt
Their glowing courses run:
Though by an imperial prize the heavens are decked,
To him there is but one.

So I look up into a glorious face,
Into a calm kind eye,
Radiant with queenly nobleness and grace.
Clear as a cloudless sky.

Not bright—as brooks mat 'ter the RELIONS roll.
But oh! so pure and deep
With fathomless serenity of soul—
Like ocean in a sleep.

There might be faces fifty times as fair,
Oh, dear-loved lady mine!
But though there were, I'd neither know nor care—
I'm blind to all but thine.

A STRANGE PATIENT.

IT was a strange house, without and within; strange in its architecture, strange in appointments, but stranger than all in its tenantry. It was equally a mystery why the house had been built and for whom; and for the eight or ten years of its existence but two persons of all the little town in whose suburbs it stood had ever entered it, and but two of its occupants had ever been known to come forth from it into the town. But the two visitors to the house had seen and heard nothing; the two who occasionally made brief business calls into the town had never spoken of the house or the mystery which surrounded it—in fact did not seem to know that such mystery existed.

The minister and the doctor of the village had been in the house; the former without, the latter by invitation; but the minister had been coldly received, and the doctor had not been allowed to penetrate beyond the reception-room. The minister had been assured, very respectfully and firmly, that his good offices were not demanded; the doctor had been asked to prescribe for some person he had never seen! In Mrs. Leigh, a Leigh, the mysterious lady of the house, had described the appearance of symptoms which it was plain to see she did not have, though she had invariably spoken of herself as the patient, so that the doctor became convinced that there was another patient in the house, and that it was he could not guess; and beyond this fact he saw only the lady area a bad—in manners and education a very superior woman—that she was surrounded by the comforts and elegances which wealth can ever procure, but evidently without any peace of mind. In fact he saw that there was some great trouble weighing down; he beheld, with many surprise, her occasional vehemence of manner, her volubility of tongue, her nervousness of hand, and the flashing of her eyes when certain subjects and symptoms were alluded to; and at length, noticing that these excitements invariably occurred when allusion was made to brain diseases, mental hallucinations, etc., Dr. Gray came to the conclusion that the mysterious and ailing patient was a maniac. She always asked his advice as if for herself; but of course the elegant, educated, vigorous-minded woman herself was not he such a patient. Another thing satisfied him that there was or had been a lunatic in the house. Mrs. Leigh frequently led the conversation to the subject of mental hallucinations, and always spoke most clearly and comprehensively and knowingly, as well as with the most feeling and energy, upon this subject. It was evident that the skeleton in the house—the skeleton in Mrs. Leigh's life—was some lunatic relation.

All this and the additional fact that a high wall and iron railing hedge surrounded the house, Dr. Gray explained, with even more detail than I have given, to his young friend and fellow-practitioner, Harvey Callender, who had come down from the great city to spend a month of the hot summer with his own and his father's friend. And on leaving it all Dr. Callender had remarked that it was certainly a very mysterious case, and suggested that he should not mind being summoned in consultation.

"And as my specialty, Doctor," he added, "is the affections of the brain, suppose you suggest it."

"But the lady never admits that she has any such patient in the house. She never alludes to such a thing."

"But you say she certainly reverts to the subject of lunacy."

"Yes. Almost every time I visit her she has something new to suggest or ask about it; and it confines many of her questions puzzle me. The fact is, Harvey, she has studied the subject much more closely than I have. Do you know she actually asked me my opinion of the case of Lady Macbeth?"

"Ah, that is a case which has puzzled many a better physician than she or you or I. It's a very remarkable case."

"I wish you could talk with her. I think you can comprehend her."

"I wish I could. The next time she talks on the subject suggest that I have made the study a specialty, and that I have had some success, and suggest an interview."

It did not need a second suggestion from the old doctor. When he mentioned the name of young Callender, the eye of the tall, stately old lady flashed with unusual interest, and she quickly intimated that she knew of him and his successes in the treatment of the insane. And then, with greater volubility and as much accuracy as Dr. Gray could have done it, she ran over a list of young Callender's published operations and their peculiarities, and showed that she was very intimate, not only with the general principles involved in the treatment of the mentally afflicted, but of numerous famous cases. She intimated her great desire to see him, and made an appointment to meet him the next day.

Dr. Callender found the tall and stately lady a thorough gentlewoman in appearance and manner. She was richly clothed in black, and had, according to Dr. Gray, bestowed great pains on her toilet. He had not conversed on general topics with her five minutes before Dr. Callender recognized that she was a very superior woman in point of education.

Mrs. Leigh was the first to allude to the subject of her patient—or her imaginary patient. It was an indirect reference to a case of Dr. Callender's reported in a German journal—a case of perverted morals, premonitory of, rather than actual insanity, in which a mother, who had formerly displayed the deepest love and devotion for her children, had suddenly become very cruel toward them, and had persistently punished them in a very terrible manner.

"It was a case in which I was much interested," she said, "for I knew its opposite—the case of children in which a mother, their mother and grandmother in the same way."

"Indeed," said Callender; "I should like to hear of that case."

"But it is you who are to tell me of your cases," she said, smiling. "I can not give you the whole of the case to-day—the cases I mentioned. I can not make out a diagnosis."

Dr. Callender then alluded to the case which she had mentioned, and which was unknown to her. Mrs. Leigh to frequent remarks on the peculiar symptoms of the case, and he listened to her with great interest. At length, with a slight laugh, she laughed heartily for a moment, and to Callender's inquiry as to the cause of her merriment, she replied:

"Oh! Doctor, I see you have made a common error in such cases."

"Indeed? In what?"

"You have treated the wrong person."

"The wrong person?"

"Yes; you have taken the testimony of the children against the mother; you have listened to their honest interest. At length, with a slight laugh, she laughed heartily for a moment, and to Callender's inquiry as to the cause of her merriment, she replied:

"Oh! Doctor, I see you have made a common error in such cases."

"Indeed? In what?"

"You have treated the wrong person."

"The wrong person?"

"Yes; you have taken the testimony of the children against the mother; you have listened to the evidence of the insane children against their mother, and have also added the testimony of triumph over filial affection. The children were insane, not the mother."

"And then, suddenly changing the subject, she continued: "You have aided in a great wrong, a foul crime! Go home to your closet and expiate it before God; then to the daughter you have so ruined."

"You have aided in a great wrong, a foul crime! Go home to your closet and expiate it before God; then to the daughter you have so ruined."

"Rather sympathetic," said Callender at length, sententiously.

"I never saw her in the least afflicted before," remarked Dr. Gray.

"Singular conduct, wasn't it?" added Callender, most thoroughly recovered. "But come, Doctor, as we can't discuss the lady's case in the house, suppose we leave our regrets and begone."

Their adieus were brief; an old woman answered the bell; and leaving them alone, which somewhat turbed the equanimity of the lady, they took their departure, and went on unhesitatingly came running after them, and on coming up to them, said that Mrs. Leigh had instructed her to say that she would be glad to see Dr. Gray at any time, but would Dr. Callender avoid the removal of an acquaintance which had already caused her much pain?

"Certainly," said Dr. Callender. "I called at the lady's request."

The discussion of Mrs. Leigh by the two physicians was not long, but they dwelt with much interest and for a long time on her patient—her imaginary patient, as Dr. Gray said.

"You think, then, there is no real patient?"

"None whatever," replied Gray.

"Except herself," suggested Callender.

"She! herself!"

"Has it never occurred to you, Doctor, that Mrs. Leigh herself may be somewhat affected?"

"No," he replied; and then, after a minute's reflection, he added:

"Oh! ridiculous, Harvey. She is as sane as you or I, and about the smartest woman in this region."

"Then perhaps it may never occur to you that she has a patient in the house?"

"No, not a patient. I have imagined that she had a skeleton in the house—probably some daughter whom she is endeavoring to hide from the world, but not a lunatic."

Callender said nothing in reply to this; but it evidently interested him, for the next day he left the Doctor to his duties, and sallied forth on an exploring tour in the direction of Mrs. Leigh's house.

Harvey Callender was something of an artist, as all physicians are. The fine old trees round the house, and the picturesque queerness of the house itself, had already enlisted it in his favor: and now the additional charm of a mystery attached thereto caused him to decide that his first sketch should be a group of venerable oaks, whose interlacing branches formed an archway through which a quaint gable-end of the house with one of its queerest windows was visible. And so he sallied forth with his sketching materials, and sketched away with tolerable diligence. This he did for several days. Still the house preserved its aspect of perfect desolation: not a sound, not a sign to tempt one into the belief that it was inhabited; not a window opened, not a shutter unclosed—all was quiet:

"A scene of mystery the spirit daunted,
That said as plain as whisper in the ear,
The place is haunted."

"Yes, if I could believe in any thing of the sort," mused Dr. Callender, "I should most decidedly affirm that the place is haunted; and all that remains is to see the ghost. There's no one living on this side of it, that's certain. A curious place it is. I must get a nearer peep."

And he strolled along toward the thick green hedge. It was impenetrable. Not a single bough would yield to his efforts, and the roots of the tough old bushes were too closely grown for his undermining. In vain he searched for some friendly weakness in the branches, but not one gave way; so he was obliged to content himself with trying to find a peep-hole through which he might examine the edifice. In this he was successful. A weary range of barred windows met his view. No sign of life; a dreamy seas of decay, of death, crept over him. But as he still gazed, he observed a motion for her that for a single moment he noticed a slight movement at one of the windows; a small portion of a shutter was drawn back, and he saw an apparition that made him start.

A face was visible for a moment, and then vanished. It appeared again, and he scarcely knew if it were a dream or a reality.

A lovely vision, with dark flashing eyes and golden brown hair, looked forth from the open face—so white that it had an almost unearthly look. It might be a spirit, who knew? There were strange, wild, and haunted houses not to be accounted for; and he watched and watched, and then finding the vision was not repeated he went home.

But promptly was the young Doctor on the spot again the next day. The apparition did not appear on that or the next occasion; but at length the same shutter was drawn back, the same lovely face peeped forth, the window opened faltblly, and a hand and then passing as if to listen, a girl of seventeen, or thereabout, sprang lightly out upon the green turf. She paced up and down a few times, then re-entering the house, the window was closed, and the shutters again barred and bolted.

"Ah! there is a patient, and her eyes are dark. What a lovely picture she would make!" thought Callender. And he returned home much earlier that afternoon than himself up and set to work at a portrait. He was not satisfied; there was a resemblance, certainly, but there was something wanting—the soul, the spirit of the original that he could not transfer to the picture.

"I must see her again."

And he set to work again and again, and the picture of the oaks progressed but slowly; for another picture was being engraven on his heart, which made all others seem tame and uninteresting.

He had found a more convenient post of observation; indeed he had found at last a comfortable place in the unfriendly hedge, through which he could easily make his way if so inclined; and he felt that, once in there, he must break through, and speak but one word, so that he might hear the voice of his patient, as he called her.

The girl was less cautious now; she seemed possessed by a sense of security, and the fear of being seen by any one seemed to have entirely passed away. One morning she came from her room to the garden, and to a small summer-house near Callender's place of concealment. She descended and gathered the flowers among the grass, lifted up her hand to pluck the hedge-roses and honey-suckle which clustered around.

There was a tempting spray close by Callender's place of concealment: she pulled the boughs aside, and a pair of bright blue eyes looked steadily at her.

She loosed the bough and gave a slight cry, but there was more of astonishment than fear in it, which emboldened Harvey Callender to part the branches himself, and to say:

"Pardon for having startled you."

The deep, clear voice evidently had some strange attraction in it for her; it was as if it brought a message to her that she had long expected; still she did not reply, but gazed wonderingly at him.

"I am sorry; I am afraid I have alarmed you."

"I am not frightened," said the little lady; "who are you?"

"A sort of artist; I have been making one skeen."

"Of what?"

"One," answered Callender, "of the oaks yonder, and also—forgive me—of yourself."

The color came into her face.

"Have you seen me often?"

"Every day since the last fortnight."

"May I see the picture?"

"It is not here. Will you let me bring it—remove it?"

"I don't know," she answered, with a sigh. "I think not. No," said she, shaking her head; "I am afraid it must not be; no."

"Why?"

"Because I think it must not. I don't exactly know why."

"Then it is not a very good reason," replied Harvey. "Yes will be a much better answer, because I shall be grieved not to show it to you."

"Shall you? I should not like to grieve any one."

"Then, may I come?"

"Ye-es," she answered, hesitatingly; "but I must go now."

She was about to depart, when suddenly she turned again and astonished Callender by asking, with much animation in her eyes and manner,

"Are you a Prince?"

"A Prince?" he replied. "No, my child: why should you think that?"

"Oh! I so hoped that you were a Prince, and had come to waken me."

"To waken you?"

"Yes. Do you not know I am asleep, like the Princess in the story, and that a handsome Prince is to come and waken me with a kiss, and I am to love him forever and to be his wife?"

"Who told you that, child?"

"I read it in the books which grandma gave me."

"Grandmother? you mean Mrs. Leigh?"

"Yes, Grandmother Leigh. Do you know her?"

"Yes. I have seen her. Is she fond of you?"

"Yes," she said, hesitatingly, "she is good to me, and gives me toys and books and nice things to eat; but she does not let me see papa and mamma, nor any one but old Fannie, the nurse."

"And where is papa and mamma?"

"Grandma Leigh says they are gone far away, and I shall not know them until the Prince comes to waken me. Oh, I wish he would come!"

"Who told you the Prince was coming?"

"I read of it in the books, and old Fannie told me that some time the Prince would come and take me, and that the spell of the wicked Godmother would be broken, and I should go with him into the beautiful world and be so happy and beloved."

"And so you shall some day, my child," said Callender, smoothing her hair and half embracing her as she was about—as indeed she appeared—but a child in years, as she evidently was in mind. "You have been cruelly wronged. How long have you been shut up in this gloomy house?"

"Ever since papa went away."

"Do you know how many years ago that was?"

Her answer revealed that she had no knowledge whatever of time.

"I was a little small thing then, so little that papa, when he said 'Good-by,' and went to sleep, lifted me in his arms, though they said he was very weak."

"And you have lived ever since with your grandmother?"

"And Fannie, too," she answered.

"And you have seen no one else?"

"How could I when I slept!"

"But you talk, and read, and play, he answered.

"Shall I?" she cried, joyfully.

"I am come to waken and restore you to life. I am sent by the Prince."

But the girl, sinking on his breast, answered only with a scream of terror, as the tall figure of Mrs. Leigh burst through the vines of the arbor and stood before them.

"Begone!" she exclaimed to Callender. "I expelled you from the front entrance, but you enter like a thief at the rear. Begone, Sir; and seek no more to disturb the brain of this afflicted child."

But Callender did not move. He only clasped more firmly the form of the poor simple girl, and stood planted between her and her grandmother.

"I will go, madam," he said at length; "but she must go with me."

"She go with you!" exclaimed Mrs. Leigh. "By what right do you demand this? Who are you that have dared break through and steal the treasure that I have for years hedged round so carefully—a heart unknowing the dark, sinful world—a heart unsullied by any love save love to its Maker? Go, I command you, go; and never darken this place again!"

But the poor girl sprang forward.

"He must go: he shall not go! Grandmother, he is my Prince, and I am to love him. I can not live without him. I can come to no harm with him, and I will go with him."

"Poor simple child! you have deceived me, and are deceived yourself; and you," she continued to Callender, "have taught her false deceit. Before she saw you she had no concealment from her old grandmother. I thought to keep her pure in body and soul for that better world whither we are journeying."

Callender looked at the speaker in astonishment. Evidently she divined the young man's thoughts.

"I am not mad," she went on, with a somewhat scornful smile; "my words are not quite so wild as you take them to be. I am an old woman, and my grandchild's scarce past the threshold of girlhood; and yet we are both on the eve of that long journey from whence there is no returning. Nay, it may be that my weary eyes will watch the departure of my young girl, ere I set out with tottering footsteps to follow in the same track. For look," she said, pointing with her thin finger toward the shrinking girl—"look, and read it on that white face—in those eyes! The canker, her family has upon her!" The girl had started forward, and now stood, with clasped hands and parted lips, gazing wildly at her grandmother.

"I am not dying! I can not die! My life has only just begun. Do not let me die. Take me away with you."

"Go," said Mrs. Leigh to Callender, this time entreatingly. "Why did you come hither to cause misery? Was it not enough that I kept aloof from those around me, and chose to lead a life of seclusion? Why need the idle world trouble itself about my affairs and trespass upon my sorrows? Oh, child! child! I thought to spare you this, and it has come upon you of itself."

"Not of itself," interrupted Mr. Leigh. "I understand what you would say. All is heaven-sent, destined, or whatever you will. It may or may not be—I deny it not. There is some measure of destiny for all; and the destiny of her family is ever use unfolded in her eyes.

The curse has worked, and will work, from generation unto generation."

"Hush, hush!" said Callender. "The curse I do indeed behold, but it is not in her eyes."

"Not in hers?"

"No; not in hers, but in yours. It is you who are accursed! You are the monomaniac!"

With a loud scream Mrs. Leigh rushed from the arbor and fled to the house. Without waiting a moment in idle thought Callender followed her, half leading, half carrying the delicate form of the young girl. In one of the halls he met the old servant, who had evidently seen her mistress, and was helpless with fright at her manner. Dr. Callender at once ordered her to go for Dr. Gray, and then, accompanied by the young girl, who clung to him helplessly, he entered the room of Mrs. Leigh.

She was lying in the middle of the floor, not insensible, but helpless and speechless. She was soon placed upon the bed, where it was found she was partially paralyzed, and unable to comprehend or answer the questions which were put to her.

"Have you any medicines here, my child?" Callender asked the question, but without hope of an intelligent reply from the young girl. He was equally surprised and gratified to hear her reply with much presence of mind,

"Oh yes! grandmother always had plenty of medicines in the house;" and running to a closet she opened it and displayed two or three shelves nicely arranged and filled with drugs of various kinds. Callender seized a vial of ether and applied his saturated handkerchief to her nostrils. He subsequently gave her a strong opiate, and by the time Dr. Gray had arrived the old lady was in a deep slumber.

She never fully recovered in either mind or body, but lingered on for years under Callender's treatment, and gradually wasted away. She never knew a lucid interval, and never explained the circumstances which had led to the imprisonment of her grand-daughter.

But the facts in the case were otherwise established, both legally and medically, and the reader more curious as to the legal and medical terms involved than to the romance embraced in this remarkable case will find it fully reported in Dutton, Mass. sta. L. 167, and in Braithwaite's Ret., XII., 243. It was established in proceedings taken by Callender to obtain the guardianship of the young girl (and principally by the influence of the old nurse Fannie), that Mrs. Leigh's mind had been affected by the marriage of her daughter in opposition to her wishes, and that subsequently her aberration developed into a confirmed monomania on the early death of little Lucy's mother. The death shortly after of her father had placed the charge of the child in the grandmother's hands, and she had begun her education by her immediate seclusion. This was eleven years previous to the incidents here recorded, and from that time until she had met Callender, Lucy Merrill had grown up in ignorance of the world. Naturally her worldly education had been greatly neglected, and she took into the hands of Dr. Callender a delicate, fragile, tender flower, but which in a short time he developed into a strong and healthy one, and which in after years, satisfied that her mind had not been dwarfed nor her affections and moral perceptions dulled by her strange imprisonment, he plucked for himself and wore on his breast for many happy years.

WHAT SPIDERS TEACH US.

WEAVERS.

NOT without some reason are spiders classed by naturalists with the Arachnida, named from Arachne, the Lydian woman who excelled in weaving. The story is that Arachne challenged Minerva to a contest in the art, and having been surpassed, hanged herself, when the goddess in pity turned her into a spider. It is not, indeed, strictly true that the web of the house spider is fabricated of a regular warp and woof, though books of natural history, all copying from one another, have so described them. The spider, having fixed the thread which is to form the outer margin or selvage of her web, draws other threads in various directions, and then fills up the interstices by running from one thread to another and connecting them by new threads until the whole has assumed the gauze-like texture which we see. Still the fabric is appropriately termed a web, and the makers of it are denominated weavers.

WIRE-MAKERS.

In manufacturing the threads for its web, the spider may be said to illustrate the process of wire-drawing. A wire owes its roundness to the fact that it has been drawn through a circular hole in a plate of steel, and its diameter or coarseness is no larger than that of the hole it was last drawn through. In the steel plate we should see regular lines of holes of gradually diminished diameter, and the wire passing through these in succession is stretched to whatever degree of fineness may be desired. If we examine a large spider we may see with the naked eye five little teat-like protuberances, or spinners, near the apex of the abdomen. These are the machinery through which, by a process more singular than that of rope-spinning, more perfect than that of wire-drawing, the thread is drawn. A magnifying-glass will show us that these spinnerets are studded with regular rows of minute bristle-like points—about a thousand to each teat—each of which is a minute tube, and emits a thread of inconceivable fineness. The analogy with wire-drawing is not complete, inasmuch as the threads do not appear to pass through holes of gradually diminishing size, yet some of the tubes are smaller than others, and the diameter of the thread is thus determined.

BRIDGE-BUILDERS.

Spiders wishing to pass from one elevated spot to another, across an intervening stream or other obstacle, do so by means of a bridge consisting of a thread emitted from their own bodies. They depend on a favoring breeze to get this thread carried across, and they may be seen under such circumstances, ascertaining which way the current sets by elevating their arms, as sailors do in a dead calm. Satisfied that the opportunity is favorable, they proceed to fix one end of their rope-bridge on the spot where they find themselves, and that is a matter so ingenious as to be worth man's imitation under similar circumstances. The thread is not attached to the wall, tree, or other object as a single fixed point, because such a thread, is separately fixed, a contrivance which gives a more secure hold. It is necessary to give the wind a point of support—something upon which it may have a purchase, as a mechanic would say—and since one end is fixed to the object, as already described, and the other is in process of issuing from the gum-bag of the spider, it would appear that the double or bend of the thread answers this purpose, and that the thread itself consists of a double line. As the line goes loose, like the cable of a ship, to take its chance of anchoring somewhere, it is necessary to test its firmness of hold before using it as a bridge, and the spider may be seen pulling at it with its first pair of legs for that purpose. The geometric spider of the garden, wishing to try the strength of the cable on which she means to hang her net, is not content with the test of pulling at with her legs, but drops herself down several feet from various points of it, swinging and bobbing with the whole weight of her body.

ENGINEERS.

The web of a geometric spider furnishes a better plan for the laying out of new cities than any which has yet been devised by human engineers. Any one who can find a distinct and complete web, unbroken, will see how beautifully regular it is, and how perfectly adapted for the quickest passage from any one point to another. The concentric rings are not circles, but polygons, and the radiating is exquisitely regular and straight.

DIVERS.

The oldest information respecting the use of the diving-bell in Europe refers to the first half of the sixteenth century, and is concerning two Greeks, who, in the presence of Charles V. and ten thousand persons, in the harbor of Barcelona, under water in a large inverted kettle, with a burning light, and rose up again without being wet." But long before Charles V.'s time, and ages before the Greeks besieged Troy, the diving water-spider was showing her silver diving-bell in our streams and ditches, without any suggestion of taking out a patent, or notion that she was doing any thing wonderful. Her abode is constructed on philosophical principles, and consists of a subaqueous yet dry apartment, in which, like a mermaid, she resides in comfort. Loose threads, stretched in various directions to the leaves of aquatic plants, form the frame-work of her chamber. Over these she spends a transparent (elastic) varnish, like liquid glass, which issues from the middle of her spinners. Next she spreads over her belly a pellicle of the same material, and ascends to the surface to entangle and carry down a supply of air. Head downward, and with her body, all but the spinners, still submerged, she diver seems to introduce the atmospheric bubble beneath the pellicle which surrounds her. Clothed in this aerial mantle, which to the spectator seems formed of resplendent quicksilver, she plunges to the bottom, and with as much dexterity as a chemist transfers gas with a gas-holder, introduces her bubble of air beneath the roof prepared for its reception. This manœuvre is ten or twelve times repeated, and when the transparent bell sufficient air to expand her apartment to its intended dimensions, she possesses an aerial edifice, an enchanted grot, where, unmoved by storms, she devours her prey at ease.

PIRATICAL SPIDERS.

Another spider, of an aquatic turn and of large size, actually builds a raft for herself, and goes sailing its prey with more facility. It is able to run freely on the water, but needs a resting-place or base of operations, and accordingly, getting together a quantity of dry leaves and other substances, gathers them together in a rough ball of about three inches in diameter, which it fastens together with slight silken cords. Keeping its station upon this ball it is wafted along the surface of the water as it comes near to some drowning insect, or some gnat just putting on its wings with a view to leave the water for the air, when it pounces on its prey, and drags it to the raft to be devoured at leisure. The raft also serves another purpose, the spider retiring under it when alarmed by any danger.

MASONS AND BUILDERS.

There is a burrowing spider which not only excavates a circular hole and lines it with a silken web, but at the entrance forms a trap-door with a hinge. One of these nests, which came from the West Indies, is described as having the door about the size of a crown-piece, and laid upon one another, and shaped so that the inner layers were the broadest, the outer being gradually less in diameter, except toward the hinge, which was about an inch long; and in consequence of all the layers being united there and prolonged into the tube, it became the thickest and strongest part of the structure. "The elasticity of the materials also gives to the hinge the remarkable peculiarity of acting like a spring, and shutting the door of the nest spontaneously. It is, besides, made to fit so accurately to the aperture, which is composed of similar concentric layers of web, that it is almost impossible to distinguish the joining by the most careful inspection. To gratify curiosity, the door has been opened and shut hundreds of times, without in the least destroying the power of the spring. When the door is shut it resembles some of the lichens, or the leathery fungi, such as polyporus versicolor, or tourer still, the upper valve of a young oyster-shell. The door of the nest, the only part seen above ground, being of a blackish-brown color, it is very difficult to discover."

These and allied species of spiders are gifted with a particular talent for building. They hollow out, when they can, a deep, they elevate walls, they build, as it were, subterranean bridges; they construct also entrances to their habitations, and these with doors which want nothing but bolts, for without any exaggeration they work upon a hinge and are fitted to a frame.

One of the trap-door spiders, which is also a mason spider, makes its habitation in a clayey kind of red earth, in which it bores a tube about three inches in depth. The walls of the tube are not left just as they are bored, but are covered with a kind of mortar sufficiently solid to be easily separated from the mass that surrounds it. If the tube is divided longitudinally, besides this mortar we see it appears to be covered with a coat of fine mortar, which is as smooth and regular as if a trowel had been passed over it. This coat is very thin and soft to the touch, but before this adroit workman lays it, she covers the coarser earthy plaster-work with some coarse web upon which she glues her silken tapestry.

AWNING MANUFACTURERS.

The Mygale, the monster bird-killing spider of Ceylon, choosing the hollow of a tree or a hole in the wall of a neglected building, lines it with a tapestry of silk of a tubular form, and of a texture so exquisitely fine and so closely woven that no moisture can penetrate it. The extremity of the tube is carried out to the entrance, where it expands into a little platform, stayed by braces to the main tube, and appears to afford a firm hold. In particular situations, where the entrance is exposed to the wind, the Mygale, on the approach of a storm, extends the strong tissue and leaves it so as to serve as an awning to prevent the access of rain.

AERONAUTS.

Spiders deliberately plan aerial excursions. After gaining the summits of blades of grass, rails, gates, etc., and straightening their limbs, to be on tiptoe, as it were, they elevate the abdomen, that their silken thread may be carried up by the scarcely perceptible current. Then all is drawn out and up into fine lines of several feet in length, the spiders, feeling themselves acted upon with sufficient force in that direction, quit their hold of the objects on which they stand, and commence their journey in free air. On a fine calm day, with plenty of gossamer, the work of spiders in the fields, are often carried into the air, from whence they descend again when the gentle agency of the breeze ceases. Juvenile spiders of light weight sometimes get a balloon voyage in this way.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE OLDEST CUP OF RECORD—The bic-cup.

CATCHY NAMES.—An astute member of the legal profession, having to choose old documents requisitory, so far forgot himself as to mistake the "will" for the "deed."

Matrimony is hot buckwheat cakes, warm bath, comfortable slippers, smoking coffee, round arms, red lips, kind words, warm knitting in furious, redeemed stockings, boot-jacks, happiness, etc. Hurrah!

An Italian ink-keeper confessed to a priest, who asked him if he never greased the teeth of his guests' horses to prevent their eating. He replied that he had never done so. The next time he confessed that he had committed the act several times. "Why," said the priest, "you told me last time that you had never done it." "Holy father," replied the ink-keeper, "I did not know the trick then."

I was sitting beside
My darling bride,
One still sentimental day;
"How," said I,
"But to make you cry,
And I'll ask the bright tears away!"

Fair Cecily blush'd,
Her voice grew hush'd,
I thought she would cry to be sure;
But she kiss'd me,
Pouting prettily,
"Prevention is better than cure!"

An eminent painter, on being asked what he mixed his colors with to give so fine a color, answered, "I mix them with brains, Sir."

A man out West, who offered bail for a friend, was asked by the judge if he had any incumbrance on his farm. "Oh, yes," said he, "my old woman."

A sailor, exhorting at a prayer-meeting in London Chapel, said that he dark'ened duty by that beautiful sea, he had often been comforted by the heart-felt passage of Scripture, "A fool, heart never won fair lady."

MAXIMS FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Don't scream when you are frightened.

A narrowness of waist shows a narrowness of mind, as a fine silk ball shows no turning.

Practice on the piano makes perfect.

An old maid is like cold hash—no one without a fellow.

The true test of a man's temper is to keep him waiting ten minutes for his dinner.

Never faint in the house alone. Always select some good opportunity—or young man. The more persons there are about you, the more successful will be your fit. A woman should not only faint well, but be above suspicion.

The hand that can make a pie is a cautional feast to the husband that marries it.

Dreams are the novels that we read when we are fast asleep.

Eyes are the electric telegraph of the heart that will send a message any distance in a language only known to the two souls who correspond.

SLIGHT-OF-HAND PERFORMANCE.—The girl who rejects an offer of marriage.

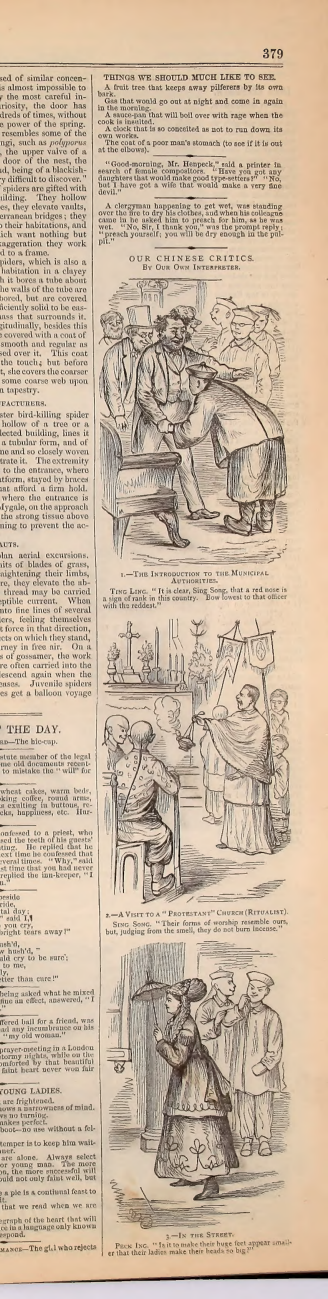
THINGS WE SHOULD MUCH LIKE TO SEE.

A fruit tree that keeps away pilferers by its own barks.

Gas that would go out at night and come in again in the morning.

A sauce-pan that will boil over with rage when the cook is insulted.

A clock that is so conceited as not to run down its own works.



The coat of a poor man's stomach (to see if it is out at the elbows).

"Good-morning, Mr. Henpeck," said a printer in search of female compositors. "Have you got any daughters that would make good type-setters?" "No, but I have got a wife that would make a very fine devil."

A clergyman happening to get wet, was standing over the fire to dry his clothes, and when his colleague came to be asked him to preach for him, as he was wet. "No, Sir, I thank you," was the prompt reply; "preach yourself; you will be dry enough in the pulpit."

OUR CHINESE CRITICS.

BY OUR OWN INTERPRETER.

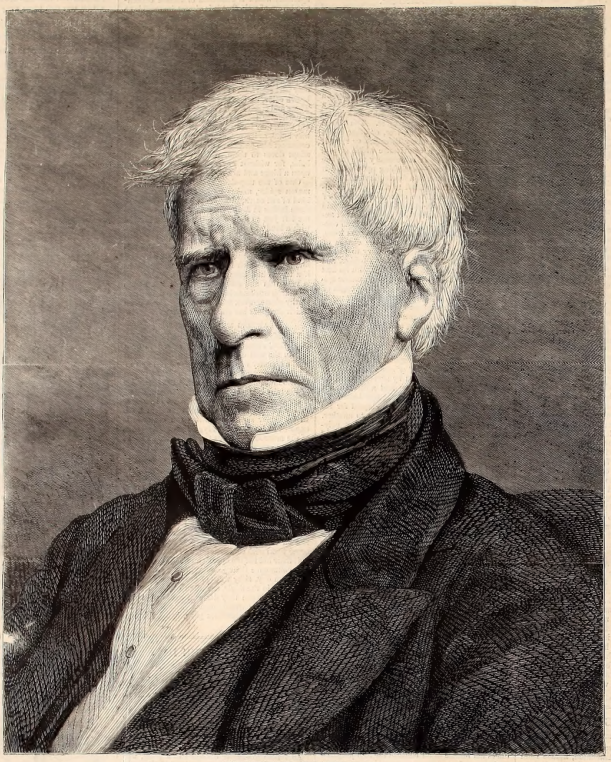
1.—THE INTRODUCTION TO THE MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES.

TING LEE. "It is clear, Sing Song, that a red nose is a sign of rank in this country. How lowest is that citizen with the reddest."

2.—A VISIT TO A "PROTESTANT" CHURCH (RITUALIST).

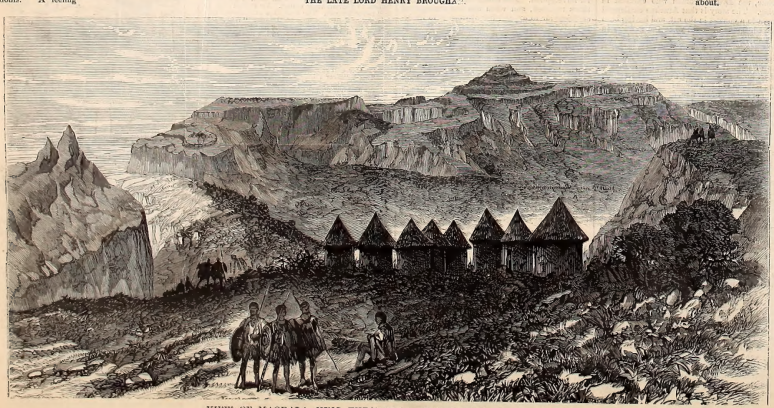
SING SONG. "These forms of worship resemble ours, but, judging from the smell, they do not burn incense."

3.—IN THE STREET.



PEEK ING. "Tell it to me, Ching Foo, my feet appear smaller than their ladies, since their heads to big?"

LORD BROUGHAM.



HENRY BROUGHAM, who has just died, and of whom we give an admirable portrait on this page, began his political and literary career simultaneously with PALMERSTON, JEFFREY, and SYDNEY SMITH, and has survived them all. Not only that, but he has survived the old social and political wrongs which, in conjunction with or in opposition to those famous men, he so vigorously fought. His first practical efforts had for their object the abolition of slavery in the English colonies; he lived to see abolition accomplished in every civilized country, and the work of universal abolition fairly begun. He began early in life a crusade against the practice of flogging in the British army, but met with little encouragement. It is a little remarkable, as showing the bitter feeling of the age, that among the first legal cases of Lord BROUGHAM was the defense of JOHN and LEIGH HUNT for saying in their paper, the Examiner, while reflecting on an army flogging affair, that their "enemy BONAPARTE knew better than to ill-treat his own soldiers in that manner." This, in 1809, was deemed a libel on the Government, and the poet and his brother were prosecuted for sedition in "reflecting on the rule of His Majesty, King GEORGE III." BROUGHAM succeeded in defeating the prosecution, and it was abandoned.

Lord BROUGHAM, it will be remembered by many, was the counsel of Queen CAROLINE in the famous and scandalous divorce suit with GEORGE IV. It is not so well known, however, that his retention as such originally grew out of the defense of the brothers HUNT. It was in another case, however. The HUNTS had satirized GEORGE IV. while Prince of Wales and Prince Regent by calling him "a fat Adonis." A feeling of downright personal animosity to BROUGHAM is said to have been excited by his speech on this occasion in the mind of the Prince. BROUGHAM cherished a no less hearty detestation for the Royal profligate, which was so loudly proclaimed that it led to his being chosen the confidential legal adviser of the Princess of Wales, then already separated from her husband. When GEORGE III. died CAROLINE went to London to assert her rights at the coronation of her husband; these the King denied, and then began the suit for divorce on the charges of adultery. The disgusting trial is a matter of history. Only BROUGHAM seems to have got any credit out of it; and this reputation seems to have been transitory; for it is already questioned by the English papers whether he would not have made more by effecting a compromise, which would have saved the nation the disgrace of such scandalous proceedings and disgusting exposures.

Lord BROUGHAM was most earnestly and usefully employed for many years of his life in the work of extending education among the working-classes; and the amendment of the common-law and judicial administration. He was instrumental, more than any other single man, in the formation of the present prosperous Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, the origination of the schools and mechanics' institutes of the present time, the starting of the famous Penny Magazine, and the creation of the London University. BROUGHAM goes down to history remembered rather as a law and social reformer, the friend of popular education, and the enemy of slavery, than as a violent and partisan politician and lawyer; and this brighter phase of his character is what posterity will best love to look upon and read about.

THE LATE LORD HENRY BROUGHAM.

VIEW OF MAGDALA, KING THEODORE'S STRONG-HOLD.—[SEE PAGE 375.]

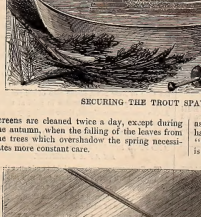
A NEW JERSEY FISH FARM.

THE application of science to the artificial propagation and cultivation of fishes has long been recognized as an art. Although it is of no recent date, having been practiced by JACOBI at Hanover over a century since, it has but recently received the attention which it deserves. The rediscovery of the process of artificial impregnation of ova by the Vosgean fishermen, GEHIN and REMY, and the founding of the great National French Fish Farm at Huningue, on the Rhine, have resulted in the foundation in Europe of a vast number of fish-breeding establishments; but in this country the subject is only beginning to receive the attention and legislation which it demands. A description of one of the fish farms of this country, that of Mr. SETH GREEN, situated near Culedonia, New York, was given in Harper's Magazine for December, 1867. On this page of the Weekly we present a series of illustrations representing a general view (with some details of the hatching process as there practiced) of the fish farm of DR. J. H. SLACK, at Troutdale, near Bloomsbury, New Jersey, sixty-four miles southwest of New York city. The farm, comprising about sixty-eight acres, is in a high state of cultivation, as is the whole of the Musknanetkony Valley, in which it is situated; the well-kept fences and neat buildings, those never-failing signs of industry, bearing witness to the prosperity of the residents.

THE TROUTDALE SPRING.

THE SPRING.

The artificially-constructed ponds and buildings connected with fish raising, covering in all about two acres, are situated on the right bank of the Musknanetkony Creek, which here forms the boundary between the counties of Warren and Hunterdon; the former being upon the right, the latter upon the left of the stream. These ponds are supplied with a pure crystal water from a large and beautiful spring, from which it flows in a continual stream at the rate of 1000 gallons per minute. This water is, in summer and winter, of the same temperature, 50° Fahrenheit, and reaches the hatching-house and ponds at the same temperature. This is a matter of the greatest importance in fish hatching. In the spring there are about two hundred small trout, naturally bred. From the spring the water is led by a race-way to and circulated through the three ponds and hatching-house. At various points gates or sluices are located, furnished with wire screens, which serve the double purpose of preventing the escape of the fishes and of collecting leaves, sticks, or other articles which may accidentally find their way into the ponds. These screens are cleaned twice a day, except during the autumn, when the falling of the leaves from the trees which overshadow the spring necessitates more constant care.



THE PONDS.

The ponds at present contain about seven hundred adult trout, with a few hatched during the winter of 1866–67 by Mr. THADDEUS NORRIS, the well-known angler and former proprietor of the ponds. Some of the fishes are marked by striking peculiarities, and have received distinguishing names. One is known as "Bartimeus," from the fact that he is totally blind, and perfectly black in color; "Lady Douglas" has one side of her head of the same sombre hue. A long, lean, lantern-jawed male is appropriately yclept "Don Quixote;" while a huge three-pounder, who fought it out on the line during the entire spawning season, killing and devouring over a dozen large fishes, is called "General Grant." There was formerly in the large pond a curious parti-colored fish, with irregular spots and streaks of white and black, the colors varying almost weekly, who was known to some of the numerous Democrats in the vicinity as "Horace Greeley;" but he is now no more, having been unfortunately killed and eaten by "General Grant" in December last. The trout is a sad cannibal; "the dog," it is said, "will not eat dog;" but a trout of but one and a half inches will unhesitatingly seize and devour one of his own species two-thirds his own length. Various fishes over a foot long have disappeared from time to time down the capacious throat of "General Grant." On this account three ponds are necessary. The one nearest the hatching-house is now being prepared for the reception of the twenty thousand young trout hatched at Troutdale during the past winter; the middle one is devoted to trout of eight inches and under, while in the third are placed the larger fishes, many of them of a size calculated to cause a lover of "the gentle craft" to indulge upon the Tenth Commandment. The bottoms of the ponds are of clay, upon which have been placed a number of large stones, in order that the trout, by rubbing against them, may free their bodies from the numerous parasites, animal and vegetable, which frequently infest them. Shade is afforded by large floats, secured to the banks by wires. The races are slated, to prevent the crumbling of the banks, their bottoms being covered with small stones, upon which is placed a layer of fine gravel, though the latter is not plentiful in the vicinity.

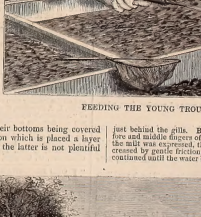


Fig. 1, One week old.—Fig. 2, Three months old.—Fig. 3, Six months old.—Fig. 4, One year old.

THE TROUT AT VARIOUS AGES.

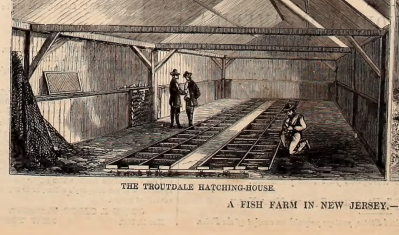
SECURING THE TROUT SPAWN.

FEEDING THE YOUNG TROUT.

THE HATCHING-HOUSE

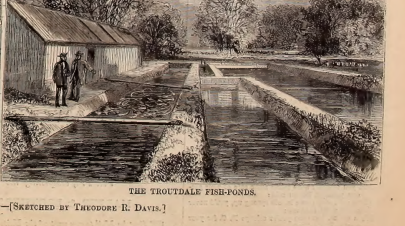
is situated upon the right bank of the first pond, and a neat lodge to the westward is occupied as a residence by the assistants.

FEEDING.



The large trout are fed with curd, the offal from slaughter-houses out in fine pieces, and fishes, the latter sometimes living. During our visit two living red-fins about four inches in length (Leuciscus cornutus) were thrown into the pond; they were immediately seized by two huge trout, who at once retired to the lower end of the pond, there to swallow and digest them at their leisure. The gullets of the captors being shorter than their prey, over an hour elapsed before the tails of the red-fins vanished down the throats of the trout.

DR. SLACK'S EXPERIENCE.



DR. SLACK is a thorough lover of the art and the craft, and as he is also a thoroughly-educated naturalist, his experiences and experiments in the artificial hatching of trout ova has a double value and increased interest, and we append it hereto, partly in explanation of some of our illustrations of the process of taking and hatching the eggs.

"About the middle of the month of October, 1857, it became evident that the spawning season was at hand. The colors of the adult fishes began to alter to an extent noticeable by the most unpractised eye. Losing the bright tints with which they were formerly bedecked, the female trout became dark and sombre in color, putting on a grave and matronly dress. The hues of the males were, on the contrary, more brilliant than previously. Their general color became much lighter, and in the oldest individuals the lower jaw projected outwardly, forming a sort of knob. The distension of the abdomen of the females by the eggs caused the section of her body to assume an oval shape, while that of the male resembled the outline of the eye of a hoop-snake. Fierce battles took place between the males, the conqueror celebrating his victory by scouring upon the body of the vanquished; the females swam unmolested about the ponds, trying the bottom with their fins, seeking for gravel in which to deposit their eggs. The bottoms of the ponds being formed of clay and large stones, they were obliged to pass into the races for that purpose. These had previously been prepared by covering their bottoms with fine gravel and placing across them the stretchers, forming a series of dams and eddies.

"On October 20 fishes were perceived in the race busily engaged in forming a nest for the reception of their eggs by removing the fine gravel from a circle of about a foot in diameter. Across the lower end of the raceway a net was quietly placed, and the gates at the race-head closed, by which the flow of water was stopped. To prevent being too high and dry, the fishes were obliged to pass down stream, and were thus captured in the net. The fishes being placed for the nonce in a large tin article, about a quart of pure spring water was placed in the impregnating pan: a male was then taken, and held in the manner depicted in the engraving, the left hand grasping the neck below the gills, and the right the body just behind the gills. By gentle pressure with the fore and middle fingers of the left hand a quantity of the milt was expressed, the amount being further increased by gentle friction toward the tail. This was continued until the water became opalescent or pearly in its appearance. A female was then taken and treated in precisely the same manner, eggs instead of salt being extruded. The eggs and milt were allowed to remain in contact for about fifteen minutes, at the expiration of which time they were carefully washed. It has been ascertained by experiment that fifteen grains of the milky fluid of the male is sufficient to impregnate ten thousand eggs; but in practice a much greater quantity is used. The bottom of the hatching-tub, as shown in the same drawing, having a depression calculated to hold one thousand eggs, the quantity obtained could be readily estimated. The eggs require a depth of an inch in diameter, and weigh one grain each.

THE TROUTDALE HATCHING-HOUSE.

THE TROUTDALE FISH-PONDS.

A FISH FARM IN NEW JERSEY.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

"After the male secured the eggs were taken to the hatching-house, which had been made ready for their reception in the following manner: The hatching-trough had been filled to the depth of two inches with fine gravel carefully boiled to destroy the eggs of any insects which might have been present; over this a gentle stream of water from the spring, filtered through four screens of fine flannel, was conducted. Upon the gravel the eggs were placed, the greatest care having been taken to avoid any sudden jar, as the recently impregnated eggs require the most gentle handling, lest if suddenly acquired life be as suddenly extinguished. After resting in their new location for a few minutes they were evenly spread over the bottoms of the troughs by means of a feather. During the whole of the process the eggs had not for an instant been exposed to the atmosphere.

"This process of impregnating and depositing in the hatching-troughs was repeated semi-daily until January 12, 1868, during which period about seventy-five thousand eggs were taken. Experience shows that from a tront of one pound about one thousand eggs is the average yield. The eggs were taken entirely under the control of the proprietor, only twenty thousand hatched. The eggs were not injured during this time, readily distinguished by turning snow white, those still retaining their vitality resembled small pearls, being translucent and slightly clouded. The first young appeared December 16, forty days after the impregnation of the eggs.

"When first hatched, the young presented the grotesque appearance shown in the smaller figure of the cut of the trout. They possess a globular sensual appendage, technically termed the 'yolk sack,' is, however, gradually absorbed into the body of the young fish, the entire process requiring six weeks for its completion.

"During the hatching-period no care is required beyond feeding nourished entirely by the contents of the 'yolk sack.' The nourishment of the yolk is absorbing in the ovary that they should be regularly and carefully fed. Various substances, all of an animal nature, have been tried, but after various experiments Dr. SLACK has found the moderate diet consisting the interior of beef cattle to be the most suitable. This is prepared by being chopped into minute fragments, which are passed through a fine wire-sieve. When the fishes have attained the size of one and a half inches the eggs of other fish are employed as food. When placed in the first pond they will be very entirely for want of eggs, maggots, the larvæ of the common blue-bottle fly. The appearance of these, disgusting, though the plentifulness usually their animals, are regarded as fitting the period at which the transfer from the hatching-house to the pond should take place."

Troutdale, as we have stated, is easy of access from the city of New York, and a visit to the ponds would amply repay any one interested in the art or science of pisciculture.

It is a pity that the species of the fish farmers to furnish in season impregnated trout-eggs, either for the stocking of ponds or of scientific observation and research. They can be carefully packed and forwarded by express to any point with full directions or under the care of a competent person. By means of a small apparatus invented by Dr. SLACK, which can be placed in an office or library, the spawn can be hatched without the necessity for a hatching-house. This apparatus is not unlike the squarium in common use in our parlors, and requires very little more attention, though the work of "manufacturing trout" at home would furnish far more interesting employment. Boxes more squarium, and at the same time be not less pleasant to look upon.

DAVIE CARR.

Are you asleep, little Davie? I've slipped away from the gloom;
It was, oh, so dreary to play in the lonely, darkened school-room:
The blinds are all pulled down, and our books are upon the desk;
But I don't care for holidays, Davie, when I've no one to play with.

You are fast asleep, little cot; so I won't disturb you, but croon
So softly it will not awake you, but seem like a bit of a tune
You are listening to in your dreams, as you lie there so pale and still,
Your pretty red color is gone: I wonder, dear, when it will Come back: but you've lain so long in that wearisome bed, I suppose

It will hardly come back before the time of the bright June roses.

When the angels that love the flowers come, little Davie, to see
The close-folded petals, maybe they'll touch your little white cheek,

I think they have got a secret they don't want to tell me yet,
For I heard old Nursey whisper to Aunty: "When shall we tell

Miss Nesta know?" and Aunt Mary said nothing, but turned her head.
But when you're up, Davie, they'll find we are sharp enough for them all.

I'm tired of holidays, Davie: I'd like to do lessons again,
But Aunty looked just as you know she looks when her brow is in pain.

When I offered to bring my books, and said: "Little Nesta, dear, Never mind books just now: you may go to your dolls and play,"

And when she went out just now with that grieved look upon her face
(I wasn't naughty to bring it there, Davie), I stole from the place,

And I left Miss Doll on the floor in her grand new frock that I've made:
I'll show it you when you awake, but that won't be yet, I've afraid.

I've minded your toys for you, Davie; your little pet bird I have fed;
And you couldn't have taken more care of your garden yourself, Robert said:

There are fanny grass letters sprung up, you'd never guess what they are:
It's a secret, but then you're asleep: D. C. for your name—Davie Carr.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN. The only genuine Remedy for Oldridge Blemish Eradications on the face is PERRY'S MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. $2ᵐ Sold every where.

FOR BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the FACE, use PERRY'S COMEDON AND PIMPLE REMOVE. Order from Druggists, or Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS & CO., No. 481 Broadway, will dispose of 15 new and 10 second-hand PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of five first-class makers, and take from $5 to $15 monthly until paid. This will be an opportunity for those who wish to buy a large number of Pianos returned the last of May. Also, 60 new and second-hand instruments for rent, and rent allowed if purchased, or for sale at bargains for cash.

S. T.—1860.—X.

WHENEVER I TAKE MY WALKS ABROAD, how many poor, miserable, Dyspeptic people I see, who would be healthy, and rosy, and happy, if they took Plantation Bitters, that paragon of preparations for giving tone to the stomach, energy to the blood, life, and vigor to the nervous system, and strength to the muscles. It is an admirable regenerator of nature's wasted or neglected functional powers in either man or woman. It gently excites the slumbering liver, and, like a bolt to the thereof, every man may be his own physician.

MAGNOLIA WATER—A delightful toilet article—superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

THE MASKED BALL, and other tales; Useful Knowledge; Poetry; Anecdotes; Diseases, Blemishes, etc., etc., will be found in "MAPLE LEAVES" for June. Only 20 cents a year. Send subscriptions to O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau Street, New York.

WORKINGMEN'S NATIONAL BROTHERHOOD. Every female operative organization selected in reference of 100,000 dollars' worth of property within five years, with remunerative employment from the business. For full particulars, address A. T. PECK, Corresponding Secretary Pratt's Hollow, Dutchess County.

CARINA COLLEGENSIA:

A Complete Collection of the Songs of the American Colleges, with Piano-forte Accompaniment, to which is added a Compendium of COLLEGE SLANG. Collected and Edited by H. R. WAITE. This volume contains the Songs of Twenty-one Colleges, selected in reference to quality, permanency, and general interest, and is the largest collection of Students' Songs in print. Price: In Cloth, emblematically embossed, $2 25; Extra Gilt Edges, $2 50. Mailed, prepaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 277 Washington St., Boston. CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, N. Y.

THE GREAT MYSTERY. Fourteen Improved "PLANCHETTE." This wonderful and amusing automaton, interesting both old and young, sent by express; price $2 50. Agents and trade supplied on liberal terms. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—"MEN OF OUR DAY," a new and great illustrated work—complete; authentic; complete to one attractive volume, and only work ever issued to now ready. Also, a Military History of Peter Van Cortlandt (the well-known Mexican and Indian fighter), and all the leading men of the nation (A. J. excepted), by Dr. L. P. Brockett, the popular Biographical Editor of "Appleton's Cyclopedia." $2ᵐ Be sure the book you get contains over 600 pages, over 300 engravings, and 42 fine steel portraits, at a less price than is charged for smaller and inferior works that can make no claim to completeness. Send for Circular. ZIEGLER, MCCURDY, & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia, Pa.; Cincinnati, O.; Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo.

LORD BROUGHAM; ABBOT LAWRENCE; ZADOC PRATT; MRS. L. A. HUTCHINS of Peter Van Cortlandt; Verdi the Composer; Bishop McCloskey; a group of Beautiful Women, in July No. of PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Only 30c., or $3 a year. In clubs of 10, six months on trial, $1. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

They've cut off your nice little curls; 'twas a pity, I think; but you're You'll be just as happy without them; they won't get tangled, you see.
Your hands were brown when you sickened, and now they are just as white
As Aunty's; and how did you keep the bed-clothes so tidy all night?

You are sleeping a long while, Davie. Oh, dear, I'm afraid if I stay
Any longer, they'll find me here; so I think I will go away.
If I kiss you I may awake you; so good-by: make haste to get well,
I am, oh, so lonely without you, more lonely than I can tell.

BURNETT'S KALLISTON removes Tan and Freckles, and imparts a velvety softness to the skin.

BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS are unlike any others, and they are called the best.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE is unrivalled in richness and delicacy.—Baltimore American.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN, MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN, and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."

Renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.

This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been established 25 years.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance. For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"

for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PHALON & SON, 327 Broadway, N. Y.

OROIDE Gold Watch Co., 78 Nassau St., express superb Watches, $10 each, C.O.D., warranted.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 569 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the only licensed reliable Machines. Examine different styles, or send stamp for Circular to Depot, 569 Broadway.

GENUINE BARTLETT SEWING MACHINES are now perfected. Genuine machines bearing the trade-mark and signature of J. W. BARTLETT, the Patentee, from the Depot, 569 Broadway, New York City. $2ᵐ Beware of bogus Machines and Agents. ☞

PAT. ERASER

Burnisher, Pencil Sharpener, Paper Cutter, and Pen Holder combined. Sent by mail. Agents wanted. Can make $10 a day. Samples sent by mail for 30c. Or two sizes for 60c. Address, MORSE ERASER CO., 404 Library Street, Philadelphia.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in the Aluminum. The Improved Aluminum Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its color and resemblance to Gold are such that even Judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $20. Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of CLOCKS, also Aluminum Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN, 62 Nassau Street, New York.

GRANT!—AGENTS WANTED throughout the United States to canvass for the only reliable and standard PICTURE LIFE OF GEN. GRANT. For particulars, address FARRONIUS, GURNEY, & SON, 707 Broadway, New York.

CHEAP EDITION
OF
QUEEN VICTORIA'S BOOKS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,
Have just Published:

THE EARLY YEARS OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CONSORT. Compiled, under the direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey. Two Portraits.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are appended and added Extracts from the same Journal, giving an account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Engravings. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS.

CHEAP EDITION. 12mo, Paper. 25 CENTS EACH.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Completion Under Helps's Spanish Conquest.

THE SPANISH CONQUEST IN AMERICA,
AND ITS RELATION TO THE HISTORY OF SLAVERY
AND TO
THE GOVERNMENT OF COLONIES.
By ARTHUR HELPS.

Four Vols., 12mo, Cloth. Price, $1 50 per vol.

Vol. IV., completing the work, has just been published.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail to any part of the United States, postage prepaid, on receipt of the Price.

600 MILES
OF THE
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD

Are now finished and in operation. Sixty miles of track have been laid this spring, and the work along the whole line between the Atlantic and Pacific States is being pushed forward more rapidly than ever before. More than twenty thousand men are employed, and it is not impossible that the entire track, from Omaha to Sacramento, will be finished in 1869 instead of 1870. The means provided are ample, and all that energy, men, and money can do to secure the completion of the

GREAT NATIONAL WORK,

at the earliest possible day, will be done.

The UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY receive:

I.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of the right of way, and all necessary timber and other materials found along the line of its operations.

II.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of 12,800 acres of land to the mile, coterminous with alternate sections on each side of its road. This is an absolute donation, and will be a source of large revenue in the future.

III.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of United States Thirty-year Bonds, amounting to from $16,000 to $48,000 per mile, according to the difficulties to be surmounted on the various sections to be built. The government takes a second mortgage as security, and it is expected that not only the interest but the principal of the bonds will be paid in services rendered by the company in transporting troops, mails, &c. The interest is now made more than paid in this way, besides securing a great saving in time and money to the government.

IV.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of the right to issue its own FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS, to aid in building the road, to the same amount as the U. S. Bonds, issued for the same purpose, and no more. The Government has appointed the Trustees for the First Mortgage Bondholders to deliver the Bonds to the company only as the road is completed, and after it has been examined by United States Commissioners and pronounced to be in all respects a first-class railroad, laid with a heavy T rail, and completely supplied with depots, stations, turnouts, carshops, locomotives, cars, &c.

V.—A CAPITAL STOCK SUBSCRIPTION from the stockholders, of which one Fifty Million Dollars have been paid in upon the work already done, and which will be increased as the wants of the company require.

VI.—NET EARNINGS on its Way Business, that already amount to more than TEN INTEREST on the First Mortgage Bonds. These earnings are no indication of the vast business that must follow the opening of the line to the Pacific, but they certainly prove that upon such a property, costing nearly three times their amount,

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

Are Secure beyond any Contingency.

The Company have abundant means in their treasury, and the Government to appeal to the public to purchase their Bonds, as the daily subscriptions are entirely satisfactory; but they submit that, for unsettled security and liberal returns, there is certainly no better investment in the market.

The Union Pacific Bonds are for $1000 each, and have interest attached. They have thirty years to run, and bear annual interest, payable on the first days of January and July, at the company's office in the City of New York, at the rate of six per cent. in gold. The principal is payable in gold at maturity. At the present rate of gold, these Bonds pay an annual income on the

NEARLY NINE PER CENT,

AND IT IS BELIEVED THAT THEY MAY SOON BE AT A PREMIUM.

The Company reserve the right to advance the price to a rate above par, and at any time will not fill any orders or receive any subscriptions on which the money has not been actually paid at the Company's office before the time of such advance.

Parties subscribing will remit the par value of the bonds and the accrued interest in currency at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the date on which the last coupon was paid. Subscriptions will be received in NEW YORK

AT THE COMPANY'S OFFICE,
No. 20 NASSAU ST.,

AND BY JOHN J. CISCO & SON, BANKERS,
No. 59 WALL ST.,

And by the Company's advertised Agents throughout the United States.

Remittances should be made in Drafts or other funds payable in New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local agents, will look to them for their safe delivery.

A PAMPHLET AND MAP FOR 1868 has just been published by the company, giving fuller information than is possible in an advertisement respecting the Progress of the Work, the Resources of the Country traversed by the Road, the Means for Construction, and the Value of the Bonds, which will be sent free on application at the company's offices, or to any of the advertised agents.

JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer,
May 25, 1868. NEW YORK.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as if buying to sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show:

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green) JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

GRAIN (uncoated), 75c., 80c., 85c.; best, 95c. per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by buying our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give entire satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GRAIN (uncoated), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars will better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we shall make a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we aim to be liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouse.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they do not satisfactorily they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third, besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

BEWARE OF PERSONS that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are IMPOSTORS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5,643, New York City.

A GENTS WANTED—FOR THE best and most reliable LIFE OF GRANT, by Hon. J. T. Headley. Now ready. In one handsome Vol. $2.50. Also just issued THE NATIONAL HAND-BOOK. Facts and Figures from the foundation of the Government to the present time. 458 pages $1 50. Sent Post paid. J. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.

Lots of Colfax given to every subscriber to the Life of Grant from this date, June 1, 1868.

BOOSEY'S

CHEAP MUSIC

Parlor Piano-Forte Music. In Books, Fifty Cents Each.

Bealey Richardson's Dream . . . . . 50c.
Fantasina . . . . . 50c.
Schumann's Twenty-two Pieces . . . . . 50c.
Lerbuch's Six Popular Fantasias . . . . . 50c.
Kuhe's Eight Fantasias . . . . . 50c.
Brame's Seven New Waltzes, etc. . . . . 50c.
Mendelssohn's Wedding March and Midsummer Night's Dream, complete . . . . . 50c.

Mailed on receipt of price. Catalogues of cheap musical publications on application.

BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, New York.

EMPLOYMENT. $15 60 to $30 00 a day guaranteed. Male or Female Agents wanted in every town—Descriptive Circulars free. Address JAMES C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an excellent Segar. Sample box of 100, beautifully labelled, will be sent to any address on receipt of 26 cents, by W. HEBBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

Selpho's Patent are the best. They are light, strong, and durable—have stood the longest test of any, and contain less pieces to get out of order. Pamphlets free. Address SELPHO & SON, 516 Broadway, New York.

EUCHMO'S Wealth," Franklin. Why will people go to pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when they can buy a better one for all practical purposes? Nevertheless, to inform their numerous friends that the "FRANKLIN" and "DIAMOND" Machines can be had in any quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Tucker, constructed upon entirely new principles, and DOES NOT RIP before upon or other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of persons will testify. EF AGENTS WANT-ED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and given away to families who are needy and deserving. Address

J. C. OTTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIODE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIODE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These cases are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the finest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. Each watch is accompanied by a written warranty, and is warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price of Gentlemen's, or small size, only one Ladies' size, $20. A splendid watch, of excellent style and appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one. Sent to any part of the United States by express. Money must be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. P. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

EF TO CLUBS.—WHEN SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

EF CAUTION.—Since our Oriode Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many parties have offered worthless imitations for sale, representing them to be Oriode Watches. In the instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that the genuine Oriode Watches are only obtained by ordering directly from us. These representations are false. The genuine Oriode Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

"TRY IT."—A $3 Magazine, in clubs of 10, sent half a year, "on trial," for $10, or only $1 each! THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, New York, begins with July No. S. R. WELLS, 389 Bdway, N.Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it. Any one can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of type, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 40 cents.

DAVID WATSON, Agt., Adams Press Co.,
96 Columbia street, New York.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made: 1 Day Patents granted.

MARTINGALE RINGS, $18 and $20 single gross.
SHEET BUTTONS, two, white, blue $8 per gross.
BILLIARD BALLS, $9 and $10 per set.
CHESS, $8, $10, and $12 per box.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $18 to $30 per gross lots.
WM. M. WELLING, 571 Broadway, New York.

THE NEW $1 WATCH.—The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, handsome in appearance, crystal, white dial, steel and metal works, watch size, good order; sent by mail, postage paid, for $1. Warranted two years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Sent by mail for $1 25. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

"YOUNG MEN" who seek personal Improvement and Self-Culture, should send 25 cents for a sample copy of "like to do something." PARENTS, Teachers, and others who have the EDUCATION OF YOUNG PEOPLE in charge, six months, in clubs of 10, "on trial," at $1 each. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED.

OLIVER OPTIC'S DIKES AND DITCHES;

OR,

Young America in Holland and Belgium.

16mo. Illustrated by THOS. NAST. $1 50.

OUTWARD BOUND: or, YOUNG AMERICA AFLOAT. SHAMROCK AND THISTLE; or, YOUNG AMERICA ABROAD. GOOD TIMES; or, YOUNG AMERICA IN ENGLAND AND RED CROSS; or, YOUNG AMERICA IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers, and sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers,
No. 149 Washington St., Boston.

A positive remedy for all kinds of Humor, Scrofula, Mercury, Salt Rheum, Rheumatism, Boils, Felon, Tetter, Scarlet, Ulcers, and all Obstinate Affections of the Skin; Mercurial Diseases and every Taint of the System. Dyspepsia, and those diseases originating in the Derangement of the Digestive Organs, viz.: Bilious Complaints, Neuralgia, Nervous Affections, Headache, Languor, Loss of Appetite, Dizziness, Costiveness, and Low Spirits. Prepared at the NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT, under the supervision of GEO. W. SWETT, M.D., Boston, Mass.

"HUSBANDS AND WIVES" may learn something to their advantage by reading the PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3 a year, or, in clubs of 10, "on trial," from July to January, at $1 each. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

1841. S. DAVIS, JR.'S

Celebrated DIAMOND HAMS,

Cincinnati. Sold by leading Grocers in their cities. READ & ROUNDEY, Cor. Beaver and New Sts., N.Y.

Nature is the Great Physician.

This is now admitted, by the medical profession, as a fundamental principle of healing science. It is wisely provided by the human economy that whenever any thing is wrong in the physical system the natural forces of the system are brought to bear to expel the disease. The great aim, therefore, is to strengthen the natural powers. This has been kept in view by the proprietors and compounders of which operates to give fresh vitality to all the organs of the body. The effect of this medicine upon the stomach, the liver, and the kidneys is prompt and decisive. The patient feels a wise enough to quit coughing and try the BITTERS soon feese as if he had taken a new lease of life; and as he continues the use of the article will be surprised to find the absence of the cough coursing through his frame. It is prepared with great care, and its component parts are entirely vegetable. It is, therefore, the safest medicine so often urged against preparations of the kind. As a MEDICAL AGENT it has no equal, while its pleasing flavor renders it a favorite with the ladies. It is a genial tonic. It is free from all properties calculated to impair the system, and its operations are at once mild, soothing, and invigorating. Both men and women HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS attest its virtues and commend it to use.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

Even those who are in the enjoyment of perfect health frequently have need to have recourse to tonics as preventives of disease. We are never too well armed against the insidious foe of the ills that flesh is heir to. In health or sickness this tonic can not be taken regularly without giving vitality and elasticity to the system.

$20 A DAY GUARANTEED.—Agents wanted every where. Send for circular. HYDE & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

TO BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, and NEWSDEALERS.

DIARIES FOR 1869.

The AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY'S List of Diaries for 1869 will be issued in JUNE. We would advise dealers to look at our prices before buying their stock. Will be furnished on application.

WANTED, AGENTS, to sell by sample a LEVER, and RELIABLE Indicomeara offered. Comny rights for sale on most liberal terms. For particulars, address

W. S. BATCHELDER & CO., Pittsburg, Pa.

"THE ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIGION," with 12 A. Portraits of the most distinguished Popes, Cardinals and Priests in America. See July No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Only 15 cents, or $3 a year. Volumes have it. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool supplies Letters and Figures. J. PILLAM, Springfield, Vt.

$5 NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Simple, reliable, strong, easy, reliable, elegant. Warranted. Stitch alike on both sides. Double Thread. Awarded Medals. Single Machines sent free on receipt of $5. Family Sewing Machine Co., 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

Campaign Sleeve-Buttons.

IMITATION IVORY.

Perfect Likenesses of Grant and Colfax, in relief. Red, White, Blue, Black, and Brown. $1 00 per pair, free on receipt of price.
Large Discount to the Trade.
WM. M. WELLING, Patentee, 571 Broadway, N. Y.
AGENTS WANTED.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
Publish this Day:

Love or Marriage?

A NOVEL.

By WILLIAM BLACK.

8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and graceful language.—London Review.

The compound story is a powerful mind; it is full of thought, of careful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatic sentences, and is eloquent in suggestiveness.—London Leader.

The tale is simple enough, but well told, and it implies le chief charm.—Glasgowian.

This novel is one of more than usual merit. Carefully the production of an imagination—we may almost say of a close study—in the delineation of the subtle capacities of works of art that might live.—Spectator.

There is a very delicate touch in the whole narration about this book that is extremely captivating. It is a long time since we have had a story of every-day life with such unflagging interest.—Examiner.

The writer has the book in his head, and has so much of the plot as we have outlined. In the first place, we quote the fact that the language of the story is composed by the Canadian who skims over the surface of fiction and dipping now and then in the depths. The characters of Heloise and old Glencairn are well conceived and developed. The latter especially is a good study, and seems to have been thought out and portrayed carefully by the author.—Full Mall Gazette.

The author who can thus rivet the attention of the reader has accomplished no small victory in novel-writing, and such a victory is Mr. Black's beyond all question.—Scot.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

EF ON TRIAL.—$2 Ten copies of a first-class $3 Magazine six months, "on trial," for $10. The PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL sent in clubs of 10, from July to January, at only $1 a copy. A new volume—$15—begins with the July No.

THINK OF IT. Get one of the best Scientific and Literary Magazines ever published. The Freedom Monthly at $2 a year. "A periodical which, more perhaps than any other publication in the world, is calculated to do good to its readers. . . . All should read it. . . . Terms as low as possible—no deviation from the club. Registered letter, or in P. O. order. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

Crawford's Garden Cultivator.

Hand Machine for all kinds of Garden Cultivation. Warranted to do the work of four men. Send for Circulars. BUTMER, MORTON, & CO.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

SORGO HAND-BOOK.

Our Ninth Annual Sorgo Hand-Book.

Giving the most reliable information of the manufacturing Sorghum Syrup, the result of 11 years' personal experience, with full subscription of the celebrated Cook Evaporator and Victor Cane Mill—sent free to all applicants. JAMES LEFFEL, DAYTON, O., & CO., Springfield, O.

Presidential Campaign, 1868.

NOW is the TIME for AGENTS to make MONEY.

Sample lot of twelve different elegant styles of GRANT and COLFAX Medals, Badges, and Pins sent postpaid on receipt of $2 00. Also in the field with the rousing June issue, the Grant and Colfax Campaign Songster, brimful of new and original Songs for the Campaign, adapted to popular airs. Price 25 Cents.

Also, People's Edition Illustrated Campaign Life of Grant and Colfax, with Republican Platform and Campaign Matter specially pertinent to the times. Price 15 Cents. Send postpaid on receipt of price. Agents wanted every where. Liberal inducements. Address

R. W. RITCHIE & CO., 39 Spring St., N. Y.
Headquarters for all kinds of Campaign Goods.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

BEAUTIFUL WOMEN," National type: English, French, German, Austrian, Turkish, Russian, Circassian, Spanish, Italian, Swedish, Dutch, Japanese, etc., with portraits, in July No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $3 a year; 15 cts. a No., or 10 cts. monthly on trial" for $10. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

In the Number for JANUARY was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It needs precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Woman's Kingdom," a Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Household Angel," a Novel, by PETE RUSH LUDLOW.

THE BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

EF HARPER'S PERIODICALS will be delivered to City Subscribers without charge for postage.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be sent by mail for $5 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, quarterly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give a special notice to discontinue.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name of the Post-office should be distinctly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and new Post-office must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of the Publishers is always preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be received without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Wrapper Page, $300; Inside Pages, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per line—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

A SLIGHT DIFFERENCE.

DISGUSTED ROUGH. "Confound this 'ere New York! Now in Philadelfia you're an honest man till they find you out; but here you're a swindler to begin with."

SEEDY YOUNG PARTY. "Philadelphia is a nice place. There it's 'Who's your Grandfather?' 'Ere in Noo York it's 'Ow much money 'ave you got?'

"The Pen is Mightier than the Sword."

MORTON'S GOLD PENS

DO NOT WEAR OUT.

A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

BY THEIR USE

THE LABOR OF WRITING IS REDUCED,

Greater Uniformity is Obtained.

Ease, Elegance and Beauty are acquired

ECONOMY, PLEASURE AND PROFIT CONSULTED.

The Best, Cheapest and most Durable Instruments for Writing ever used.

SENT BY MAIL SAFELY.

Prices, Fifty Cents and upward.

NO TRAVELING AGENTS EMPLOYED.

Oil and trifling sum will find Pens exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing; or enclose stamp for circular.

A. MORTON,
25 MAIDEN LANE,
NEW YORK.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

When the Blood rushes with rocket-like violence to the head, causing hot flushes, vertigo, and dimness of sight, it is a certain sign that a mild, painless, cooling, and equalizing laxative is required, and TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT should be at once resorted to. Sold by all Druggists.

New Spring Goods
FOR GENTLEMEN.
ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.
UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

GRANT MEDALS and PINS.

AGENTS WANTED to sell our celebrated GRANT Medals and Pins. Send 25 Cents for sample of our new Pin, the handsomest in the market. Samples of 6 different styles sent for $1.00. Sample of new SONG BOOK for 25 Cents. Send for Circular to RICE & CO., 152 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed free by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

THE FINEST DIAMONDS FROM JOHN IN OLD & NEW 22 ARTISTIC MINES STREET MOUNTINGS OR STAIR
EXTENSIVE SELECTION
STARR & MARCUS

Extract from fashion article, Harper's Bazar, May 9: "The fire does the work of the laundress without necessitating any wearisome labor," etc.

THE AUTOMATIC
CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER
Does the work in 20 minutes, without labor. Fits any stove or range. Warranted to do the work. No. 1, Medium Size, $10 00. Sent, C.O.D. Send stamp for Circular.
State and County Rights for sale, except CONN., N. J., PA., DEL., MD., New York City and Vicinity. Agents wanted for this territory. Address
GENERAL AGENT AUTOMATIC CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER Co., No. 19 Courtlandt Street, New York.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.
GOOD AGENTS wanted to introduce our new STAR SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE—the only one in the market. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. We will convince Machine to responsible parties, AND EXPLOY EVERYBODY WHERE WE HAVE NO AGENT. Full particulars and sample stitch furnished on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

SOMETHING NEW.
THE BALLARD BREECH-LOADING SHOT-GUN.
This gun, so much called for, is now ready for delivery. Price, $30 00. Sent, securely packed, on receipt of price. Also the well-known BALLARD RIFLES, the Southerner Pistols, Eagle Revolvers, American Metallic Ammunition, all sizes. Superior quality. Send for circular. Address MERWIN, TALOR, & SIMPKINS, Sole Agents, 262 Broadway, New York. After May 1st, 99 Broadway.
P. S.—A full assortment of all goods in our line.

AGENTS WANTED.
PEOPLE in want of, and AGENTS who are selling all kinds of Sewing Machines, are requested to address me with stamp for greatly reduced prices and terms. J. K. PEARSONS, box 4, Charlestown, Mass.

DRUNKENNESS CURED
By URHAM'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1 25 by S. C. UPHAM, 28 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

WARD'S SHIRTS
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars, sent free. Shirts made to order. Goods sent by Express Company on receipt of goods. Cor. Broadway and Union Square; also 387 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.
Presidential Campaign Chart
Now ready, giving large, clear, and striking likenesses of the Republican Candidates for President and Vice-President. Party Platforms in full. The whole is surmounted by the American Eagle and Flag, and beautifully colored. This affords a first chance for Agents to make money for the year 1868. Send for Catalogue giving full particulars of our SONG BOOKS.
FIELD, LAYLOR & WILSON,
No. 16 Beekman St., New York.

FOLLEN & SON, Manufrs of Meerschaum goods, Silver Mounted Goods, Cigar Holders, Pipes, Bohemian Glass Goods, Fancy Articles, &c., 49 Maiden Lane, New York. Send for Catalogue.

Sir Robert Bilont's Celebrated English Life Bitters, cure Dyspepsia and preserves the general health.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. 18kin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

WALTHAM WATCHES
AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.
Silver Hunting Watches..... $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases..... $80
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size..... $70
Each Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Co. Watches sent by Express, C.O.D., with privilege to examine before paying. Every one in want of a reliable time-keeper is requested to write for our descriptive price-list. Address in full
HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N.Y.

One Ounce of Gold
Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. BABBITT'S LOCO CORYER." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "Aromatically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can is every twenty contains a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory,
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!
Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-plated Ware, Cooking Utensils.
CHINA AND GLASS WARE,
at greatly reduced prices.
BASSFORD'S,
Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

WANTED AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, everywhere, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED LOCK-STITCH SELF-FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will buy $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., 277 FULTON ST., cor. of BOSTON, MASS.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

STOREKEEPERS, LAWYERS, POSTMASTERS, Clergymen, Physicians, Expressmen, Booksellers, Telegraph Operators, are informed that they can make, without any interference with their regular avocations, from Twenty to Fifty Dollars a week, in any village, town or city in the United States, by addressing
JAY COOKE STURDIVANT, Secretary,
Fulton Fish Market Corner,
No. 113 South Fifth St., Philadelphia.

TRY
B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,
MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.
It Cures Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.
If your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN.
One Forward and two Backward Arches, ensuring great strength, well balanced elasticity, easiness of motion, and consequent freedom from fatigue. Sold by all Stationers. One gross in twelve contains a Scientific Gold Pen, Scientific Gold Pen (assorted points) and Patent Ink-retaining Penholder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 and 113 William St., N.Y.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!
Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in both MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us, with certainty and dispatch, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Price-list sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & SCHLE, Wholesale Warehouse, 124 Fulton St., and 20 Nassau St., N.Y.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,
As IMPORTED FOR N. Y. UNION CLUB.
TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway,
Publisher and Importer of
SCIENTIFIC WORKS,
has just issued a new General Catalogue of Books, 48 pages, octavo. Sent by mail on receipt of 3 cents in stamps.

REPORT OF J. ROSS BROWN
ON THE MINERAL RESOURCES OF THE STATES AND TERRITORIES WEST OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.
1 vol., 8vo., Cloth, 674 pages, $3 00.
Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway.

Live in My Heart
AND PAY NO RENT. New Song..... 30c.
THE EVE THAT BRIGHTENS YOUR LOME..... 30c.
PULLING HARD AGAINST THE STREAM..... 30c.
DREAM OF THE BALL—WALTZ—GOODEY..... 30c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 Broadway, 2d door above 25th St. Branch, 595 Bowery.

KENNEDY'S
Scrofula Ointment
Cures Old Sores;
Cures Ulcerated Sore Legs;
Cures Scrofulous Sores on the Neck;
Cures Blotches, or Pimples, on the Face;
Cures Scurvy Sores;
Cures Cancerous Ulcers.
Price $1 00 per Bottle.
MANUFACTURED BY DONALD KENNEDY,
ROXBURY, MASS.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published:

I.
HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST. The Spanish Conquest in America, and its Relation to the History of Slavery and to the Government of Colonies. By ARTHUR HELPS. Complete in Four Volumes. Vol. IV. just ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

II.
BELLOWS'S OLD WORLD. The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

III.
LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. With a Collection of Meteorological Tables. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL. D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and Author of "A Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $2 00.

IV.
KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel. A Portrait drawn from Scripture History and the Book of Psalms. By FREDERICK WILLIAM KRUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tisbhite," &c. Translated under the express Sanction of the Author by MARY J. G. EASTON, M.A. With a Letter from Dr. Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.
WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A., Ph.D. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

VI.
HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travelers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers." By W. J. FRANCIS and PETER BRIEN, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book." Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With copious and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 8o, Flexible Cloth, 75 cents.

VII.
MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Complete in Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

VIII.
BARNES'S THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS. History of the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States. By WILLIAM H. BARNES, M.A., Author of "The Boy Patriot," &c. With Eighteen Steel Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

IX.
SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Bevoled Edges, $1 75.

THE NEW NOVELS
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

LOVE OR MARRIAGE? A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A LOST NAME. " " LE FANU, Author of "All in the Dark." " " ELL, "Uncle Silas," "Prince Maleger," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BRAKESPEARE; or, The Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the Author of " " LIVINGSTONE, "Sword and Gown." &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

POOR HUMANITY. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Christie's Faith," "Mattie: a Story," "Carrie's Confession," "No Man's Friend," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE. By the Author of "Si. Olave's." &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; or "Birds of Prey." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. A Novel. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BROWNLOWS. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 599.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

MATERNAL VIGILANCE.

ORNITHOLOGISTS say, and every farmer of experience will tell you, that the duck is both a cowardly bird and a careless mother—that she flies at the slightest intimation of danger, and that a hen is almost always employed to hatch out her ducklings. It would, therefore, seem at the first glance that our sentimental artist, in selecting this timid member of the anatidæ family to illustrate the old and familiar but always pleasant story of maternal love and devotion, had made a grievous error. But the meaning of the drawing is thereby made clearer, the moral is made stronger, and yet it is true to nature and to fact. Timid and careless as she is, the duck has been known to successfully resist the attacks of the hawk, and to defend with vigor the brood to whose care she had previously appeared so indifferent. Our illustration below represents one of these ungainly fowls in the act of taking the defensive against a predatory hawk which is just visible through the gray atmosphere of the morning, but whose presence the natural instinct and maternal love of the mother-duck have been quick to discover. A cry of alarm has drawn the brood to her sides for protection, much on the same principle of self-preservation and style of tactics which directs the skirmishers to "rally by fours" in the presence of the enemy's cavalry.

DECORATING OUR SOLDIERS' GRAVES.

THE citizens of ancient Rome,
When, victory-crowned, the hosts came home,
Bedecked the living chief
With wreaths of laurel leaf.

Upon the graves of those who shed
Their blood for us—our patriot dead,
We, sorrowing, place to-day
The garland-gifts of May.

They do not hear the bugle-call;
They heard it once, and once for all;
For their reply behold
These mounds, and all is told.

Oh, comrades of the battle-field!
When cannon roared and muskets pealed,
And mighty deeds were wrought,
You know how well they fought.

In Duty's cause, unheeding death,
They cheered the flag with parting breath,
In faith sublimely high,
And dying, did not die.

They live to-day a larger life,
Beyond our little spheres of strife—
Beyond the silent tomb,
Where violets always bloom.

AN INDIAN'S CAREER.

AN illustration on page 392 of this issue serves the treble purpose of sketching strange manners and customs, giving a not uninteresting narrative of the real life of a living, though fast perishing, race, and displaying a work of no little artistic merit. The story is the "Life of an Indian," and the several handsome vignettes illustrate scenes which occur in the career of every red man. In the first he is seen in his infancy, the drawing illustrating the manner in which he is cradled and his figure moulded to the Indian form of beauty. In the second, grown to boyhood, he learns the use of the bow and arrow by practicing on the birds which fly near his father's wigwam. Advanced to manhood, he pursues more dangerous and adventurous sport in chasing the buffalo. In the fourth, his manhood is tested by the Indian trials of endurance. In the fifth "scene of this eventful history" he becomes a lover, "sighing like a furnace over a "lascivious late." In the sixth, he has developed into the warrior, and gloats with savage pride over his first scalp. In the seventh, he still further takes delight in his first victory and engages in the scalp-dance which celebrates it. In the eighth, sickness has overtaken him, and he is found stretched in the medicine-lodge, while the "medicine man" ministers to him in his peculiar mode. "Last scene of all" represents the tribe employed in celebrating the funeral ceremonies of the dead chieftain.

MATERNAL VIGILANCE IN THE FACE OF THE ENEMY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1868.

"LET US HAVE PEACE."

SO says General GRANT, so says every patriotic and intelligent man in the country. How then shall it be most speedily obtained? That is really the vital question of the election. All the other interests wait upon this, which is fundamental. Until there is peace, or, in other words, a definite political reorganization of the unrepresented States, there can be no industrial tranquility or prosperity. No full current of capital and skilled labor will set Southward until it is plain that the foundations of civil order are re-established. Upon what principle shall the work be done?

General GRANT is of opinion that Peace can most surely be established by the success of the reconstruction policy of Congress, and by Constitutions securing equal civil and political rights to all. Without this condition, there is no hope of the general intelligence which is the sole condition of a free government. The Republican party which sincerely supported the war; which fully understood it; which established slavery to secure the victory; which established the Freedmen's Bureau as a necessary temporary consequence of emancipation; which declared that equal civil rights of all freedmen as the legitimate result of their freedom, has also declared their political rights as the security not only of their own freedom but of the national welfare. It was necessary to decide whether emancipation should be sustained or slavery re-established. If the former course were pursued every thing necessary to its success was a simple necessity and duty. As for the latter course, it was an absurdly revolting impossibility.

It was absurd to attempt to maintain emancipation; and President JOHNSON required the States regained from rebellion to adopt the emancipation amendment. The proposition was that the right of State sovereignty to enslave the industrial population was peremptorily, contemptuously, and properly disregarded by him. The United States having crushed a rebellion which left certain States without any civil government, said to them, "You must begin your restoration to renewed political organization by agreeing that slavery is abolished." Most of them acquiesced. That act contained the whole principle of reconstruction. It was a dictation of the Civil Government, and their acceptance by the States to be reorganized. The Government had no right to do any thing whatever, or it had a perfect right to do whatever it deemed essential to the national welfare, with due regard to the great principles of liberty.

This is the view of General GRANT and of the Republican party. Upon this principle its policy of reconstruction is based. Having ample authority under the Constitution to subdue the rebellion by force, and to adopt such temporary methods, including emancipation, it has the authority to do whatever is necessary to secure emancipation and the victory of which it was an element. It proposes, therefore, equal suffrage in the late rebel States. It does not propose confiscation nor any vindictive punishment, and, while it condemns the cruelty and common sense in denying to a few of the most conspicuously disaffected a present voice in the Government, it favors the removal of every disqualification just as fast as the general condition of society will allow. Thus, by obliterating as rapidly as possible the traces of the old system of slavery; by forbidding its perpetuation under other names and forms; by defending the equal civil and political rights of the whole population, the Republican policy seeks peace and prosperity for the Southern people and for the whole country, upon conditions which the highest sagacity approves and the widest experience confirms.

The Democratic policy is directly antagonistic to the Republican. The Democracy has not yet, indeed, authoritatively justified the war, and, if its Convention continues the traditions of 1864, it will decline to do so. In that case, of course, its policy and declarations will be of very little importance. If, however, it accepts the war, it will very probably declare that when the rebellion in arms was suppressed the existing situation of January 1861 recurred. But if it accepts the war it must accept emancipation, and, doing that, it will find it difficult to deny the authority of the United States to provide at its pleasure for the security of the emancipated class. If the situation of January 1861 immediately recurred, so far as State authority and independence are concerned, the Democracy will have to declare that the United States had a right to free the slaves as a war measure, and that the States, having by the act of laying down their arms recovered all their authority, may re-endure them and snap their fingers at the National Government.

This is but the beginning of woes. If the situation of January 1861 recurred immediately upon the suppression of the "formal" State Constitutions awake; the political power is vested exclusively in the hands of the disaffected class; slavery is recognized; and if the disaffected class choose to emancipate, but not to confer political power upon the freedmen, they retain all their political monopoly and gain representatives in Congress. Meanwhile, whether the Democratic party declares the situation of January 1861 to have recurred or not, the truth remains that it never can recur; that it is already half a century behind. The truth remains that the freedmen have enjoyed their civil rights for two years, are widely educated, have voted, are working as free laborers, and understand the situation quite as well as their old masters. Under such circumstances the organs of the Democratic party with its organization, its traditions, and the character of its adherents will secure the principle of equal rights as the permanent policy of the Government more surely than the great party of which he has been so distinguished a leader. And who that has at heart the objects always professed by the Chief Justice will believe that they are more likely to be attained by the party which is radically hostile to them merely because in its despair it nominates Mr. CHASE, chagrined by a personal disappointment?

CRITICISM OF PUBLIC MEN.

MR. SUMNER'S resolutions upon the subject of impeachment and the public judgment upon it will probably pass, it pressed to a vote. The Senators who will not convict will probably support them, and the others will not agree to them. Those who called the Republican Senators who voted for acquittal "infamous" will call him the same, and those who differed will remain of the same opinion. We can not see that any thing will be gained by the passage of the resolutions; except possibly the clearer perception that there is not in so vital a difference of opinion as to the nature of impeachment, the process is not likely to be very beneficial to the country. The point of Mr. SUMNER'S resolutions is, that "Senators can not claim that their votes are exempt from the judgment of the people." This is the declaration made also by many newspapers in a reasonable tone, and some in a very different one. But what Senator has claimed such immunity, and what sensible man has demanded it for him?

If the charge of a public man is so profligate, and his conduct so generally corrupt as to authorize the suspicion that his vote has been bought or otherwise influenced, it is perfectly fair to say so, provided that the charge be supported by a reference to notorious precedents and to universal reputation. But to assume that a Senator has acted in corrupt because motives may be imagined that might possibly make it so, is an unspeakable wrong. Criticism of public men is desirable and inevitable. But what is criticism? If a man thinks that an oath to decide in a specific case according to the evidence is an oath to be bound, despite his convictions, by party dictation—very well. That is his opinion. We will not quarrel, but we will, I hope, argue. But for a man to say that another who believes that his oath means exactly what it says, and who acts accordingly, is "infamous," and a JUDAS, a BENEDICT ARNOLD, and a JEFFERSON DAVIS because he declines to yield to party dictation, seems to us a blow at freedom itself. It is an effort to check liberty of thought, and destroy liberty of speech by terrorism.

Surely it is not fair criticism of the motives of a public man who casts a vote differently from the wishes of many of his party friends to allege that he is governed by nothing but passion and ambition, and to denounce him as a renegade. The St. Louis Democrat says that "If Senator FESSENDEN was under obligation to vote as he pretended he did, so was the honest and patriotic man in the land is under obligation to approve or disapprove as his conscience may dictate." Undoubtedly. The honest and patriotic man may indeed differ with the judgment of his Senator, and say so; but can an honest conscience possibly disapprove the Senator's voting according to his conviction? The conscience of the Democrat can not exist. No honest man will disapprove an honest vote, whether he agree with it or not. The Democrat says that a Senator is elected, so every honest servant when sitting in a trial for impeachment as when deliberating and voting upon a bill. But in the case of impeachment he is a public servant sitting as a judge. Like the judge he is sworn to see that justice is done according to the law and evidence, not that what he considers to be the public opinion upon the case is ratified. The very sanctity of the bench is that it is a refuge against a possible unjust public opinion; that it is the tribunal of reason and facts, not of passion and ignorance. When Mr. HOAR went to Charleston to test the legal validity of certain acts in the courts, the public opinion of the place would permit him to be fair.

But if he had been suffered to remain, and the same opinion, however universal, had overpowered the court, no other proof would have been needed of the sheer barbarism of that society. So when a certain verdict was demanded of the Senate sitting as a court sworn to decide by the evidence, and demanded not by argument and reason, but by threats and epithets and abuse, those who demanded the verdict did what JAMES did when he required that judgment should be given according to his will. COKE made his memorable reply that he should do that which should be fit for a judge to do. It seems to us that every Senator sworn to decide according to the evidence was as solemnly bound not to be influenced by public opinion as COKE was to be independent of the king's will.

If, however, the trial was not a judicial proceeding; if the Senators represented merely the wishes of a party, their path was plain, and the process of impeachment is ridiculous. But this theory is utterly untenable. The President is impeachable for high crimes and misdemeanors. His offenses are specifically alleged. The proof of them, with the rebutting evidence, is presented. The arguments upon both sides are made. The Senators are sworn to decide according to the evidence whether he has committed the offenses charged. If this is not a court, there is no such thing as a court. If impeachment be, as the resolutions of Mr. SUMNER assert, purely a political proceeding, can there be any good reason given why the Constitution did not provide that when practicable, and to secure the Senators to decide according to the evidence when their duty is to remove him, not after proof of misconduct by whomever alleged, he ought to be set aside. If he may be removed for what Mr. SUMNER calls a political offense, then his theory is, that the President may be removed because he differs with the Senate.

This is an intolerable doctrine. Undoubtedly the Executive authority is, under certain circumstances, subordinate to the Legislature. But the chief magistrate is to be set aside only upon proved specific charges, not for a differ ence of opinion. Therefore we have always insisted that Mr. SUMNER, as President JOHNSON unquestionably was, he should not be impeached until he had violated a law, or committed some offense other than pursuing his hostile course within the limits of the Constitution. In removing Mr. STANTON it seemed to us, and he should think, he violated the law, and we think he should have been convicted. But what those who agreed with us attempted to intimidate his judges we felt, and still feel, that their offense was infinitely greater than any charged upon them. In no case was more than intimidation was honorable argument. It was the ferocity of party-spirit, and the subsequent criticism, as it is called, of the Republican Senators who acquitted, which constituted a mockery or insinuating that their verdict did not express their real conviction but was the result of personal corruption or treachery, serves to us to spring from the same party-spirit. If the motives of those who are elected to the bench, or who are constitutionally called to the bench, as Senators are in an impeachment trial, are to be venomously assailed if they do not judge politically instead of judicially, then one of the most vital safeguards of society, the independence of the Judiciary in Periods of Immediate danger, is gone. Resolutions speak of the Dred Scott decision. But the objection to that decision was its utter disregard of jurisdiction beyond the bench, and beyond the truth of history; and the palpable monstrous effort to strain the law and the fact against humanity and justice. To show this was fairly to criticise the decision. And say one who can show a similar attempt upon the part of any Republican Senator in the late trial, or can prove it to be probable from his recorded and reputation to do it, so let him. But a bald aspersion of motives, a screaming vituperation, is not criticism.

THE HOOSIC TUNNEL.

THE Massachusetts Legislature, upon a test vote, shows that it will appropriate five millions of dollars toward the completion of the Hoosic tunnel. Before the resolution was passed Mr. GEORGE WALKER, of Springfield, made what seems to us the conclusive speech in favor of the policy of prosecuting the enterprise further. His facts were so well marshaled, and his figures so decisive, that the resolution to continue the work only in case of how little State assistance believes the public interest and wish in the matter to be.

The Hoosic tunnel is upon the line of a projected railroad from Greenfield in Massachusetts to Troy in New York, and is a bore through the Hoosic Mountain which separates the valley of the Deerfield from the river from that of the Hudson. Mr. WALKER tells us that the State of Massachusetts has already spent upon the work $1,512,034; and a contracting firm now offers to finish the tunnel with a single track, in seven years, at a contract price of five and a half millions of dollars. Allowing for every thing, Mr. WALKER estimates the total cost at $15,081,893. A sinking fund is to be deducted, which will leave the balance to be provided for $13,735,199. The interest of that sum at five per cent. is $686,760, which must be paid out of the net earnings of the road. But the operating expenses must be first paid. If worked as cheaply as the average of lines in the State its gross receipts, in order to pay its interest, must be three times that interest, or $2,060,250, which would give $46,800 a mile, or nearly three times the average earnings of the best lines lying between the tunnel road and the great grain fields of the West, over which lines its traffic must come, and which bring five or even ten times as much freight to New York as can be diverted to Boston. By any fair computation the road will be unable to pay the interest, and the whole principal, nearly $14,000,000, becomes a State debt and every appropriation a State tax. This year it is just three-fifths of that. At the end of seven years, if the contract mentioned be executed, the aggregate tax will be nearly seven times the State tax of this year. If the people of the whole State think that they can, under these circumstances, get their flour and pork cheaper through the tunnel than in other ways they will vote the appropriations affectedly. But Boston capitalists have never been able to take that view.

Mr. WALKER, with many other of the best authorities, regards the construction of the road as a mistake. Even its friends feel that it is a failure if it does not go beyond Troy. But Mr. WALKER is of opinion that the true line of connection with Lake Ontario lies further to the north upon roads that can be made practicable at a much smaller expense. In any case he would have referred the whole question to a direct vote of the people. But the Legislature did not agree, and unless different counsels prevail the work will be continued. Mr. WALKER'S speech will remain, however, as one of the clearest and most candid and complete statements of the subject.

DEMOCRATIC INSTINCT.

NOTHING affords a clearer illustration of the utter confusion and demoralization of the Democratic party than the certain of the party newspapers. The struggle to be upon both sides of the fence at once, to please the peace men and the war men, the repudiators and the honest debtors, is very shamed and very edifying. It is a continuation of the noble Democratic policy during the rebellion, which consisted in supporting the war and opposing its prosecution. The only heartiness left in the party organs is in their assertion that the war, their rebukes against the colored race, and their hatred of equal rights. Their acceptance of the results of the struggle is reluctant and formal. One of these papers lately published a long article stating what the Democratic platform ought to be. It remarked that the avenging judgment of the party is just: "In the late evil war was, by itself, a necessary exercise of the authority of a constitutional government to put down a rebellion." But a few days after the same paper, which had thus formally justified the war, showed its real feeling, the feeling that it could not conceal while the struggle was still pending, by alluding to a phrase in one of Doctor BELLOWS's letters, which speaks of the cotton-fields of the South: "The cotton-fields!" exclaims the paper, "our cotton-fields, Doctor, prize, a hallowed ones and all unconscious that many dollars, and now growing, under the beneficent aegis of Fereedom, the very best weeds that ever grew in the South."

This is in the most characteristic Democratic vein. A war which is conceded to be necessary, ends victoriously for the Government, abolishes the most odious slavery, redeems the honor and humanity of the national name, and removes the great disgrace and disaster of the country, and the contemptuous organ of a "Democracy" that did all the dirty work of Slavery can only gibe at "Fereedom."

THE DARIEN CANAL.

IN receiving the Chinese Embassy the President made a discursive oration in which he naturally spoke of the means of communication between China and the United States, and remarked that more important than all of them was "the great work of connecting the two oceans by a ship-canal to be constructed across the Isthmus of Darien." Since the tragedy of Lieutenant STRAIN's exploring expedition very little has been said in this country upon that subject. Those who are interested to know the history of the movement fifteen years ago should consult Harper's Magazine for March, April, and May, 1853, in which there is a copious and accurate account of operations to that time. The subject has been reopened by the English Society of Engineers, which has given it the fullest attention since the beginning of this year.

Dr. CULLEN has made it a special study, and our information is drawn from his long and minute report. In brief, the line he proposes is from Caledonia Harbor, upon the Atlantic side, to the Gulf of San Miguel upon the Pacific. The whole isthmus is covered with a dense primeval forest broken only by the courses of the rivers; and Dr. CULLEN asserts that his route, when thoroughly surveyed, will require less excavation and fewer locks than any other proposed line, with the added advantages of shortness, low elevation, and healthiness. The CULLEN line starts from Caledonia Harbor and runs to a valley between the Agla and Sassardi Mountains; through the valley to the head of the Sucubti River; down the Sucubti to its confluence with the Chuquanaque; thence through the forest to the Savana River; down the Savana and Tayra to the Gulf of San Miguel. The length of this line is fifty-eight English miles; canal proper, seven miles; consolidated river, twelve miles; navigation of the Savana and Tayra, nineteen miles. Allowing for locking, this distance could be traversed in twenty-four hours. The lowest summit level upon this line is only four miles from the Atlantic side, and is only about two hundred feet high.

The work to be done besides the erection of light-houses, some deepening of channel, and locking, would be to cut a canal twenty-seven miles long and to canalize the river. A French Commission of Engineers estimated the excavation at about $35,600,000. The whole labor might be done by fifteen thousand men in four years; and allowing $400 a year for the wages and food of each, the cost of the labor would be about $24,000,000. The saving of time and money by the canal, according to Dr. CULLEN, may be illustrated by the case of a ship with a crew of thirty men from New York to California. Now the way of Cape Horn the total expense may be estimated at $130,000. By Canal at $3969; difference in favor of the Canal 25 days and $9261. If the cargo were of the value of $100,000 the saving on interest and insurance would be $1042, making the total gain $13,303.

We do not follow Dr. CULLEN into further estimates of profits. The salient feature of the undertaking need no demonstration. Dr. CULLEN believes that a society of some hundreds of scientific and practical engineers will, before long, satisfactorily answer these questions:

"Shall a narrow strip of land, not forty miles across, be allowed any longer to remain a barrier on the highway of nations?

"Shall the engineering genius of the most civilized nation, even with the aids that chem stry places at its service, in gun-cotton and nitro-glycerine, confess itself baffled in the question of cutting a canal thirty-nine miles long?"

DEMOCRATIC INSULTS TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

THE organs of the Democratic party demand that the war shall be treated as a settled issue. That is just natural. But why do they not hold by their own demand? The Republicans regard it as so finally settled that they intend to consider its just results. They do not mean to fight the war over again, nor do the people mean to surrender the victory which they have won. Nor do they mean to insult, nor suffer to be insulted, the heroes who, under General GRANT, conquered the rebellion despite the hissing of Copperheads in their rear. Four years ago the Democratic party of Chicago and declared the war a failure, and called upon the Government to submit to the rebellion. Now one of its newspapers speaks of the late Convention of Soldiers and Sailors of Chicago as "a body of sutlers who met at Chicago last month, the character of which was apparently determined upon by one SICKLES as its permanent President, and its being controlled by one LOGAN." And again: "While the Chicago Convention was in session there was a large number of sutlers, including a huge number of 'Generals,' who dispensed pepper-sauce, pickles, and Connecticut cigars to the Army of the Fereedom, and their friends."

This organ of a party whose leader at SEYMOUR contemptuously called "the boys" are the victories that were promised us?" now speaks of these soldiers and their brethren as "those who succeeded to fight." It says that the "pretended" fighting of "one SICKLES," "sutlers and sailors are not very likely to forget" the way in which the Democratic party and the similar press of the North spoke that carried him triumphantly to Vicksburg with GRANT and through Georgia with SHERMAN. One of these sailors, who is referred to the tried heroes of the war the same paper says, "interfered GRANT: "This man has been nominated for President by the Chicago Convention....." In August, 1861, when the Federal army was as a Captain, was transferred to the regular service, where he still remains."

This is the way in which the Democracy propose to regard the war as a settled issue. It will only remind the people that one of the chief causes of thanksgiving for the great victory is, that it settled a party which, between wing rebelled, and whose Northern wing did what it could, short of fighting, to make rebellion successful.

PULLING DOWN THE FLAG.

FOUR years ago it was the Democratic party that called upon the people to surrender. But the people having despised its advice, the party now proposes to surrender itself. Its spokesmen are beginning to exhort the faithful to accept the war. But one more daring than the rest, while its column team with ribald abuse of the colored race, satisfactorily sets the great orthodox Democratic doctrine of "the white man's government" and the other fundamental Democratic principle of "down with the negroes!" It ruefully asks: "Since we can do nothing about negro suffrage, why not practice the dignity of silence, and say nothing?" It is no longer so sure that a Democratic victory would overthrow all the new State governments at the South. "Even if we could elect a Democratic Senate within the next four years (which we can not), we could neither revive the expunged State governments nor cause the Southern negroes to vote for their own disfranchisement." Then it asks whether the white population can gain exclusive control of the new Southern governments without the assistance of the colored voters, and are those voters likely to support a party which wishes to disfranchise them? Consequently, is it wise to say anything about negro suffrage in our Tammany platform?

This painful inquiry and the growing feeling among the faithful that the sole hope of a Democratic nomination lies in the nature of an ex-Republican chief, shows that the confusion of the party is complete. It also suggests the question why any body should vote to support a party which has no principles of its own, and no candidates of its own? If the Republican policy of Reconstruction is, after all the "wellshall-sees," to be quietly accepted; if the decisive of equal rights which the Republican party asserts is to prevail; if the opposition are not only to accept their platform, but to go out of their ranks for a candidate, it is perfectly plain that their sole object is patronage and plunder. The country must naturally believe that a party whose principle has always been fair play for every man is the proper party to secure that fair play. It will inevitably smile at the professions of the party whose great tradition is hostility to the colored population, of a sudden desire to do them justice and to respect their rights. As for the colored voters themselves, they can be trusted to know their friends now as they knew them during the war.

The suggestion of newspapers which constantly decried the war, that the population, that the Southern Democrats shall "convert them to it" the Democratic party, is not likely to bear fruit. The success of the effort to convert them to the rebellion is not encouraging. They now find that the Yankees would sell them to Cuba, and do all manner of horrors upon them; but still, in the remotest swamp or forest of the South, hundreds of miles away from the national troops, wherever a Union soldier saw a colored face he knew that he saw the face of a friend. Never was there a truer story of the war, was there an instance of a soldier betrayed by a colored man. The instinct of liberty, the tradition of their race, that toward the North Star lay the path of redemption, and that the Yankees came from the North, were enough for the true race, and the blandishments and falsehoods of the masters in the rebellion were more seductive than their blood-hounds and paddles in the day of their haughty power.

When JAMES HARRIS, of North Carolina, a colored leader, said to Mr. CHASE that the Southern loyalists knew that the Republican party was their friend, he said what the mass of colored men believe. They are not to be deluded by Mr. WADE HAMPTON, nor by any architect of a Tammany platform. They may not know that Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR expressed a sentiment in the last Union gas vastly more than to abolish slavery; but they do know that the party calling itself Democratic has been their relentless and cruel foe. That party can not save itself in the judgment of the loyal people by catching at Mr. CHASE's skirts. It can not commend itself to their confidence by merely omitting to denounce them as gorillas and apes. The colored voters will look at the men who control the Convention; they will learn what their antecedents are; they will know every thing in the editorial and party to trace race, and they will be as true to themselves and their rights in the election as they were in the war.

THE TRIBUTE TO THE DEAD UNION SOLDIERS.

FROM all parts of the country we have the most satisfactory accounts of the observance of the celebration of the day designated for strewing with flowers the graves of the Union soldiers. General GRANT was present at the cemetery at Arlington, near Washington, and General HANCOCK was also there. General BURNSIDE presided at the ceremonies in Rhode Island. In many places business was suspended, and both the numbers that attended and the generous and manly speeches that were made—in no instance that we have seen breathing the least hostile feeling—are full illustrations of the depth and sincerity of the honor in which the memory of the brave boys is held.

LITERARY.

THE fourth and last volume of "The Spanish Conquest in America, and its Relation to the History of Slavery and to the Government of Colonies, by ARTHUR HELPS," has just been published by HARPER & BROTHERS. This work already familiar to the public, and especially to students of history has a peculiar interest for us, not only from the luminous and delightful manner in which the author has treated his subject, but from the fact that the conquest of Mexico and Peru was the first great example of the planting of slavery upon this continent, which we have happily seen removed. Mr. HELPS's admirable scholarship and literary skill are sufficient warrants of the character of his work; and the publishers have issued it in a very neat and attractive manner, the text being profusely illustrated with convenient maps, which impress the scene of the story vividly upon the reader's mind.

MRS. HELEN S. CONANT has discovered a right "royal road" to the study of Natural History, and very pleasantly and practically she points it out to the children in her "Adventures of Hunters," lately issued by TICKNOR & FIELDS, BOSTON. On the delicate thread of an interesting narrative of adventures in the new England woods she strings a great number of facts in regard to butterflies; not, however, unwisely entering into such detail as children can not understand, but teaching very clearly enough about the insect to incite a child to wish for further information. It is not the complete treatise of the naturalist, but practically a preparatory lesson in that science, and one that is as entertaining as it is useful and reliable. The numerous illustrations are of the most finished character, and add greatly to the interest and value of the book.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

THE actions of both Houses since our last report have been unimportant, especially in the consideration of the Reconstruction bill. Several amendments were made, and finally a Committee of Conference had to be appointed. The report of this committee was finally agreed to by both Houses. The following is the bill:

"Whereas, The people of Arkansas, as in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled 'An act for the more efficient government of the Rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and the supplementary thereto, have framed and adopted a Constitution of State Government which is republican in form, and the Legislature of said State has duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and known as Article 14: therefore "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the State of Arkansas is entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union when the Legislature of said State shall have declared that the Constitution of Arkansas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens in the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the Constitution thereof as now recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted, under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: provided that any alteration of said Constitution, prior to the admission of such State to representation, may be made in regard to time and place of residence of the voters."

NEWS ITEMS.

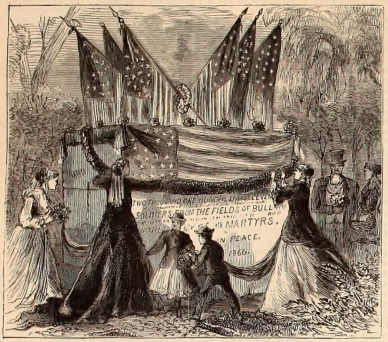
Jeff. Davis's trial will be further postponed—this time until October.

The State of Virginia finds her treasury so impoverished that it will be impossible to pay the interest on the debt for three years. There is barely enough money in hand to meet expenses.

The official majority for Mr. Hubbard against Conkling, in the Michigan election, was 6,676. At the election in April, was 26,926 in a vote of 182,388.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EX-GOVERNOR EYRE, of Jamaica infamy, has visited the Queen at the grand jury empaneled for the purpose refusing to take cognizance of the indictment found against him.



Not only the Chinese, but the other ancient barbarians of Asia and Europe are doing strange things in their way and generation, as witness the speech of the Sultan of Turkey to his Council of State. After thanking them for the fair manner in which they and other slaves continue in Constantinople, he announced that "the day of liberty has arrived, and under all circumstances the right of every one to liberty." How the present proclamation will be received, as to servitude Christians can not ask or expect of the Mussulman, they listed patiently to the end of the speech of their master, and then "As regards religion every one may follow his conscience," and there can be no mistake upon this subject. Nevertheless, whatever the creed professed by Christians, they are all citizens of the same country, and they must not entertain sentiments of hostility to each other, nor toward the other sex, account of the difference of religious beliefs." This begins to look like civilization, and as the Sultan is evidently arguing from the fact that similar reform movements, looking to the liberty of the Christians of Candia, are visible in other benighted countries, such as Austria, not to mention Italy, the effect of the defeat of Marriage bill and other reforms by Austria have been manifested in the Sultan's mind in favor of taking a particular Church.... State religion is not only superfluous but evil. The best way to ensure the safety of a Church, which is always endeavoring to dominate, is to deprive it of the power which it would be allowed to dominate. The Christian religion itself prohibits Christians from dominating, and as the Government of a State Church is not necessary, because domination by the Church over a Church; because a pretension given to one Church is an insult to others; because the Government of a State Church is a danger to the state, and fills their hearts with pride." This is remarkable language from a Mussulman Sultan, and but a still more significant remark was made by the Sultan when he said that "as to the Turks, the Mussulmans and other bills, which are in violation of and vitiate neither the Concordat of 1856 with Rome. Our giving his signature to these laws he said he had no choice but to do so or abdicate.

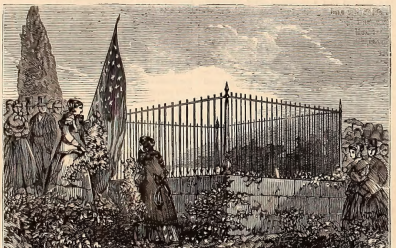
The Pope of Rome has sent a recruiting officer to his country to enlist troops to defend the Church of Italy. Garibaldi has protested against this.

The Spanish authorities at Cuba still have "compromised" their dignities. General Rojas, the chief of the rebels, has agreed to be Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the Republic, and Manigua is to be President. Meantime the elected President, Zenda, has fled no one knows where.

Denmark wants to get rid of the rest of her West India possessions, and has sent a commissioner to Washington with that object.

Queen Victoria lately left London for a summer in the country, and as the correspondents say, the King-dom, or at least the politicians, who want her on the ground as the Government chief, in the Cabinet or the dissolution of Parliament. So strong was the feeling manifested by the assembled crowds that the Queen's

UNKNOWN SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT ARLINGTON.



ORPHAN CHILDREN STREWING FLOWERS ON THE GRAVES AT ARLINGTON.

DECORATING THE SOLDIERS' GRAVES—CEREMONIES AT ARLINGTON, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY C. M. THOMAS.]

DECORATION OF SOLDIERS' GRAVES.

THE order of General JOHN A. LOGAN to the Grand Army of the Republic, setting apart May 30 as an occasion on which to honor the memory of the dead soldiers of the Union Army, was generally observed, not only by that organization but by our citizens in general.

Our illustrations are from several sources. The ceremonies at Arlington, Virginia, the former home of the rebel General LEE, but now a cemetery, were of a most interesting character. Arlington House was decorated with flags and crape and presented a strange and unusual appearance; an oration was delivered by Mr. GARFIELD of Ohio, and an original poem read. After this a procession was formed which moved to the tomb of the unknown soldiers who fell in Virginia during the early part of the war. This tomb is a massive granite structure, bearing an inscription to the effect that beneath the stone reposes 2111 unknown soldiers gathered after the war from the fields of Bull Run and the route to the Rappahannock, whose remains could not be identified by the names and dates of record in the archives. The tomb was tastefully decorated with flags and evergreens. Subsequently the children of the orphan asylum deployed and took positions at the different flower-stands, where they were provided with baskets of flowers, and then proceeded through the cemetery, strewing the flowers upon the mounds as they passed. The ceremony was simple, yet impressive, and many of the spectators followed the procession and added their floral offerings. The scene impressed one more fully with its solemnity as there broke upon the ear at intervals the low booming of a cannon.

DECORATING GENERAL LANDER'S GRAVE AT SALEM, MASS.—[SKETCHED BY J. W. TITUS.]

Another illustration represents the scene at Salem, Massachusetts, showing more particularly the decoration of the grave of General FREDERICK W. LANDER. The other graves having been decorated, the line was drawn up before the General's resting-place, the band playing a dirge, and after Commander PERSON had placed upon the tomb several beautiful emblems prepared by the hands of Mrs. LANDER, the hero's widow, the members of the Grand Army and the soldiers and sailors, uncovered, passed by and each one threw upon the tomb a floral offering.

There are over three thousand Union soldiers buried in Cypress Hill Cemetery, near Brooklyn, Long Island, and the scene which here occurred on May 30 was most impressive and yet pleasing. Several thousand old soldiers and citizens marched to the ground, and after listening to an oration, engaged, as our illustration represents them, in the work of decorating the mounds under which the soldiers repose.

GRAVES IN CYPRESS HILL CEMETERY, NEAR BROOKLYN, LONG ISLAND.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER VII.

At the moment when I showed myself in the doorway, Rachel rose from the piano.

I closed the door behind me. We confronted each other in silence, with the full length of the room between us. The movement she had made in rising appeared to be the one exertion of which she was capable. All use of every other faculty, bodily or mental, seemed to be merged in the mere act of looking at me.

A fear crossed my mind that I had shown myself too suddenly. I advanced a few steps toward her. I said gently, "Rachel!"

The sound of my voice brought the life back to her limbs, and the color to her face. She advanced, on her side, still without speaking. Slowly, as if she was acting under some influence independent of her own will, she came nearer and nearer to me; the warm dusky color flushing her cheeks, the light of reviving intelligence brightening every instant in her eyes. I forgot the object that had brought me into her presence: I forgot the vile suspicion that rested on my good name—I forgot every consideration, past, present, and future, which I was bound to remember. I saw nothing but the woman I loved coming nearer and nearer to me. She trembled; she stood irresolute. I could resist it no longer —I caught her in my arms, and covered her face with kisses.

There was a moment when I thought the kisses were returned; a moment when it seemed as if she, too, might have forgotten. Almost before the idea could shape itself in my mind, her first voluntary action made me feel that she remembered. With a cry which was like a cry of horror—with a strength which I doubt if I could have resisted if I had tried—she thrust me back from her. I saw merciless anger in her eyes: I saw merciless contempt on her lips. She looked me over, from head to foot, as she might have looked at a stranger who had insulted her.

"You coward!" she said. "You mean, miserable, heartless coward!"

Those were her first words! The most unendurable reproach that a woman can address to a man was the reproach that she picked out to address to Me.

"I remember the time, Rachel," I said, "when you could have told me that I had offended you in a worthier way than that. I beg your pardon."

Something of the bitterness that I felt may have communicated itself to my voice. At the first words of my reply, her eyes, which had been turned away the moment before, looked back at me unwillingly. She answered in a low tone, with a sullen submission of manner which was quite new in my experience of her.

"Perhaps there is some excuse for me," she said. "After what you have done, it seems a mean action, on your part, to find your way to me as you have found it to-day. It seems a cowardly experiment, to try an experiment on my weakness for you. It seems a cowardly surprise, to surprise me into letting you kiss me. But that is only a woman's view. You could have known it couldn't be your view. I should have done better if I had controlled myself and said nothing."

The apology was more unendurable than the insult. The most degraded man living would have felt humiliated by it.

"If my honor was not in your hands," I said, "I would leave you this instant, and never see you again. You have spoken of what I have done. What have I done?"

"What have you done! You ask that question of Me?"

"I ask it."

"I have kept your infamy a secret," she answered. "And I have suffered the consequences of concealing it. Have I no claim to be spared the insult of your asking me what you have done? Is all sense of gratitude dead in you? You were once a gentleman. You were once dear to my mother, and dearer still to me—"

Her voice failed her. She dropped into a chair, and turned her back on me, and covered her face with her hands.

I waited a little before I trusted myself to say any more. In that moment of silence I hardly know which I felt most keenly—the sting which her contempt had planted in me, or the proud resolution which shut me out from all communion with her distress.

"If you will not speak first," I said, "I must. I have come here with something serious to say to you. Will you do me the common justice of listening while I say it?"

She neither moved nor answered. I made no second appeal to her: I never advanced an inch nearer to her chair. With a pride which was as obstinate as her pride, I told her of my discovery at the Shivering Sand, and of all that had led to it. The narrative, of necessity, occupied some little time. From beginning to end she never looked round at me, and she never uttered a word.

I kept my temper. My whole future depended, in all probability, on my not losing possession of myself at this moment. The time had come to put Mr. Bruff's theory to the test. In the breathless interest of trying a fatal experiment, I moved round so as to place myself in front of her.

"I have a question to ask you," I said. "It obliges me to refer again to a painful subject. Did Rosanna Spearman show you the nightgown? Yes, or No?"

She started to her feet; and walked close up to me of her own accord. Her eyes looked me searchingly in the face, as if to read something there which they had never read yet.

"Are you mad?" she asked.

I still restrained myself. I said, quietly, "Rachel, will you answer my question?"

She went on, without hearing me.

"Have you some object to gain which I don't understand? Some mean fear about the future, in which I am concerned? They say your father's death has made you a rich man. Have you come here to compensate me for the loss of Miss Diamond? Do you leave me enough left to feel ashamed of your errand? Is that the secret of your pretense of innocence, and your query about Rosanna Spearman? Is there a motive of shame at the bottom of all the falsehood, this time?"

I silenced her there. I could control myself no longer.

"You have done me an infamous wrong! I broke out hotly. "You surprise me of stealing your Diamond. I have a right to know, and I will know, the reason why!"

"Suspect you!" she exclaimed, her anger rising with mine. "You villain, I saw you take the Diamond with my own eyes!"

The revelation which burst upon me in those words, the overthrow which they instantly accomplished of the whole view of the case on which Mr. Bruff had relied, struck me helpless. Innocent as I was, I stood before her in silence. To her eyes, to any eyes, I must have looked like a man overwhelmed by the discovery of his own guilt.

She drew back from the spectacle of my humiliation, and of her triumph. The sudden silence that had fallen upon me seemed to frighten her. "I spared you at the time," she said. "I would have spared you now, if you had not forced me to speak." She moved away as if to leave the room—and hesitated before she got to the door. "Why did you come here to humiliate yourself?" she asked. "Why did you come here to humiliate me?" She went on a few steps, and paused once more. "For God's sake say something!" she exclaimed, passionately. "If you have any pity for me, don't let me degrade myself in this way! Say something—and drive me out of the room!"

I advanced toward her, hardly conscious of what I was doing. I had possibly some confused idea of detaining her until she had told me more. From the moment when I knew that the evidence on which I stood condemned in Rachel's mind, was the evidence of her own eyes, nothing—not even my conviction of my own innocence—was clear in my mind. I took her by the hand; I tried to speak firmly and to the purpose. All I could say was, "Rachel, you once loved me."

She shuddered, and looked away from me. Her hand lay powerless and trembling in mine. "Let go of it," she said, faintly.

My touch seemed to have the same effect on her which the sound of my voice had produced when I first entered the room. After she had said the word which called me a coward, after she had made the avowal which branded me as a thief—while her hand lay in mine I was her master still!

I drew her gently back into the middle of the room. I seated her by the side of me. "Rachel," I said, "I can't explain the contradiction in what I am going to tell you. I can only speak the truth as you have spoken it. You saw me—with your own eyes, you saw me take the Diamond. Before God who hears us, I declare that I now know I took it for the first time! Do you doubt me still?"

She had neither heeded nor heard me. "Let go of my hand," she repeated, faintly. That was her only answer. Her head sank on my shoulder; and her hand unconsciously closed on mine, at the moment when she asked me to release it.

I refrained from pressing the question. But there my forbearance stopped. My chance of ever holding up my head again among honest men depended on my chance of inducing her to make her disclosure complete. The one hope left for me was the hope that she might have overlooked something in the chain of evidence —some mere trifle, perhaps, which might nevertheless, under careful investigation, be made the means of vindicating my innocence in the end. I own I kept possession of her hand. I own I spoke to her with all that I could summon back of the sympathy and the confidence of the bygone time.

"I want to ask you something," I said. "I want you to tell me every thing that happened, from the time when we wished each other good-night, to the time when you saw me take the Diamond."

She lifted her head from my shoulder, and made an effort to release her hand. "Oh, why go back to it!" she said. "Why go back to it!"

"I will tell you why, Rachel. You are the victim, and I am the victim, of some monstrous delusion which has worn the mask of truth. If we look at what happened on the night of your birthday, together, we may end in understanding each other yet."

Her head dropped back on my shoulder. The tears gathered in her eyes, and fell slowly over her cheeks. "Oh!" she said, "have I never had that hope? Have I not tried to see it, as you are trying now?"

"You have tried by yourself," I answered. "You have not tried with me to help you."

These words seem to awaken in her something of the hope which I felt myself when I uttered them. She replied to my questions with more than docility—she exerted her intelligence: she willingly opened her whole mind to me.

"Let us begin," I said, "with what happened after we had wished each other good-night. Did you go to bed? or did you sit up?"

"I went to bed."

"Did you notice the time? Was it late?"

"Not very. About twelve o'clock, I think."

"Did you fall asleep?"

"No. I couldn't sleep that night."

"You were restless?"

"I was thinking of you."

The answer almost unmanned me. Something in the tone, even more than in the words, went straight to my heart. It was only after pausing a little first that I was able to go on.

"Had you any light in your room?" I asked.

"None—until I got up again, and lit my candle."

"How long was that after you had gone to bed?"

"About an hour after, I think. About one o'clock."

"Did you leave your bedroom?"

"I was going to leave it. I had put on my dressing-gown; and I was going into my sitting-room to get a book—"

"Had you opened your bedroom door?"

"I had just opened it."

"But you had not gone into the sitting-room?"

"No—I was stopped from going into it."

"What stopped you?"

"I saw a light under the door; and I heard footsteps approaching it."

"Were you frightened?"

"Not then. I knew my poor mother was a bad sleeper; and I remembered that she had tried hard that evening to persuade me to let her take charge of my Diamond. She was unreasonably anxious about it, as I thought; and I fancied she was coming to me to see if I was in bed, and to speak to me about the Diamond again, if she found that I was up."

"What did you do?"

"I blew out my candle, so that she might think I was in bed. I was unreasonable, on my side—I was determined to keep my Diamond in the place of my own choosing."

"After blowing the candle out, did you go back to bed?"

"I had no time to go back. At the moment when I blew the candle out the sitting-room door opened, and I saw—"

"You saw?"

"You."

"Dressed as usual?"

"No."

"In my night-gown?"

"In your night-gown—with your bedroom candle in your hand."

"Alone?"

"Alone."

"Could you see my face?"

"Yes."

"Plainly?"

"Quite plainly. The candle in your hand showed it to me."

"Were my eyes open?"

"Yes."

"Did you notice any thing strange in them? Any thing like a fixed, vacant expression?"

"Nothing of the sort. Your eyes were bright —brighter than usual. You looked about in the room as if you knew you were where you ought not to be, and as if you were afraid of being found out."

"Did you observe one thing when I came into the room—did you observe how I walked?"

"You walked as you always do. You came in as far as the middle of the room—and then you stopped and looked about you."

"What did you do on first seeing me?"

"I could do nothing. I was petrified. I couldn't speak, I couldn't call out, I couldn't even move to shut my door."

"Could I see you where you stood?"

"You might certainly have seen me. But

"SHE CAUGHT ME BY THE ARM AND BARRED MY WAY OUT."

you never looked toward me. It's useless to ask the question. I am sure you never saw me.

"How are you sure?"

"Would you have taken the Diamond? would you have acted as you did afterward? would you be here now—if you had seen that I was awake and looking at you? Don't make me talk of that part of it! I want to answer you quietly. Help me to keep as calm as I can. I am on to something else.

She was right—in every way, right. I went on to other things.

"What did I do after I had got to the middle of the room and had stopped there?"

"You turned round and went straight to the corner near the window—where my Indian cabinet stands."

"When I was at the cabinet my back must have been turned toward you. How did you see what I was doing?"

"When you moved, I moved."

"So as to see what I was about with my hands?"

"There are three glasses in my sitting-room. As you stood there I saw all that you did reflected in one of them."

"What did you see?"

"You put your candle on the top of the cabinet. You pulled a small shut one drawer after another until you came to the drawer in which I had put my Diamond. You looked at the open drawer for a moment. And then you put your hand in and took the Diamond out."

"How do you know I took the Diamond out?"

"I saw your hand go into the drawer. And I saw the gleam of the stone, between your finger and thumb, when you took your hand out."

"Did my hand approach the drawer again—to close it, that is to say?"

"No. You had the Diamond in your right hand; and you took the candle from the top of the cabinet with your left hand."

"Did I look about me again after that?"

"No."

"Did I leave the room immediately?"

"No. You stood quite still for what seemed a long time. I saw your face sideways in the glass. You looked like a man thinking, and dissatisfied with his own thoughts."

"What happened next?"

"You roused yourself on a sudden, and you went straight out of the room."

"Did I close the door after me?"

"No. You passed out quickly into the passage, and left the door open."

"And then?"

"Then your light disappeared, and the sound of your steps died away, and I was left alone in the dark."

"Did nothing happen—from that time to the time when the whole house knew that the Diamond was lost?"

"Nothing."

"Are you sure of that? Might you not have been asleep a part of the time?"

"I never was. I never went back to my bed. Nothing happened until Penelope came in, at the usual time, in the morning."

I dropped my hand, and rose, and took a turn in the room. Every question that I could put had been answered. Every denial that I could desire to know had been placed before me. I had even reverted to the idea of sleep-walking, and the idea of intoxication; and, against the worthlessness of the one theory and the other had been proved—on the authority, this time, of the witness for whom I trusted me. What was to be said next? what was to be done next? There rose the horrible fact of the Theft—the one visible, tangible object that confronted me, in the midst of the impenetrable darkness which enveloped all besides. Not a glimpse of light to guide me. When I had possessed myself of Rosanna Spearman's secret at the Shivering Sand. And not a glimpse of light now, when I had appealed to Rachel herself, and had heard the fateful story of the night from her own lips.

She was the first, this time, to break the silence.

"Well?" she said, "you have asked, and I have answered. You have made me hope something from all this. Have you hoped something from it. What have you to say now?"

The tone in which she spoke warned me that my influence over her was lost influence once more.

We went to look at what happened on my birthday night, together," she went on; "and we were then to understand each other. Have we done that?"

She voiced pitilessly for my reply. In answering her I committed a fatal error—I let the exasperating bitterness of my situation get the better of my self-control. Rashly and unjustly I reproached her for the silence which had kept me until that moment in ignorance of the truth.

"If you had spoken when you ought to have spoken," I began; "if you had done me the common justice to explain yourself—"

She broke in on me with a cry of fury. The few words I had said seemed to have lashed her on the instant into a frenzy of rage.

"Explain myself!" she repeated. "Oh! is there another man like this in the world? I spare him, when my heart is breaking; I screen him when my own character is at stake; and he—of all human beings, he—turns on me now, and tells me that I ought to have explained myself! After believing in him as I did, after loving him as I did, after thinking of him by day, and dreaming of him by night—he wonders why I didn't charge him with his disgrace the first time we met! My heart's darling, you are a Thief! My hero whom I love and honor, you have crept into my room under cover of the night, and stolen my Diamond!" That is what I ought to have said. You villain, you mean, mean, mean villain, I would have lost fifty Diamonds rather than see your face lying to me, as I see it lying now!"

I took up my hat. In mercy to her—yes! I can honestly say it—in mercy to her, I turned away without a word, and opened the door by which I had entered the room.

She followed, and watched the door out of my hand; she closed it, and pointed back to the place that I had left.

"No!" she said. "Not yet! It seems that I owe a justification of my conduct to you. You shall stay and hear it. Or you shall stoop to the lowest infamy of all, and force your way out."

It wrung my heart to see her; it wrung my heart to hear her. I obeyed her sign—it was all I could do—that I submitted myself to her will.

The crimson flush of anger began to fade out of her face, as I went back, and took my chair in silence. She waited a little, and steadied herself. Then she went on, without a sign of feeling was discernible in her. She spoke without looking at me. Her hands were fast clasped in her lap, and her eyes were fixed on the ground.

"I ought to have done you the common justice to explain myself," she said, repeating my own words. "You shall see whether I did try to do you justice or not. I told you just now that I never slept, and never returned to my bed, after you had left my sitting-room. It's useless to trouble you by dwelling on what I thought—and which I unhappily did not change—I will only tell you what I did when time enough had passed to help me to recover myself. I refrained from alarming the house, and telling every body what had happened—as I ought to have done. In spite of what I had seen I was fond enough of you to believe—no matter what! —any impossibility, rather than admit it to my own mind that you were deliberately a thief. I thought and thought—and I ended in writing to you.

"I never received the letter."

"I know you never received it. Wait a little, and you shall hear why. My letter would have told you nothing openly. It would not have roused you for life. I left it to work into some other person's hands. It would only have said—in a manner which you yourself could not possibly have mistaken—that I had reason to know you were in debt, and that it was in my experience and in my mother's experience of you, that you were not very discreet in your scrupulous about how you got money when you were hard up. I would then have transferred the hint of the French leaver, and you would have known what I referred to. If you had read on with some attention after that, you would have come to an offer I had to make to you—the offer, privately (not a word, mind, to be said openly about it between us), of the best part of a hundred a sum of money as I could get.—And I would have got it!" she exclaimed, her color beginning to rise again, and her eyes looking up at me once more. "I would have pledged the Diamond myself, if I could have got the money in no other way! In those words, I warned you. Wait! I did more than that. I arranged with Penelope to give you the letter when nobody was near. I planned to shut myself into my bedroom, and to have the sitting-room left open, and empty all the morning. And I hoped—oh! oh! my heart aches and sinks when I think how I hoped—that you would take the opportunity, and put the Diamond back secretly in the drawer."

I attempted to speak. She lifted her hand impatiently and stopped me. In the rapid alternations of her temper, her anger was beginning to rise again. She got up from her chair and approached me.

"I know what you are going to say," she went on. "You are going to remind me that you never received my letter. I can tell you why. I tore it up."

"For what reason?" I asked.

"For the best of reasons. I preferred tearing it up to throwing it away upon such a man as you! While you had the first chance offered me in the morning? Just as my little plan was complete, what did I hear? I heard that you were [illegible]—were in possession, in the house in fetching the police. You were the active man; you were the leader; you were working harder than any of them to recover the jewel! You even carried your audacity far enough to ask to speak to me about the loss of the Diamond—me, who had myself been robbed and stolen; the Diamond which was all the time in your own hands! After that proof of your horrible falseness and cunning I tore up my letter. But even then—even when I was maddened by the searching and questioning of the policeman, whom you had sent to question them, there was some infatuation in my mind which wouldn't let me believe it of you. I said to myself, 'He has played his vile farce before every body else in the house. Let me try if he has a part left before Me.' Somehow I got my way out on the terrace. I went down to the terrace, forced myself to look at you; I forced myself to speak to you. Have you forgotten what I said?"

I might have answered that I remembered every word of it. But with no purpose, at that moment, would the answer have served.

How could I tell her that what she had said had astonished me, had distressed me, had suggested to me that she was in a state of dangerous nervous excitement, had even roused a moment's doubt in my mind whether the loss of the jewel was as much a mystery to her as to the rest of us—but had never once given me an inkling of any motive for a theft? Without the shadow of a proof to produce in vindication of my innocence, how could I persuade her that I knew no more than the veriest stranger could I have known of what was really in her thoughts when she spoke to me on the terrace?

"It may suit your convenience to forget; it suits my convenience to remember," she went on.

"I know what I said—for I considered it with myself before I said it. I gave you one opportunity after another of owning the truth. I left nothing unsaid that I could say—short of actually telling you that I knew you had committed the theft. And all the return you made was to look at me with the pretense of astonishment, and your false face of innocence—just as you have looked at me to-day; just as you are looking at me now! Do you see me plainly, knowing you at last for what you were—for what you are—as base a wretch as ever walked the earth?"

"If you had spoken out at the time you might have left me, Rachel, knowing that you had a cruelly wounded woman to answer for."

"If I had spoken out before other people, she retorted, with another burst of indignation, "you would have been disgraced for life! If I had spoken out to no ears but yours, you would have denied it, as you are denying it now! Do you think I should have believed you? Would a man hesitate at a lie, who had done what I saw you do—who had behaved about it after as you had behaved? I tell you again, I shrank from the horror of hearing you lie, after the horror of seeing you thieve. You talk as if this was a common occurrence, which a few words might have set right! Well! the misunderstanding is as at end. Is the thing set right? No! the thing is just where it was. I don't believe you now! I don't believe you found the nightgown, and don't believe in Rosanna Spearman's lie, too, I don't believe a word you have said. You stole it—I saw you! You affected to help the police—I saw you! You pledged the Diamond to the money-lender in London—I am sure of it! You cast the suspicion of your disgrace (thanks to your confession!) on an innocent man! You fled to the Continent with your plunder the next morning! After all the vileness, there was left one thing more you could do. You could come here with a last falsehood on your lips—you could come here and tell me that I have wronged you!"

If I had staid a moment more, I knew not what words might have escaped me which I should have regretted with vain repentance and regret. I passed by her and opened the door for the second time. For the second time —with the same unsteadiness of a roused woman —she caught me by the arm and barred my way out.

"Let me go, Rachel," I said. "It will be better for both of us. Let me go."

The hysterical passion swelled in her bosom—her quarrelsome breath came breathing almost heat on my face, as she held me back at the door.

"Why did you come here?" she persisted, desperately. "Tell me again—why did you come here? Are you afraid I shall expose you? Now you are a rich man, now you have got a place in the world, are you not marry the first lady in the land—are you afraid I shall say the words which I have never said yet to any body but you? I shall say them now! I can't suppose you! I am worse, if worse can be, than you are yourself." Sobs and tears burst from her. She struggled with them fiercely: she held me more and more firmly. "I can't tear you out of my heart," she said, "even now! You may trust to it, I am a proud, shameful weakness which can only struggle against you in this way! She suddenly let go of me—she threw up her hands and sank down frantically in the air. "Any other living woman would shrink from the disgrace of touching him!" she exclaimed. "Oh, God, I despise myself even more heartily than I despise him!"

The tears were forcing their way into my eyes in spite of me—the horror of it was to be endured no longer.

"You shall know that you have wronged me, yet," I said. "Or you shall never see me again!"

With those words I left her. She started up from the chair on which she had dropped the moment before, and stared up—like noble creature!—and followed me across the outer room, with a last merciful word at parting.

"Franklin!" she said. "I forgive you! Oh, Franklin! Franklin! we shall never meet again! Say you forgive me!"

I turned, so as to let my face show her that I was past speaking—I turned, and waved my hand, and saw her dimly, as in a vision, through the tears that had conquered me at last.

The next moment the worst bitterness of it was over. I was out in the garden again. I saw her, and heard her, no more.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.—EVERETT COMING.

MOTHER HUBBARD lived in a little yellow house with a little white door, and a row of sugar-maples before it. She did not keep a dog, but she kept two pigs and seven children.

There was never in the whole house so much as ten dollars in ready money unless it was just before tax-day; but as nobody in town, except the big butcher, the village merchant, and, maybe, the doctor, was any better off, her position and relative wealth was as though she had lived on Beacon Street, kept a carriage, and never did any thing so vulgar as to walk across the Common.

Indeed she did keep a carriage: a high-backed wagon, with yellow body and without springs; and she kept a meek fat horse that did the family plowing, and was also family pleasure horse. The last duty was not severe enough, for nobody ever went anywhere to mill and meeting, and once in a month or so to the store in a neighboring village.

Mrs. Hubbard spun the yarn, wove the cloth, and made the clothes for these seven small bodies. She cooked their dinners, mended their trousers, kept the house, and never thought of help from any but her own two hands. Up in the morning with the robins, she never stopped until the went to bed, where, fortunately for her taxed body, Puritan thrift sent her at robin-time also, which was quite a saving in candles, you see. And every body has heard how much a penny saved amounts to. Indeed, Mrs. Hubbard's wealth, as it lay in her pocket-book, chiefly consisted in this sort of negative riches.

One May morning, when the vine-buds were swelling, and the maples were trying to learn to hide a beautiful secret in their rough hearts, Mother Hubbard's eldest son Everett looked from his bedroom window, and saw the grass that had been working hard for a month to make its way in the world covered with fast-falling snow. It was a very pretty sight, as though the yard had been covered with sea-green frosted illusion; but of course no such thought was suggested to Everett. In the first place, such a thing as "frosted illusion" suggested had never been heard of at Cranberry Beach; and if any girl in town had trimmed her hat with it Everett's mind was not of such sentimental order. In that regard he did better credit to Mother Hubbard's training.

"Can't pile wood to-day," said his practical thoughts. "May as well take the time to go for the things ordered from store at Wilmington."

Accordingly he went.

"Can't go with you? Can't I?" cried one of the loud-lunged children.

"Oh no, not to-day! It is too cold and too stormy. Wait till some time when I build a fire under the kettle and then you can come in and go nice as a cotton hat," replied Everett, tying a red tippet around his neck.

The little house was cold enough not to expect such a fairy tale would really come true, but yet young enough and poetical enough to be consoled by the thought that when the fire would blow window thinking just how the fire would look and what a ride that would be sitting by it, as the two raised horses, and the sun disappeared in the storm, and Everett in the high-backed wagon, with a green umbrella over his head, started up the road together.

Everett had not gone far, only down the first hill and around the first corner, when in the middle of the road he met Franklin Blake, which the road ran, a chaise, one of the first ever seen in Cranberry Heath, passed him, drawn by two splendid horses. As it passed, Franklin looked out to bow with a touch of his hat and a flourish of his hand, and Everett saw him to be from Boston, the son of his mother's employer.

"See that!" said Everett, aloud, in his surprise. "That comes from going to the city. I mean to go."

So all the rest of the way to and from Wilmington he made plans, and made them to such purpose that when he got home he asked Bryan Kitchen returned to the city Everett went with him.

And this was the beginning of a little style and an occasional luxury that crept into Mother Hubbard's household. Every August Everett came home with the first peaches and pears on his head, a gay tie on his neck, pomatum enough to oil a wagon on his hair, and the smell of the city about him. He always brought a box full of loaf-sugar and oranges, a superior article of tea, fancy crackers, and fresh fruit; and mother could tell, by the smell, shameful weakness books with bright covers, and a dress or cap for his mother. So that Everett's coming was like the coming of a rich relation.

"What a shocking fence, mother! you have seen it fall away board by board, and you don't realize how horribly it looks as one does just from abroad. And, mother, the house needs paint badly outside and in," said he, upon one of these August days.

"I know it, Everett, but I have not the money to spare in this way," replied Mother Hubbard.

"But I have," replied Everett, rattling some money, mother," replied Everett, rattling some pennies and a silver pencil-case in his pocket.

Mother Hubbard said no more, but started off to her churning; and the next day Mr. Beggs and Mr. M'Fadden came, the one with his whitewash and paint-pots, and the other with boards and nails. And when the work was done the workmen were so mercenary they remembered Everett.

"Mother shall not be troubled about it," said Everett, who had only what money he needed to talk him back to the city and to buy some cologne and candy for his sisters. So he cast about him.

"There is Cummings. I can get it of Cummings," he decided.

Mr. Cummings was a sort of rural broker. He did not keep an office with a sign over the door, as some brokers do; but he had money, and he stood at the corners and looked to the time when every body would owe him, and to see who was coming; and one day he saw Everett Hubbard coming.

"Can you spare me a hundred or so for a few days, Mr. Cummings?" began Everett. "Just starting in business, as I have done, make me a little short, and if you can let me have that amount for—well, call it two months if we make quite at all; I am not particular about the time."

Mr. Cummings took his hands from his pockets, twitched down his vest, and put his hands back into his pockets again. "I should like to accommodate you first-rate," he answered, in a sprawling tone, "but I haven't any such sum of money by me. However, I don't know but I might get it over at Hampton. I wouldn't mind riding over there and trying it the last of the week, if your mother will put her name on the note too."

"The last of the week won't be soon enough. I must go back to the city to-morrow night, at farthest," replied Everett.

Mr. Cummings pushed up his hat and rubbed his head thoughtfully with his forefinger. "I should be glad to accommodate," he repeated. "And I am not sure but I can get the money of one or two of the neighbors. If you will bring me down the note this evening, with your mother's name on it, I will let you know what luck I have had. The old lady has been very kind in sickness to my folks, and I am willing to do any thing to accommodate."

So, at sunset, Everett came again, bringing the note, with his name in such a bold, strong hand that it seemed as good as the gold almost of itself, and endorsed in his mother's hard-working, conscientious handwriting.

"A mere form, mother: I shall send up the money as soon as I get back to the city, but old Cummings will be better satisfied—and he is right. These business forms should be respected by business men," said Everett.

Once back, however, among the duties and pleasures of his city life Everett forgot such a trifle as his, until six months after, when one of his brothers wrote, "Mr. Cummings says tell you when are you going to pay him that money?"

"Tell him I shall be up before very long—in July, or in August, sure—and I will see him then. I suppose he doesn't care as long as it is upon interest," replied Everett. And one or two days was sent down before breakfast to tell Mr. Cummings; for Mother Hubbard was so contracted in her ideas that a debt was to be paid as soon as it was due.

When, however, Everett really came she felt at once relieved and easy, and so did Mr. Cummings.

"How about that money, Everett?" said he, one day.

"That money? Oh yes, Mr. Cummings. I don't happen to have it by me now, but I will hand it to you before I leave," replied Everett. However, it did not prove to be convenient at any time, and such a trifle made little difference either way. But Mr. Cummings, although he needed it no more than he needed the tail of a peacock, liked to look at his money pretty often, and accordingly grew uneasy.

"Mr. Hubbard, when is Everett coming?" he asked, as they came up the hill together from a five o'clock service" in the school-house one Sunday.

"I don't expect him before another summer, if we are all well, and nothing happens," answered Mrs. Hubbard, who always kept an eye-saw Mr. Cummings as though the hundred dollars was written on her forehead.

"I was rather depending on the money to use. I am thinking of buying some fat cattle this fall. I suppose it might come through safely by mail; but I guess I will send that way as soon as I can." Perhaps he will see somebody coming up this way; and possibly I can borrow somewhere just to make a few days' hire."

If the hundred dollars had been all coined in rich half-pennies they need not have pressed heavier as they did on Mother Hubbard's heart as she went on, with her scissors dangling from a long cord to the string of her apron that she had gotten when she was getting supper, and forgotten, in the press of work and hurry, to take off.

After this not even little Guy could go down the road without being asked by Mr. Cummings, who seemed to stand at the corners on purpose to say it, "When is Everett coming?"

Summer after summer Everett came and Everett went. He always brought a box or two of city dainties, for he was generous, and a train of city friends, for he was social; but it never happened quite convenient to "hand the money" to Mr. Cummings. In fact, he was thoughtless of the insignificant affair excepting when Mr. Cummings himself spoke of it; and it so fell out that at these times he had important use for the money, or "hadn't it by" him at the moment. But he sent a box of very nice oranges to Mr. Cummings, and gave Mrs. Cummings a new cameo pin large enough for a coach window, with a setting twice as yellow as gold.

Then the years passed, and Everett's younger brothers, one by one, went out into the busy world, each to find a wider place for work than Cranberry Heath, until Mother Hubbard was left with only her girls.

One April night at frog-peep Mrs. Hubbard was mixing bread in the pantry.

"Mother, get your hands out of the flour as soon as you can. Somebody is knocking very hard," cried her daughter Gratia, who was afflicted from her birth, and had never walked.

"Yes, yes, directly," answered Mrs. Hubbard. Then, after a moment of stirring and scraping, she came out with flour on her nose and a quick, thrifty step; and opening the green and white front-door, there stood Mr. Cummings and his dumpy wife, who always walked like a wash-tub drawn by a string.

That they had come for a ceremonious call was evident by their coming to the front instead of the kitchen door, and by knocking instead of walking in; accordingly Mother Hubbard took them into the parlor.

For a while they talked over the neighborhood news, of who had cleaned house, who had measles, and who had "killed;" but Mr. Cummings took advantage of the first pause to put the usual question.

"I understand Everett is going to get married. When is he coming up?"

"I don't expect him before hot weather. About the time he generally comes," replied Mother Hubbard, fairly conscious of what was written in her forehead.

"Like enough it will be convenient for him to take up that note now. Folks are mean in these pretty flush of money when they are getting married. I know of a chance to get nine per cent., and I should like to have it paid first rate. You are beholden for it, I suppose you know, neighbor Hubbard; still, I wouldn't like to press it to your inconvenience."

"Yes, Mr. Cummings, I will see that you have your money," replied Mother Hubbard, desperately; and immediately upon that Mr. Cummings nudged his wife that it was "time to be going; cows to fodder and turn out yet to-night."

So they went out into the moist, musical evening, and Mother Hubbard staid in her kitchen with her crippled daughter, her work, and her troubled thoughts. Her boys were all prospering and all ready to help: but she was never a woman to ask assistance for her own, if she could do for herself; and she lay awake that night and thought.

"I hate to part with any of the homestead: but I suppose Chatterbrand would be glad of the west wood lot. There is nothing I can spare any better. No: I can't sell Dolly, nor one of the cows. The wood lot must go this time," she decided at last, just as the robins began to call at dawn of day.

The day after Mr. Chatterbrand bought the land for half the value of its timber, Mr. Cummings had the money, and when Everett came in the next August with his pretty bride he brought six cans of orange and pine-apple jelly, and the most beautiful gold-lined berry-spoon that had ever been seen in Cranberry Heath.

TENNYSON'S POETRY.

IN the glow of Tennyson's light Wordsworth's has paled almost to the point of extinction. There are so few instances of resemblance between the two poets, that it is hardly worth while to point out the difference. Wordsworth's poetry is not slowly gathered out of meditation on external objects: it springs from a creative force, a vital inspiration and impetuous movement of the brain or heart, or both, which agitates every fiber thought, and constrains the outward form of existence to sympathy with the ever varying moods. Nature is compelled to consort with his profound genius. Under his dominion she is seldom suffered to rest. . . . All her attributes undergo a change in the transitions of his swift emotion. The sky passes from a mere azure, scattering dust, and Life a fury, slinging flame: in another, the stars are innumerable cold, pitiless eyes; in another, the blossoms dropped from the laburnum are wells of fire; in almost all there is a stir and glow, endless vibration, without any apparent cause of motion. Wordsworth's "inner hour" is unknown to Tennyson; his thought is passionate, not still. All his pictures are intensest. His epithets are colored as with Turner's; his piercing vision descries objects unseen by ordinary eyes, assembles images from far-off worlds, and originates a wholly novel order of beauty: for the spice of a single line. In his power of concentration he is equalled by only one other poet, that one is Dante. But while Dante has also sustained power of Diction, because he has not the same capability of repose. It is in the prophet's choice of words that he asserts his right of invention, and woe be to the mortal man who seeks to hang on to that flaming car! Yet how many words there are—how many, dipped in the living wheels, rise but a short way to fall down in a fatal swoon, which leaves them delirious forever! That they should mistake delirium for the spirit of the prophet is a thing worthy of lamentation, but it is inevitable that their mistake should last till they have passed away from use, and posterity has decided on their claims. What matter? . . . say some indulgent critics. Why should they not enjoy a pleasure of delirium? And if they works obtain a temporary popularity, who should grudge it to them? To this we reply—It is of infinite matter to art that bad art should be suppressed, and it is a subject for serious regret that a great poet should ever pander to the impulse to an evil fashion. The school of Tennyson has grown out as the school of Wordsworth was spiritual. A tendency to excess is manifest in America no passionate sensation, which distinguishes Tennyson as a poet, is so exaggerated by his disciples as to approach insanity. They are in a perpetual whirlwind; their consciousness of life consists in successive storms of passion; they are perpetually on the fiery tiptoe of delight, according to Wordsworth, never did betray the heart that loved her, assaults them with perpetual rage and unlimited ecstasy. No peaceful green spots for them! Every blade of grass is a tongue of fire; every branch of a tree is an inimical, cruel arm; the very stones like forked pales; the morning's dew-drop is a scalding tear; the heavens are either lurid or so importunately blue that they affect the mind as a sense of oppression; suns are all streaked in crimson as with blood; kisses are red; thoughts are red; corn-fields are sanguinary with the fatal poppy's dye; you move in a general conflagration; trouble and heat prevail over where; nothing is comfortable, and nothing is cool. The compositions which the poet seek from this state of things is an occasional excess of bliss—a swooning under too much sweetness—a joy prolonged upon the edge of pain—a languor generated by overwhelming perfume—an intoxication proceeding from too deep a draught of beauty—a hasty agony from the sight of a woman's hair—a general smothering under silken hangings and purple couches. This poisonous luxury may be welcome as a variety of pain, but it is very unlike peace. It is mere physical excitement; and it has no tendency to exalt the imagination.

Another fault of this school of poetry is a prodigality of imagery. Images succeed each other so fast that they cease to make an impression; and the mind of the reader is overloaded with a confusion of splendors. Tennyson uses more than it gives, and leaves the stimulated imagination with space for fresh weaving, and a margin for some further embroideries of the fancy. When this is done there is a spiritual union between the poet and his disciple; and there is a great delight afforded by the consciousness of an intellectual expansion and growing sensibilities. A little song introduced into a work called "Thanatos," by a writer too little known as yet, may be quoted here as a model of this kind of excellence:

"Alas! how easily things go wrong—
A sigh too much, or a kiss too long,
And there follows a mist and a weeping rain,
And life is never the same again.

"Alas! how hardly things go right—
The hard task watch, in a summer night,
For the sigh we seek for, and the kiss will stay,
And the summer night is a winter day."

There is a whole history of sweet sorrow suggested in these two simple stanzas—suggested, not told. The reader's fancy is touched with the sad and tender accompanying strain: not limited by exact details of the broken promise, the lost hope, or the shame and the separation. A profound truth permeates the subjects thus dealt with; it leaves food for tender meditation and sacred pity. The seed of sympathy thus dropped in the heart finds room to strike deep roots and bring forth fruit and flower.

An author of the more fashionable school, the school of excess, would never have left the topic so unfettered. How many cold maxims, how many crimson suns, how many quivering stars, how many flashes of hot blood, how many stings and agonies, how many images of anguish and slaughter and rapine, how many curses on false creeds and dispensations on criminal codes and racking winds, and cracking leaves, and sea storms, and fiery embracings, and wild pulsations, and a poet would have brought to bear upon the song, till the listener sank beneath the burden, unable to conceive another idea!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE SEAT OF CIVILIZATION—A chair.

A STORY OF SCIENCE.
BY ONE OF OUR KNOW-NOTHING AGENTS.

A philosopher sat in his easy-chair,
Looking as grave as Milton;
He wore a cotton umbrella over his air
As he Canada balsam split on
A strip of glass, and folded to prepare
For a mite taken out of his Stilton.

He took the strip from out of his care,
And settled the focus rightly,
The light flashed back from the mirror's face
Came glimmering upward brightly.
He put the object with the nice place,
And fixed on the cover tightly.

He turned the instrument up and down,
With patience, severe and sage,
Exclaimed—as he gazed with a puzzled frown,
"Good gracious! and Holy-ioly!
The sight is enough to alarm the town—
A mite is a monster mighty!"

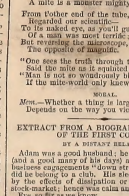
From Owther end of the tube, the mite
Regarded our scientific—
To be mild—as a very queer, the sight
Of a man was most terrific;
But remarking the microscope, made him quite
The opposite of pacific.

"One sees the truth through this tube so tall,"
Said the mite as it squinted through it
"Man is not so wondrously big, after all,
If the mite-world have but its due."

MORAL.

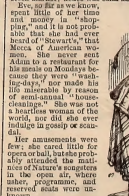
MITE.—Whether a thing is large or small,
Depends on the way you view it!

EXTRACT FROM A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE FIRST COUPLE.



A HUSBAND'S HEATING.

Adam was a good husband; he spent his evenings (and a good many of his days) at home; he had no favorite "down town" resort "down town" after dark, nor did he belong to a club. His sleep was undisturbed by the effects of dissipation or nightmares of the stock-market; hence was calm and refreshing.



Eve, for all we know, spent little of her time "down town" in "shopping," and it is not probable that she ever heard of "Stewart's," that of Mesrs. Arthur & Leech was unknown. She never sent Adam out to a restaurant for his meals on Mondays because they were "washing-days," nor made his life miserable by visions of semi-annual "housecleanings." She was not a heartless woman of the world, and did not even indulge in gossip or scandal.

Her amusements were few; she cared little for opera or ball, but she probably attended the ministrations of Nature's songsters in the open air, where usher, programme, and reserved seats were unknown.

Eve was frugal, contented, and happy, moving serenely in first circles, and undoubtedly Adam loved her devotedly. Mr. Milton, who appears to have witnessed the family life pretty intimately at such, and we have no doubt he knew. We regret to add that misfortune eventually came upon this happy family. Eve unfortunately became involved in a distinction in first principles, principally in which Adam was ignorant, and their property, including the homestead, passed out of their possession, and they were obliged to seek a residence elsewhere.

BEFORE THE BURLINGAME MISSION.

AFTER THE BURLINGAME MISSION.

A peddler in his cart, overtaking another of his class, was addressed.

"Hallo, what do you carry?"

"Drugs and medicines," was the reply. "Go ahead—what do you carry?"

"I carry grave-stones."

THE LIFE OF AN INDIAN.—DRAWN BY W. M. CARY.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE PEDDLER'S WAGON.—DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.—[SEE PAGE 394.]

THE PEDDLER'S WAGON.

WHEREVER there are few or no stores, but wherever there are civilized women with the civilized taste for dress, the peddler's wagon is certain to be found, and proof of the accuracy of our engraving to be adduced on any fine summer morning. The accuracy will not, however, be disputed; but all our distant country readers will smile their recognition of the truthfulness of our engraving on page 395. The peddler's wagon—that occasional visitor at the farm-house—has stopped before the substantial dwelling of a substantial farmer, and the peddler is displaying his stock, which embraces every thing from tunnel-hair shawls to gummy cigars, to the young lady of the mansion, while the rest of the family look, or hasten forward to look on.

PATIENCE WILSON, QUAKERESS.

To relief against the circumstances that define one's lot in life, to feel out of place in one's own home, to revolt against parental instruction, and find inclination and judgment running away from that have become invested with sacredness in our childhood, is not attended with comfort or ease or peace of mind.

Patience Wilson, a birthright member of the Society of Friends, was not comfortable, or easy, or at peace as she arrayed herself for the Sunday morning meeting and subjected her plain drab dress and simple straw bonnet to a disparaging scrutiny. Those was a violent mind in one of a young girl who had passed that way half an hour before—a mind whose delicate muslin dress was sprinkled all over with exquisite pink rosebuds nestling in green leaves—a girl who wore soft lace about her neck, a bonnet of gold and garnets at her throat, and on her head a bonnet with loops and streamers of bright ribbon and a cluster of sweet French flowers for the facetrimming. Patience Wilson looked down on her drab dress, and her lip curled. "Such a deadlooking thing!" she muttered. "It has the same sackcloth-and-ashes look for all the world. Bah! I hate these colorless, lifeless shades, and I do like bright hues and intense coloring. I wonder will be such a plain-looking girl if I dared consult my own taste," she said, complacently, picking up a cluster of coral roses that lay upon the toilet stand and placing them inside her straw bonnet against her wavy black hair. Then, with a touch of the comb, she reset the waves of glossy hair, brushed them a little back from her temples, and the mirror could see no longer smooth and sleek, but rippling and waving after the way of the world.

"I wouldn't be such a plain-looking girl," Patience Wilson repeated, with a smile, "if I only looks for all the world like Katie Hunter's, and I don't know how to use crimping-irons and curling-tongs. What a pity that I can't—"

The arrival of a figure at the door checked the soliloquy and made it unnecessary.

"We are waiting for thee, Patience," said the elderly, grave-faced woman at the door, and the dialogue was no longer a matter of speculation.

"Yes, in a minute," Patience answered, smoothing her hair hastily and taking the scarlet berries from her bonnet with a sudden jerk.

The woman at the door looked on gravely. There was grief in her eye, and when she spoke there was a world of reproof in her tone. "I am afraid thy heart is going after the vanities of the world," she said, sadly.

Patience Wilson's face grew crimson, and she replied, somewhat resentfully, "There can be no recall a bunch of berries a vanity, and, as for the curl in my hair, it is natural."

"Yes, thy hair was always a trial to thy mother and me," remarked the woman at the door. "It never would lie smooth and sleek five minutes at a time, but was always frizzing up, making thee look fit for a scarecrow. That's right —put most way out. If I am in my place I would use a little oil. The next time I see quinces I'll save thee some of the seeds, and then can make a wash to keep thy hair in place. There is nothing looks more discreditable in a young girl than to wear her hair standing in all directions. Now hurry up, Patience. It looks wrong not to enter the meeting after it has begun. Couldn't thee straighten that little curl down by the side of thy face? It looks careless and ugly."

"I never can get ready in the world with thee looking at me," exclaimed Patience Wilson, impatiently. She seized the offending curl and thrust it behind her ear with no gentle motion. It was the one limit she took she had vowed to relieve the plainness of her face. "There!" she added, in a vexed tone, "I hope I look prim enough to suit you."

The woman at the door sighed heavily, as she answered, "Thee should be a pattern to thy younger brothers and sisters, Patience. Thee should be worthy of thy name. But I must look at thee any longer. It is getting late, and the singing must be just as Zadie's nearly an hour ago. Come, Rebecca," she said, addressing a girl a few years Patience's junior who had just entered—"come with me, and don't hinder thy sister."

"I won't hinder her," answered the girl. "And I will come as she is ready."

She seated herself on the chair by the side of her sister's little mirror with intent to watch her.

Patience cast one over the girl with the same disparaging scrutiny she had bestowed on her own dress.

"That looks like a dud," was the severe comment of this girl whose name was Patience, and who was expected to be a pattern.

"Why Aunt Phebe said my hair was combed very nicely, and that I looked as neat as a pin!" exclaimed the younger girl, in amazement.

"Bah! We Quaker girls all look as if we had been soaked in water and dried in the sun until we had faded to a lifeless drab, and then been smeared over with shiny starch, and ironed flat and smooth," exclaimed Patience. "Thee has got the most lovely complexion for blue!"

The young girl gave a sidelong glance into the mirror. "Thee would like us to dress like the Hunter girls, wouldn't thee?" she asked.

"Something that way," answered Patience. "Did thee see Katie go by? She looked like such a beauty."

"Aunt Phebe said she was tricked out like a popinjay," said the sister, dissentingly.

"Oh 'pshaw!" exclaimed Patience Wilson. "Aunt Phebe don't believe in any thing outside of our meeting-house. For my part, I believe in some things at St. John's."

"Why, John Duane!" said the sister, with a meaning smile.

Patience colored slightly, and made a movement toward the door. "Come," she said, hastily, "Aunt Phebe and mother are half-way to meeting."

So they were, and talking gravely of Patience.

"She is a great burden on my mind," said Aunt Phebe. "The pomps and vanities of the world are tempting her, and she is unsettled."

A shadow passed over the mother's Madonna face. "Patience is young, thee knows," was her mild answer. The mother's heart had not long blind to the dissatisfaction in her daughter's mind, and the rebellion in her life; but self-extenuation is her nature, and she finds an excuse and motive for her child's error. "Patience is young," she repeated, seeing that her sister made no reply.

"It's a pity Patience Wilson is not Eli Gardner," said Aunt Phebe, after a minute's pause. "He is a good young man, and a consistent Friend, and it would be a fitting for Patience to be settled in life. Eli would make a steady woman of her."

"I don't know," answered the mother, wearily. "I have my doubts about—"

She paused as if she feared her speech might not find favor at the meeting-house.

"About what?" asked the elder sister, somewhat sharply. "They surely hasn't any doubts about Eli Gardner? He is one of the salt of the earth."

"No, I don't doubt Eli, but I doubt his power to make Patience love him," replied the mother.

"Now, Jane! thee don't mean to say that thee intends to uphold Patience in any of her whims and vagaries," exclaimed Aunt Phebe, reshakingly. "It is thy duty, as a brand plucked from the burning, to save thy child."

The two women stopped at the door. Phebe Morgan's words had given Jane Wilson food for thought, and she walked along with a face profoundly meditative.

"It is the spirit," Phebe Morgan said to herself. "Sister Jane will preach to-day."

Into the meeting-house Phebe compelled Patience and Rebecca Wilson, after a silence like that of the grave had fallen on the little group assembled. The meeting-house was crowded, as was noted by Phebe Morgan when, taking the hand, her face veiled by the cold, white wood-work, the uncarpeted floor, the unadorned walls and benches, the look was full of undisguised disparagement. Then Patience's mood was no better. She lingered in her place, she pulled off her gloves and tapped impatiently with her shoes—and was, to use her aunt's figure, as uneasy as a fish out of water.

It was a correct figure. A fish out of water—and that Patience Wilson sitting in the little meeting-house with her gloves off, and her pretty little Gothic church of St. John's, where another kind of worshippers assembled. She had never been there but twice, but the love of it was in her heart, as artists know a picture not often seen is not studied well. She was picturing to herself now the altar with its gilded candlesticks, the dainty frescoed walls, the fluted pillars, the windows of stained green and blue and gold, the carpeted aisles and cushioned pews. At length the nervous movements ceased, and Patience Wilson sat in a dreamy quietude. She had forgotten where she was, and in imagination heard the mellow light from the stained windows fell upon her, and she was wrapped in a bright glow that was the loud ascription—Gloria Tibi Domine! but not forgetful of him who sat before the organ, and with his hands, fingers, feet, played the pipes and keys. John Duane, organist, was the spirit that in St. John's in whom Rebecca Wilson had said shrewdly Patience's interest lay. There was another at St. John's whom she did not forget—Katie Hunter, with the rose-bud sprinkled dress, the lace and gold, the bright ribbons and flowers and scarlet flowers. Katie Hunter sang alto to John Duane's playing, and Patience Wilson did not like her. Suddenly Patience Wilson came out of her reverie with a guilty start.

"A brand plucked from the burning" were the words that fell on her ear, and that had not ceased lovingly over her in infancy, and blessed her all her life. A very busily listened attentively, for Jane Wilson was preaching, and she was one of the few faithful ones in her Society: a woman who in her Madonna face wore the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit—a woman who clung tenaciously to the faith delivered to her fathers, and was in all things a pillar and ornament to her sect.

A brand plucked from the burning!" You guessed from the fervor of the woman's manner, and from an insight into character that is derived alone from experience, that this woman was speaking from experimental knowledge. You guessed intuitively that this woman's calm had come after great storm, that the spiritual height on which she stood had been attained after temporal rough places; you guessed almost that this woman had been herself a brand plucked from the burning.

The spiritualized face often sought her daughter's, and then you saw how much alike they were. You could easily fancy that the Madonna face had looked like Patience Wilson's once. Would Patience Wilson's ever attain the holy calm of Jane Wilson's? Phebe Morgan had hope. She remembered when Jane, her younger sister, had been a great trial to her, when her heart was all unsettled and full of rebellion in her life. Contrasting that time with this when the woman spoke to the edification of all, she had hope for Patience. Indeed, with this experience, could they not save Patience from the rocks on which her mother's happiness had well-nigh wrecked? They must and would do it at all events. Unconsciously her eyes wandered over to the men's side, where sat Eli Gardner, brown-faced, hardhanded, honest, and a Friend. He was listening to Jane Wilson, but his eyes wandered ever and anon to Jane Wilson's daughter, and on him Phebe Morgan relied for assistance. Eli Gardner's mother, too, must play her part.

"Dorcas, I want thee to go home with me to dinner," said Phebe Morgan to the severe-faced woman who stood at Eli Gardner's side when the hand-shaking had dismissed the meeting.

Dorcas Gardner looked doubtfully at Eli Gardner.

"To be sure thee will go," said that young man, heartily. "I will drive down for thee this afternoon; and now I must thee, friend Morgan, and all of these young people, to bundle in my carry-all, and I will take them home. Come, girls!"

Patience Wilson drew back as she said, "Thank thee, but I had sooner walk."

Nonsense!" exclaimed Eli Gardner. "Save thy strength until thee needs it more. Besides, there is nobody to sit with me but thy little brother Ichy, and I want thee to see how my new team goes."

"They'd go bolt it is buggy!" exclaimed David Wilson, the precocious little brother.

Eli Gardner laughed. "Patience and I will try them in the buggy some day," he said.

"David," remonstrated Patience in a vexed tone, "thee shouldn't talk so. He picks up such horrid talk at the schools," she said, apologetically, to Eli Gardner.

"Humph! Billy Duane says bully," persisted David, "and I've heard thee say lots of times the Duanes were a fine family."

Patience but her lip, as was her wont when she was vexed.

"Hallon!" exclaimed David Wilson, "there comes John Duane, who makes the music up to St. John's. Golly! what a little sharp steeple that church has got! The boys call it Old Church of the Holy Tooth-pick. John has got one of the Hunter girls with him. Say, Patie, wouldn't thee like to have thy hair all kinked up like that, and red flowers in thy bonnet?"

Patience Wilson, frowning, said: "If thee isn't quiet, David, I will send thee."

It was a threat not to be disregarded. The boy lounged backward at his mother's Madonna face, and was still.

Patience looked after the two pedestrians who trigged on side by the side of the road. How pretty Katie Hunter was! she thought. She was not absolutely prettier than herself, but Patience knew that the Hunter's good points were brought out and intensified by harmonious colors and the modiste's skill, while her own— she glanced down at her drab dress, with the old disparaging look, and sighed. John Duane was so fond of bright tints and decided shades. He was such a lover of beauty. He was a fashionable man too—a man of the world, Aunt Phebe called him. He had mingled much in society, and had been abroad, was no studied Paris fashions, and made their purple and fine linen after the latest modes. He was a great lover of music. Under his skilful hands rare melodies were evolved, and to his careful ear no harmony was lost. He danced also. Moreover, he liked it. Katie Hunter was the most lovely beyond all things to dance with him, he knew such pretty feet. And she? She was a Quakeress, hedged on all sides by a peculiar people, who took the curl out of her hair, she said, sarcastically. John Duane was a star out of her sphere. What stars were in her sphere? She glanced down at Eli Gardner. He was the man of her mother's and Aunt Phebe's election; but she shook her head and drew away impatiently, as if to escape from her own thoughts that she did not hear Eli Gardner until he had addressed her twice.

"The girls are having picnic to Eagle Cliff—has thee heard of it?" he asked.

Patience shook her head. "No," she answered, absently.

"The young people will be sure to invite thee," Eli went on to say.

"I shall be sure not to go," Patience answered. "Oh no!" Eli Gardner remonstrated. "It does look so, I shan't care to."

Patience but her lip, and said in a vexed way, like that in which she spoke to her little brother: "I don't let me influence thee; I wouldn't for the world."

"But thee does," Eli Gardner began, turning his honest brown eyes on Patience Wilson's face.

Take care, or thee'll upset us!" shouted David Wilson, as the horses turned toward the widow Wilson's house, and Eli Gardner, coming back to his horses, left some things unsaid that were in his heart to say.

John Duane, coming to St. John's that afternoon, looked into the widow Wilson's front-yard, as was his custom and pleasure, and saw a trim little figure under the locust-trees that drew him by some secret attraction through the front-gate, and to the little clump of locusts.

"I want to see you a minute, Miss Patience," he said.

"Yes, certainly," answered Patience Wilson, in a confused way, blushing deeply at the amused smile that passed over the young man's face at her reply. "I don't mean that thee certainly wanted to see me," she added, biting her lips in her characteristic manner.

"But I do certainly want to see you," John Duane said, emphatically. "In this uncertain world there are few things more certain. What is more, I want to see you ten times when I get the chance than once. Our ways are so very different, Miss Patience."

"Yes," Patience answered. The difference of their ways had been the burden of her thoughts that day.

"I wanted to say you especially to invite you to join the walking party to Eagle Cliff on Thursday," John Duane explained. "The Hunters and Mortons, and most of the young people of St. John's, are going. I hope you are not going to refuse," he added, seeing the doubt on Patience's face.

"I don't know," Patience began.

"Oh, but you must go," John Duane urged. "I have made great calculations on having you there. I am going to drive my lovely invalid sister Susie around by the back road. I want you to see her, for I am sure you will like each other. But I must go. The choir at St. John's will be waiting for me. Good-by, Miss Patience, I am sanguine that I shall be greatly disappointed if you are not at Eagle Cliff on Thursday."

"I have decided to go to Eagle Cliff on Thursday," Patience Wilson said to Eli Gardner that afternoon, as he stood entering a marriage-block with his whip-lash.

The young man's face brightened visibly. "I am glad thee has changed thy mind," he said, earnestly.

"John Duane's sister Susie, the crippled one, is to be there," she explained. "And they say she is a lovely character, and I shall be glad to know her."

Eli Gardner's face fell. Patience Wilson had made her decision with reference to John Duane's sister, and because John he the motive power? Girls were past understanding, he reflected, and so, especially, was beyond his ability to make out. He, a wife, he hoped to solve the mystery of her nature.

As if women like Patience Wilson became wives of the men who were unable to read the riddle of their beings before marriage!

It was a gay party at Eagle Cliff. Patience Wilson looked on it from home among the young people of St. John's, and would have liked it ease but for John Duane and Susie, the invalid sister. Indeed, there was there with an infinitude of clustering ringlets under her pretty little hat, the gold and garnets at her throat, and a profusion also of bright lace for snow-white dress.

"Miss Hunter is a great belle," Susie Duane remarked, watching the gentlemen around her. Brother often says she appreciates the art of dress in its perfection. John is such a critic of ladies' dress."

The thin hands of the invalid were toying with Patience Wilson's hair. "What lovely hair!" she exclaimed, lifting the front locks from Patience's face and curling them into curls over her finger. "How it changes you!" she added, with a child's delight. "I know what John meant when he said you were pretty. He was greater than Katie Hunter's positive beauty. Now let me put some of these scarlet berries in your hair. Why, you look like Katie Hunter," throwing her crimson shawl over Patience's shoulder. "Katie Hunter is nowhere. No, don't take it off!" Susie Duane said, as Patience Wilson began her rapt face.

"I have nothing of it," Patience answered. "But it always stirs me deeply." She hummed the air the others had just dropped.

"How sweet!" exclaimed Susie Duane. "You must have a good ear."

"Such a quick appreciation and a fine ear," added John Duane, approvingly. "It is a great pity Miss Patience couldn't have some musical education. She should like to teach you music," he said, earnestly, turning to her.

"It would be hard labor," said Patience, in reply.

"A labor of love," whispered John Duane, drawing her arm in his and leading her away from the others.

Aunt Phebe opened the door for her niece that night. Patience had forgotten the curls on her forehead and the berries in her hair. With that light in her eye she might have been excused had she forgotten much more.

"Did Eli Gardner come home with thee?" asked Aunt Phebe.

"No," Patience answered, and moved forward.

"Thee didn't come alone?" Aunt Phebe said, looking anxiously after her.

"No, Aunt, I came home with me," Patience replied, going up the stairs.

"John Duane! A man of the world given up to the vanities of the flesh!" Phebe Morgan groaned, burdened in spirit for her sister Jane's child.

Patience Wilson at her daily work the following morning hummed the air John Duane had sung the day before, and smilingly repeated to herself the argument of the song:

"Nothing in the world is single,
All things by a law divine
In one another's being mingle.
Why not I with thine?"

"Patience, I wish thee wouldn't sing," chided Aunt Phebe. "It sounds so trifling and frivolous."

Patience's song was checked, but the new light her eyes had brought from Eagle Cliff the night before did not die, and her step was as if she trod on air.

"I never saw such hoity-toity ways," Aunt Phebe said to Patience's mother. "She makes me think of some wild thing fairly let loose. It all comes of letting her go outside of her own Society. I always knew it would make mischief. Jane; thee must speak to thy child. Thee owes it to thy religion as well as thy erring offspring."

And Jane Wilson, sighing, heavily spoke to Patience. "My daughter," she said, "how did it happen that John Duane came home with thee last night?"

Patience colored, but she replied, stoutly, "It did not happen at all. It was a piece of deliberate election on his part, and of entire willingness on mine."

"Where was Eli Gardner?" asked her mother, anxiously.

"Oh mother! I don't like Eli Gardner," Patience broke out, resentfully.

"Of course thee don't like John Duane either, for that matter," said Aunt Phebe.

"But I do," answered Patience, in a voice that was intended to be firm, but maidenly modesty made the confession low.

Jane Wilson looked at Phebe Morgan helplessly. It was much worse than she expected. A liking confessed that way was loving. "He is not of thy people," she said, sadly.

"He is a good man," Patience answered. "He is a devoted son and a kind brother. By his own careful management he has kept the homestead and placed the family beyond want. And then—he loves me."

Phebe Morgan groaned. "He is a man of the world, given up to its pomps and vanities," she said. "His raiment is of fashionable cut. He praises his God, not in his heart, but on a strange instrument. He dances to the sound of the fiddle, and mingles with wine-bibbers and sinners. It behooves thee, Patience, to look well to thy ways, for thy feet stand on slippery places. Eli Gardner is a steady man, whose principles thee could rely upon, and who would be acceptable to thy family."

"I shall never marry Eli Gardner," Patience answered, firmly.

"Thee is standing in thy own light," said Phebe Morgan, in sharp, rebuking tones.

"It grieves me to the heart, Patience, to think of thee joining the world's Vanity Fair and forgetting the simplicity and spirituality of thy fathers," Jane Wilson said, sadly.

Patience turned from her Aunt Phebe to her mother. It was one of Phebe Morgan's trials that people paid little heed to her advice. Her sister Jane, with half her words, wielded double her power. Patience Wilson looked at her mother, and in low, tearful tones answered, "Thee doesn't know what thee asks me to give up when thee bids me dismiss John Duane."

"I know, my child," fell from the mother's lips. "When I was a girl I stood where thy feet stand."

"Yes, thy mother is a brand plucked from the burning," broke out Phebe Morgan.

Patience Wilson stood profoundly meditative with white quivering lips. Where she stood her mother had stood before her. The holy calm of that mother's life had grown out of suffering and sacrifice. Patience was worthy of her people. "I will give up John Duane," she said, firmly.

The query in John Duane's song, "Why not I with thine?" was answered. There was an end to stray locks on Patience Wilson's forehead and scarlet berries in her hair. Life meant sacrifice now. "I shall make an out and out Quakeress," she thought.

"She will yet preach from the high seats," thought Aunt Phebe.

But Patience Wilson's mother sighed. Whatever sacrifice her life had known she had found some compensation in Abram Wilson's love, but no such compensation came to Patience.

"I shall never marry Eli Gardner to the longest day I live," she said to her mother, months after she had given up John Duane, and Jane Wilson recognized in her daughter a tenacity of purpose that admitted of no compensation.

She was thinking of these things sitting in her tidy sitting-room the following Sunday afternoon. She had closed her Bible and laid off her spectacles, while she glanced around the room with a mother's fond pride. Rebecca and the younger sisters were reading quietly, but, Patience drummed listlessly on the window pane with a weariness in her face that was painful to see in one so young.

"Hadn't thee better read the Review?" asked Aunt Phebe, from her rocking-chair across the room.

"I was thinking a review," answered Patience, but she ceased her drumming, and let her hands fall idly in her lap.

"David, I am ashamed of thee," exclaimed Aunt Phebe as David Wilson let the cat upon the floor with its paws tied up in papers. "Read thy book about that good little boy who ought to be a pattern to thee."

"Pshaw!" answered David, somewhat irreverently. "He died when he was eight years old. Good little boys in books always does. I say!" he added, rushing to the window, "there goes Billy Duane. He has got to go up to the Church of the Holy Tooth-pick to pump the organ for John. They've got a 'Piscopal crab to preach up there, and Billy says he is the jolliest man to tell stories. Thee needn't scold, Aunt Phebe, 'cause I call him a crab; that's his name. I seen it on a letter—Rev. Harold Crabbe. They are going to have some bully music up there to-night, 'cause John is going up to practice a chant, and Billy has got to go and pump for him. Golly, wouldn't I like to hear him play! I wish we had an organ in our meeting-house. I don't see why we don't, I say, mother!"

But Jane Wilson did not answer. A great change had come over her. The meekness had gone out of her face, and the Madonna sadness from her eyes. Jane Wilson seemed to sit among her astonished children not the woman who lived in perpetual calm, but deeply stirred, and agitated with uncontrollable emotion.

"Jane!" exclaimed Phebe Morgan in deep, significant, and rebuking tones. "Thee forgets thyself."

"Unfortunately, I remember," was the deep, passionate answer, and for a single instant there flashed into Jane Wilson's eyes the spirit of rebellion that sometimes sat on Patience's face. It was only an instant. She glanced around the room on her children's wondering faces, and with the habit of years upon her she put away the new, strange mood, and sat with her hands clasped over her Bible, the sad-eyed, Madonna-faced woman.

Patience Wilson that night crumpled in her hand a note. It was John Duane's old plea presented for the last time:

"Nothing in the world is single,
All things by a law divine
In one another's being mingle.
Why not I with thine?"

"There is no use," Patience Wilson was saying to herself. "I can not grieve my mother so. After to-night there shall be an end. After to-night!"

She arose with a determined air, put on the simple drab bonnet and gray shawl and went out. At the gate she halted and glanced at the windows of the low farm-house. Through the half-parted curtains of the sitting-room she could see her Aunt Phebe's rigid face and snowy cap, and Patience Wilson unconsciously crouched behind the fence. What she meditated would bring all the vials of that good woman's indignation on her head. She glanced upward to her mother's bedchamber where a low light burned. Was that mother praying for her? And was the intent of her heart counter to that mother's prayers and teachings? She turned for a moment as if to retrace her steps.

The light of her mother's chamber went suddenly out and Patience debated with herself. "She will never know," she said, determinedly, after a minute more of wavering, "and I must hear John Duane's music once more." She turned and took the direction of St. John's.

Suddenly she stopped, for the door of the farm-house closed softly and a bent figure moved slowly down the narrow walk and out of the little gate. She bent her ear to listen, but there was no sound save the ringing of the bell at St. John's. That bell brought up a memory of John Duane again. "It was only my nerves that made me think I heard footsteps," she said to herself, reassuringly. "And I must hear John Duane this once." She moved on stealthily, half crouching by the road-side, and a little way behind, like a shadow of her guilty self, stealthily crept another half bent figure. It took the direction of St. John's also, sometimes wavering as Patience had done, but always choosing finally the road that lay toward the little Episcopalian church.

Away in the back of St. John's, so far back that she sat quite in the shadow, Patience Wilson sat and listened to the organ's music.

As the last notes died away another woman in the simple garb of a Quakeress entered the opposite side of St. John's and sat down in the shadow likewise. Studying those two faces, one could not but be struck with their resemblance. One had listened to the music as if her heart and soul were drinking in the strains. The other listened to the sermon not less eagerly or intently. On the faces of both was the meek sadness of self-renunciation with this difference—one was self-renunciation just begun, the other was self-renunciation with the stamp of age upon it.

After the sermon Patience Wilson arose and went out. She longed to hear the last chant, but she would not for the world have John Duane see her there. At the same time the plain woman in the opposite shadow arose and went out. On the graveled walk they came face to face.

"Patience!" exclaimed the elder woman.

"Mother!" exclaimed the other.

They walked on in silence toward their home. Phebe Morgan met them at the door.

"Where has thee been?" she asked, anxiously.

"To St. John's," answered Jane Wilson, calmly.

"Not there? And thee a preacher! It is contrary to the discipline!" exclaimed Phebe Morgan, in a shocked tone.

Jane Wilson smiled. That smile was full of dignified self-assertion.

"It is contrary to the discipline of my whole life," she answered. "To-day I have learned anew why men and women should leave father and mother and cleave unto wife and husband. When twain are made one flesh time and distance can not divide them. This night I have listened to Harold Crabbe—I who once gave him up because his creed was unlike mine. I have listened to him with self-condemnation, saying to myself, who art thou that judgest thy neighbor? His is a pure heart and a self-sacrificing life, whatever his creed may be. I have sat and stood in the great congregation to-night, in a church with costly gildings and heavy tapestry and pealing organ, and I have found there true worshipers of the true God whom we worship.

As Jane Wilson spoke there had come upon the porch and into the little hall the tread of manly feet, and now there stood within the door a young man, with a puzzled face and eager questioning eyes. Jane Wilson extended her hand.

"John Duane, thee is welcome," she said, kindly.

A flush stole over the young man's face as he replied, earnestly,

"Friend Wilson, I do not crave your welcome as a neighbor and friend merely. I desire Patience, to have and to hold, to cherish and protect. Am I welcome?"

"Thee is welcome," answered Jane Wilson.

She took the hand of her daughter Patience, and laid it in John Duane's, saying in reverent tones,

"What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

"And thyself?" asked Phebe Morgan, who, years before, had put asunder her sister Jane and Harold Crabbe.

"The old way for me," Jane Wilson replied, calmly. "The end is not far off."

As for Phebe Morgan, zealous in good works and faithful in her sect, she left the trio to their dreams of love, present and past, and went up stairs softly, repeating to herself, with a new meaning:

"'Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I gave my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.'"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"MORE fresh air and less medicine" is a maxim which multitudes would be wise to adopt. Unless the lungs are constantly supplied with an abundance of fresh air perfect health can not be preserved. This is a very trite remark; but people need to have the matter brought before them often, for they will sit and sleep in close, ill-ventilated rooms, if there is the slightest pretext for so doing. Mr. Lewis W. Leeds, who during the war had the charge of ventilating Government hospitals, and is now consulting engineer of ventilation and heating for the United States Treasury Department, says that "thousands are poisoned to death by their own breath every year;" that "it is in our own houses that the blighting, withering curse of foul air is found." That the external atmosphere often contains great impurities there is no doubt, but if the vitiated exhalations of the lungs are added to these the evil is tenfold more serious. Now that the summer has come every body will naturally seek fresh air, yet even during this season, except when it is oppressively hot, many exclude the night-air from their sleeping apartments, fearful of its dampness. Many persons say there is no danger in sleeping in a draught of air; but those unaccustomed to such exposure would doubtless experience immediate ill effects from so doing. But there should always be a circulation of pure air in the sleeping-room. A window opened at the top and bottom a few inches will keep the air in motion. As to fire-boards, which are usually nearly air-tight, Mr. Leeds thinks the best use that can be made of them is to cut them up for kindling wood. In the cold season an open fire assists ventilation, but do not board up the fire-place when summer comes. There is no surer preventive against epidemic diseases than pure air. Open the doors and windows then, and let in the air. No matter if June continues in the fashion of her sister May, and showers fall every day; if we must have damp air, let it be as fresh as can be obtained.

A large and very valuable collection of fossils from the green sand beds of the well-known Squankum Marl Company, near Farmingdale, New Jersey, has recently been presented to the Peabody Museum of Yale College. It consists of several thousand specimens, many of them new to science, and is an important acquisition to the Museum.

An exchange says that the secret of being able to sleep at will depends upon the power of fixing the attention upon the breathing. The person must depict to himself that he sees the breath passing from his nostrils in a continuous stream, and the very instant that he brings his mind to conceive this, apart from all other ideas, consciousness and memory depart; imagination slumbers; fancy becomes dormant, thought subdued; the sentient faculties lose their susceptibility; the vital or ganglionic system assumes the sovereignty, and he no longer wakes, but sleeps. We recommend this as an excellent method for one who is very sleepy! If not pretty sleepy you had better wait a while, as you may get your eyes fixed wide open in your endeavors to see the "continuous stream" of breath.

The publisher of The Independent has been impeached by all of his employés, and, in an extemporized congress, he has been accused, in eleven distinct articles, of having been guilty of recent generous acts and habitual good-behavior. Our space will not permit us to quote all the charges made; but the Eleventh Article is as follows: "Article Eleventh.—You are charged, finally, with never having spoken a harsh or unkind word to any person in any department of the Independent establishment; with always exhibiting to us a cheerful countenance; with never forgetting to bestow bountiful and generous commendation on our best endeavors; and, in short, with a deliberate attempt on your part to make our daily work a daily pleasure." The sentence pronounced was that the accused should accept, as the lightest penalty which could justly be inflicted, an elegant Parian statuette of "Santa Filomena," executed by Alderman Copeland, of London—a gem of art.

The Astor House, which was opened when New York was comparatively a village, and which, perhaps, is more extensively known than any other hotel in America, has recently been renovated and greatly improved. Once—years ago—it was situated in the centre of fashionable life; now it is in the centre of business life. The building has been re-papered, re-carpeted, and re-furnished throughout, and every addition made which comfort or elegance could demand. An entirely new kitchen has been built, which is said to contain the largest cooking range in the world. It was built by a French firm, and has seven ovens and three covers, and can easily cook for 3500 persons. The dining-room has been newly painted and frescoed; and the new patent elevator is an addition which will be welcomed by the patrons of this house.

A dreadful occurrence recently took place in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. A Mrs. M'Knight had been severely burned by her clothes taking fire from a stove. She was in a fair way to recover, when one day she complained of an increased burning in one of her limbs. The person in attendance, on turning down the bed-clothes, discovered that the blanket was on fire, and that a portion of the bed had been burned. The injuries thus received, and the excitement occasioned, caused her death the same day. How long the burning had been going on previous to the discovery could not be ascertained; but a considerable portion of the bed and clothes were consumed. The fire is supposed to have originated from spontaneous combustion, caused by the remedies applied to her injuries. It is well known that certain substances are liable to undergo chemical changes which develop sufficient heat to set them on fire. Cloths saturated with oil have been thus inflamed, and by being piled together in large quantities the danger is increased by the accumulation of heat.

The Memphis Post gives an account of the mobbing of a teacher of a colored school at Salisbury, Tennessee. The teacher was a white man, sent there by the Freedmen's Bureau a few weeks ago. One Saturday evening half a dozen of the President's sympathizers disguised themselves by blackening their faces, and called upon the teacher, cocked their drawn revolvers upon him, and beat and battered him to their cruel satisfaction. Their only excuse was their determination that no white man should teach colored children at that place.

One of the English Reviews indulges in a lengthy article upon "Little Women." It is not very complimentary to tall, broad-shouldered, large-armed "giantesses," but bestows abundant praise upon smart, trim "little women" with "no more biceps than a lady-bird, and just about equal strength with a sparrow." It seems quite of opinion that energy, bravery, and power are, in general, associated with smallness; that a small creature whom one blow from a huge man's fist could annihilate, gets her own way in every thing, and conquers opposition by her very weakness. Finally it concludes that, on the whole, "little women have the best of it. More petted than their bigger sisters, and infinitely more powerful, they have their own way in part because it really does not seem worth while to contest a point with such little creatures. There is nothing that wounds a man's self-respect in any victory they may get or claim. Where there is absolute inequality of strength, there can be no humiliation in the self-imposed defeat of the stronger; and as it is always more pleasant to have peace than war, and as big men for the most part rather like than not to put their necks under the tread of tiny feet, the little woman goes on her way triumphant to the end, breaking all the laws she does not like, and throwing down all the barriers that impede her progress, perfectly irresistible and irrepressible in all circumstances and under any conditions."

The young Prince Imperial of France is now about twelve years old. He is small of his age, has a gentle, thoughtful face, dark chestnut hair, and his mother's beautiful eyes. He is frank and genial. A little incident is related of him, which illustrates his sweet temper. It occurred several years ago. Some misunderstanding had arisen between the young Napoleon and a playmate to whom he was much attached, and in the excitement of their juvenile quarrel the Prince received a blow. But the child, turning his earnest and thoughtful eye on his little companion, said, "I can not return it to you, because you are a Frenchman, and I am the Prince Imperial of France." The children were duly separated and put in disgrace; when, next day, his pugnacious friend was brought by his father to apologize for having so far forgotten himself, the Prince, on seeing him, threw his arms round his neck, saying, "Ah, how unhappy I have been not to have seen you a whole day!"

A Cleveland (Ohio) paper states that quite a sensation was recently created in that city by the arrival of a family possessed of startling characteristics, who were on the way to Chicago to embark in the show business. Two women and a boy comprised the remarkable features of the group. One woman was seven feet six inches high, and the other weighed seven hundred pounds. The boy, an infant of four years, weighed two hundred and thirty pounds.

The following experience of a humorous traveler, who attempted to get a dinner at Rochester, on the Central Railroad, is worth reading by all who enjoy a good laugh:

"Twenty minutes for dinner!" shouted the brakesman, as we approached the city.

Arrived there, I entered the dining-room and inquired of the waiter:

"What do you have for dinner?"

"Twenty minutes," was the hurried reply.

I told him I would try half a dozen minutes raw, on the half-shell, just to see how they went.

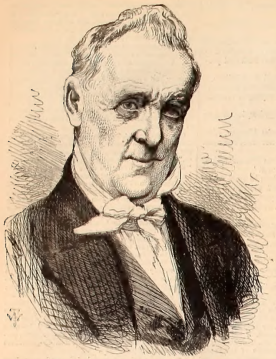
He scratched his head, trying to comprehend the order, but finally gave it up and waited upon some one else.

I approached a man who stood near the door with a roll of money in his hand.

"What do you have for dinner?"

"Half a dollar," says he.

I told him that I would take half a dollar well done; and asked him if he couldn't send me in addition a boiled pocket-book stuffed with greenbacks, and some seven-thirties garnished with postage-stamps and ten-cent script. Also, I would like to wash my dinner down with National Band Notes, on "draft."



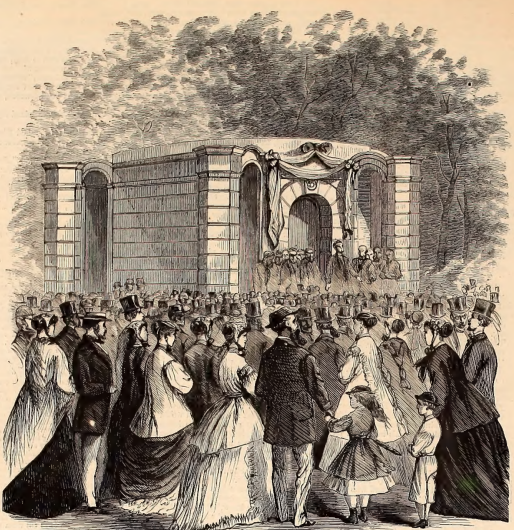
Chili is a musical country. It is said that when Gottschalk was about to give a great concert there he made a requisition upon the civil and military bands of Valparaiso and Santiago. Upon their presenting themselves he was amazed to find that not an eighth part of them could read or write, and not a fourth part knew a note or character of music. But what was his astonishment when he found that almost entire operas were familiar to them, and that they were able to repeat with perfect accuracy intricate parts of music by hearing them played but once or twice.

The faith exercised by a great many persons is like that of the old lady who one night was reading that passage in the Bible which speaks of the faith that can remove mountains. There was behind her humble dwelling a high hill which hid the nearest village from her view. She had often wished that this hill might be taken away; so before retiring she prayed that it might be removed. In the morning when she arose and lifted the curtain, lo! the mountain was still there. Then the old lady said to her son, "Just as I expected, John; the old hill stands there yet!"

Considerable excitement has been felt in Paris in regard to some strange disclosures which have recently been made in regard to the confinement of a number of persons, believed to be perfectly sane, in lunatic asylums. The Emperor has given directions for careful official inquiry to be made, and intends to visit some of the asylums himself.

A late number of the London Quarterly Review contains an interesting article upon the utilization of refuse matter. Old and spoiled photographs are considered a very valuable waste, in consequence of the amount of gold and silver they contain, which is recovered by simply burning them, and from the washings of the prepared paper they are secured by evaporation. The amount of refuse silver thus recovered amounted in one large photographic paper establishment to £1000 in one year.

Every refuse of the precious metals is most carefully collected. A jeweler's leather, old and well worn, is often worth many dollars; and what are termed "sweeps" or the dust collected in the leathern receptacle that is suspended under every working jeweler's bench, is a regular article of trade. A worker in the precious metals can always obtain a new waistcoat for an old one in consequence of the valuable dust adhering to it. Bookbinders doing a large business tell almost incredible tales of the amount of gold they collect from the floors and the rags of the binders

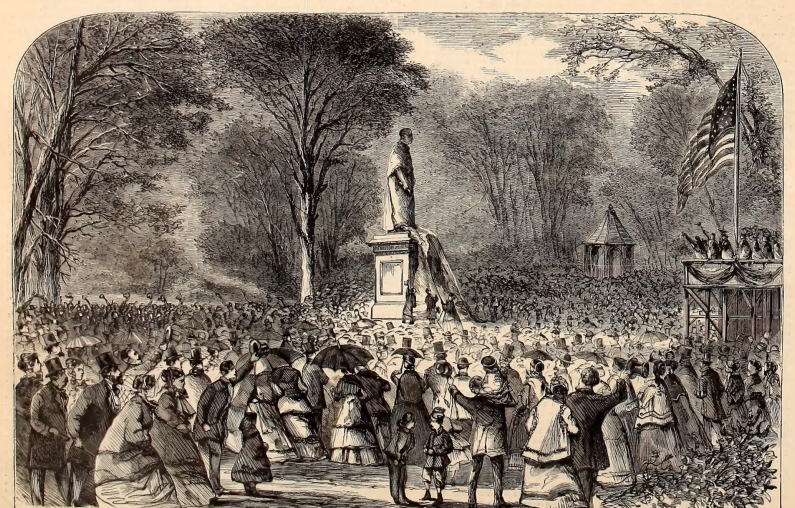


THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

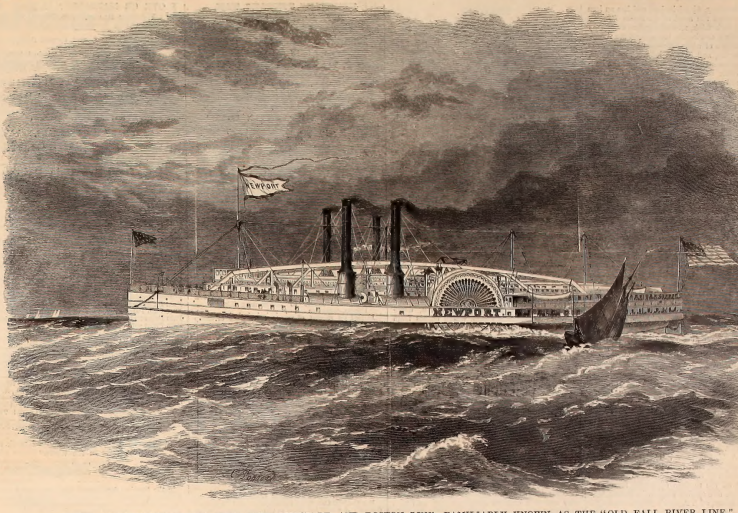
EX-PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

JAMES BUCHANAN, fifteenth President of the United States, died at Wheatland, Pennsylvania, on June 1, 1868, aged seventy-seven. We give above an accurate portrait of the deceased ex-President.

Mr. BUCHANAN was born at Stony Batter, Franklin County, Pennsylvania, on April 22, 1791. His parents were of Scotch-Irish extraction. He was graduated at Dickinson College in 1809, and admitted to the Lancaster bar in 1812. At 23 he entered the Pennsylvania Legislature, and at 29 was elected to Congress to represent the district now represented by THADDEUS STEVENS. At 41 he was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to Russia, and on his return, in 1834, was elected to the United States Senate. He remained in the Senate until the beginning of Mr. POLK'S administration, during which he held the position of Secretary of State, afterward retiring to private life. On the accession of Mr. PIERCE to the Presidency, Mr. BUCHANAN was appointed Minister to England, from which post he returned to the United States to become the candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency. During his administration the long-plotted rebellion was greatly hastened. Mr. BUCHANAN took no steps to prevent it, and during its brief but virulent existence he looked on calmly from his place of retirement. This is perhaps the harshest criticism which can be passed upon Mr. BUCHANAN—harsh enough in all reason. Undoubtedly his weakness in not dealing summarily with the traitors while they were plotting at Washington gave great strength to the rebellion, and his evident desire to end his administration peacefully, no matter in what condition he left the government to his successor, must naturally ever be a reproach on his memory. Yet his services previous to his Presidential career were valuable, particularly those abroad, and in all charity we should remember these, and endeavor to forget the rest.



REMOVAL OF THE REMAINS OF THE LATE STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS TO THE MAUSOLEUM AT CHICAGO.
[SKETCHED BY W. B. BAIER.]



THE DOUGLAS MONUMENT.

We give above an illustration of a scene which occurred at Chicago, Illinois, on June 3, the occasion of the removal of the remains of the late STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS from the grave to the lately-finished mausoleum. It represents more particularly the ceremonies at the grave on the removal of the body.

On June 2 the Trustees of the Douglas Monument Association, accompanied by a son of Mr. DOUGLAS, and others, proceeded to inspect the remains of the late Senator, preparatory to their formal removal. Upon removing the lid covering the glass, the face of the illustrious Senator was found to be in a remarkable state of preservation, almost as natural as when buried seven years ago, excepting that the eyes were more sunken, the nose more contracted, and the surface of the forehead somewhat indented or pitted; but the complexion was very fair, the contour of the head and face apparently unchanged, and the expression quite natural and plainly recognizable. The hair looked as black and glossy as ever, and the raiment as new and tidy as when first put on, and presenting but little evidence of mildew or discoloration.

INAUGURATION OF THE BENTON STATUE AT ST. LOUIS, MAY 27, 1868.—SKETCHED BY A. M. STUDENT.—[SEE PAGE 398.]

STEAMER "NEWPORT," OF THE NEW YORK, NEWPORT, AND BOSTON LINE—FAMILIARLY KNOWN AS THE "OLD FALL RIVER LINE."

The mausoleum to which the body was removed, and which is shown in our illustration, is to be surmounted by a monument designed by Mr. L. W. YOLK, the distinguished sculptor of Chicago. The total height will be one hundred feet. The statues which ornament four corners of the base are of JACKSON, CLAY, WEBSTER, and CASS, who were contemporaries of DOUGLAS.

The base of the pedestal which supports the column exhibits on its four sides a series of historical basso relievo pictures, representing the progress of civilization in the West, with which Mr. DOUGLAS was so closely identified. And the column is crowned with a colossal statue of the departed "Little Giant." The mausoleum is twenty feet square, and through a grated bronze door the spectator will be able to behold the sarcophagus containing the remains of Mr. DOUGLAS, reposing there, in "dim, religious light." An eagle, with drooped wings, sits over the door of the mausoleum—an eloquent emblem of mourning for a great man.

THE STEAMER "NEWPORT."

On this page we give an engraving of the splendid steamer Newport, belonging to the "Boston, Newport, and New York Steamboat Company" (Old Fall River Line). The Newport was built by JOHN ENGLIS & SON, New York. She is 350 feet long, with 44 feet beam, and extreme breadth over all of 80 feet. Her keel is of white oak, 14×14 inches, and frame of oak and locust. The floor timbers are of oak, 8 inches thick, and moulded 19 inches. There are 11 tiers of keelson; the centre keelson is of oak, 14 inches wide by 8½ deep, bolted through the keel and floors, and riveted on rings to the keel. The bottom is "solid," filled in with white pine 11 inches wide and 19 deep, and calked. There are yellow pine beams 17×18 inches, every twenty feet, fastened into the keelson, and kneed to the side of the vessel. The ceiling is of oak, 7 inches thick and square-fastened. She is strapped with the best of American SCENE ON THE ROAD TO JEROME PARK.

PADDY TO BRIDGET.—"Sure, Biddy, the Folks will think we're the Aristocracy goin' to the Races!"

iron, 22 feet long, 4½×⅝ inches, and has an iron belt all around the head of the frame 6 inches wide by ⅝ inch thick, riveted together every fifty feet, making a continuous belt around the vessel. The beams are of white pine—main-guard beam 26×22 inches, and 80 feet long. Ten beams, 18×20 inches and 78 feet long, support the boilers; all other beams are placed two feet from centres, and are 8×8 inches. The "hog-frame" supporting the hull is the strongest ever put on a steamboat in the country, being 44 inches thick, with 44 inches moulded, and 16 inches sided, fastened with 2 and 2½ inch rods up and down and diagonal. For outside planking she has three streaks of oak "strings," 6 inches thick and 12 inches wide, let into each timber 1 inch; the garboard streak is 5 inches thick, and fastened with copper bolts, and the rest of the planking is 4 inches thick. Tonnage, 2140. She has four water-tight compartments.

The joiner work was done by John E. Hoffmire, New York. The promenade is 9½ feet above the main deck. The main hall is finished with half-round columns of the Corinthian style, with a very heavy entablature 2 feet 10 inches high, with elaborately carved moulding, and is gilded. This hall has a dome roof 6 feet high, with ventilating sash of 2½ feet, ornamented with fancy cut glass. The ladies' saloon, on the main deck aft, is similarly finished, and the lower cabin is also tastefully ornamented.

The engine of the Newport was built at the Novelty Iron Works, New York, and is a splendid piece of mechanism, and embraces all modern improvements. There are four boilers, situated on the guards amidships, well secured and protected. The wheels are 42 feet in diameter, and 13 feet face.

There are on this boat 150 state-rooms, and 400 berths. The rooms are 7 by 7 feet each, and are finished and furnished with black walnut, and all the rooms contain two berths, also four bridal apartments of larger dimensions. The berths all have patent spring slats and hair mattresses, and are trimmed outside with fringed curtains. Most of the rooms are entered from alcoves from the main hall.

The Newport was furnished by the Company who own her. The drapery, carpets, linen, etc., are from A. T. Stewart & Co.; the gas-fixtures, silver-plate, etc., from E. V. Haughwout & Co. Painted by Barney & Styles, New York.

She has all the modern apparatus for extinguishing fire, and carries Francis's Patent Metallic Life-Boats, with Allen's Patent Boat-disengaging Apparatus attached. Life-preservers are under all pillows in rooms and berths, and the state-room doors, which are hung with shifting butts, can be unshipped and used as life-preservers.

This boat, with her consorts, the Old Colony, Metropolis, and Empire State, plies between New York and Newport, Rhode Island, and thence connects with the Old Colony and Newport Railway to Boston, forming the "Old Fall River Line," which has been successfully in operation for about a quarter of a century.

The Newport is commanded by Captain William Brown, a veteran in the service. Theodore Warren is Clerk; L. V. Tilton, Steward; and James Finkel, Engineer.

She is a beautiful vessel, and can sail twenty miles per hour with ease, and carries twelve hundred passengers and a large freight.

THE BENTON STATUE.

Harriet Hosmer's statue of Thomas H. Benton was inaugurated at St. Louis, Missouri, on May 27. The history of the work is well known. It was commenced in 1860, and when the details were decided the order for the work was given to Miss Harriet Hosmer, of Watertown, Massachusetts, then in Rome, but whose anatomical studies were pursued in St. Louis. Miss Hosmer fashioned the model in Rome, in 1861. The casting was done at Munich. The statue is of light gilt bronze. The figure stands upon the right foot, the left easily advanced, and the erect form suggests a solidity of position combined with real grace. An outer garment covers it, a compromise between the Roman toga and the modern military cloak. The left hand is enveloped in the folds of the garment, slightly raised, and holding the upper corner of a displayed map. The right arm is without the drapery, thrust downward, and the hand grasps the lower part of the map, rolled up in scroll form. The head is bare and is taken from Macdonald's well-known bust, and is considered an excellent likeness of the subject.

The ceremonies of the inauguration were simple but impressive. The statue was enveloped in a dun-hued robe of muslin, that was gathered in folds about its apex, and fell flowing gracefully over the bronze form, tastefully bound with crimson cords with tassels attached, and completely hiding the figure. All that could be seen was the pedestal, an elegantly-finished parallelopiped of Quincy granite, with four panels upon its faces let into the stone, and surrounded by mitred mouldings. This pedestal rests upon three lifts of steps of the same material. Upon the top of this structure stood the veiled form. Mrs. General Fremont, a daughter of Mr. Benton, ascended the three steps at the front face, upon which was engraved the gilded letters of her late father, "There is the East—there is India." She lifted her hand to the tassel indicated by Captain Eads, pulled the tense cord, which broke the fastenings, the veil fell and floated away, the form stood forth in its massive beauty and glory, the cannon off on the hill poured forth the salute of thirty guns, ordered by Secretary Stanton in honor of the departed statesman, the multitude echoed forth shout after shout of exultant joy, and the first statue ever erected west of the Mississippi was seen permanently fixed, in all its grandeur, a memento of one of the greatest men the republic has produced.

ENCORES.

The theory of encores involves this monstrous proposition, that the more efficiently the labor is performed the greater stress is put upon the laborer; so that, if he be perfectly effective, he shall be required to perform his task two if not three times over. How this strikes one at first sight, before habit has inured one to its defects, is exemplified by the story of Pasta's maid. The great artist had given her servant, a simple country-girl, an order for the opera. It was a grand occasion—a night in which Pasta appeared in one of her master-pieces. Never had she acted better—voice, declamation, emotion, every thing about her, conspired to make that assumption famous in lyric annals. Applause rained on her at every turn; she was bissée times out of mention; in short, it was a furore. At the end of the evening she wearily asked her waiting-maid how she had enjoyed the play.

"Well, the play, ma'am, was fine, but I felt sorry for you," was the reply.

"For me, child! And why?"

"Well, ma'am," said the waiting-maid, "you did every thing so badly, that the people were always shouting and storming at you, and making you do it all over again."

This was the ingenue's reading of an encore.

But it is not on the performer alone that the custom of indiscriminate encoring heavily falls. It is equally wearying to a large portion of the audience. Every one familiar with crowded and popular concerts well remembers the "ssh," deepening into a sibilant sound, which comes from the connoisseurs when the applause of the ignorant benches threatens an injudicious encore. But the plaudits are louder than the dissident tones; the singer reappears on the platform, and politeness silences the connoisseurs, while the noisy ones redouble their acclamation. Then the observer may note a look of weariness steal over the habitual concert-goer as he settles resignedly down to the inevitable repetition. The encorist may say that herein the feeling of the majority is consulted; but the proposition is not always true. A few noisy applauders can easily overpower the polite many. The efforts of a claque will prevail against the wishes of a dissentient audience. For whereas it is voted rude to hiss, no canon denounces applause, save in a church. And even if it be granted that the majority have decided for an encore, it does not necessarily make out a case for them beyond appeal. For the vulgar, who attend a concert once in a way, and who are greedily anxious to obtain the most for their money, have no right to dictate to the cultivated few—the steady patrons of the art—have no right, that is to say, to impose a condition over and above the contract. They pay their money for a stipulated commodity, and they do not deserve to claim that which, not being in the bond, inconveniences a portion of the constituency.

Burnett's Cocoaine cleanses, perfumes, and dresses the hair beautifully.—Home Journal.

Burnett's Kalliston, a cosmetic, is pronounced one of the best toilet fixtures ever prepared.—St. Louis Evening News.

The "Star Shuttle Sewing Machine Company" are manufacturing one hundred of their celebrated machines per day, at their works in Cleveland, Ohio.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Moth Patches, Freckles, and Tan. The only reliable Remedy for those Brown Discolorations on the face is PERRY'S MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. ☞ Sold every where.

For BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the FACE, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. Order from Druggist, or Dr. B. C. Perry, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

$15 GET THE BEST. $15

OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.,
IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS,
78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

Oroide is a new composition resembling Gold, retains its color and brilliancy. The OROIDE GOLD WATCHES are in hunting cases (Ladies' and Gentlemen's), manufactured at our factory in Switzerland, from the best materials, of the most approved styles, jeweled, and beautifully finished; are guaranteed reliable TIME-KEEPERS. As to appearance, durability, etc., have never been surpassed, very seldom equaled, by watches of the most rare and costly description. Warranted one year. Price $15, payable to Express on receipt of the Watch.

In order to protect the public from imposition, have concluded to retail our celebrated watches.

S. T.—1860.—X.

"The Sweetest Thing in Life" is good health and good spirits; and if you have them not, the next best thing is what will restore bloom to the faded cheek and happiness to the drooping heart. The great and sure remedy is PLANTATION BITTERS, which our physicians recommend to both male and female patients, as a safe, reliable, agreeable, and cordial stimulant. They contain nothing to disagree with the most delicate constitution, and have won golden opinions from all who have tried them, and probably no article was ever tried by so many persons. They elevate the depressed, and give strength to the weak.

MAGNOLIA WATER is a delightful toilet article—superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

"The Roman Catholic Religion," with 12 Portraits of the most distinguished living Bishops and Priests in America. See July No. Phrenological Journal. Only 30 cents, or $3 a year. Newsmen have it. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN,
MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN,
and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by
PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."
Renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION
SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.

This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been established 25 years.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance. For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"
for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PHALON & SON, 517 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S
CHEAP MUSIC.
Parlor Piano-Forte Music. In Books, Fifty Cents Each.

Brinley Richards's and G. A. Osborne's Twelve Fantasias . . . . . 50c.
Schumann's Twenty-two Pieces . . . . . 50c.
Leybach's Six Popular Fantasias . . . . . 50c.
Kuhe's Eight Fantasias . . . . . 50c.
Strauss's Seven New Waltzes, etc. . . . . . 50c.
Mendelssohn's Music to Midsummer Night's Dream, complete . . . . . 50c.

Mailed on receipt of price. Catalogues of cheap musical publications on application.
BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, New York.

A New Discovery.

The most profound and SECRET communications may now be sent either by LETTER or TELEGRAPH, without the possibility of their being read by any one except the person to whom they are addressed. FOWLER'S SELF-TEACHING SYSTEM OF KEY-WRITING accomplishes this end, and can be learned in five minutes by any one who can read or write. On receipt of $1 I will send two Self-Teaching Charts; or, for $5, Fifteen Charts to one address, postpaid. Competent Agents, either ladies or gentlemen, wanted in every city, town, and county in the United States and Canada. Send stamp for circular. Apply to or address G. B. FOWLER & CO., 37 Park Row, Room 22, New York.

PRESIDENT—
General U. S. GRANT.
VICE-PRESIDENT—
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX.

For the best Campaign Medals, Pins, and Badges of GRANT & COLFAX, send to the oldest and most respectable manufacturers, who have made this business a specialty for the past nineteen years. We have now ready a great variety of all styles. Prices from $3 to $10 per 100. We will send to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price, One Sample, 25c., Three Samples, 50c., with Price-List. We request our Correspondents to be brief, as we are always very busy during the Campaign. We make suitable reductions on all large orders for Dealers and Clubs.

All moneys sent by Post-Office Order at our risk. We guarantee full amount in goods, at lowest rates, for all money sent to us. Address
RICHARDS & MARKT,
P. O. Box 3131. 55 Murray St., N. Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

Workingmen's National Brotherhood. Every member of this organization is absolutely sure of 100,000 dollars' worth of property within five years, with remunerative employment from the beginning. For full particulars, address A. T. PECK, Corresponding Secretary Premier Lodge, Danbury, Conn.

Employment. $15 00 to $30 00 a day guaranteed. Male or Female Agents wanted in every town—descriptive circulars free. Address JAMES C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

Wanted, Agents for our $1 Sale. Send 25c. for two Checks. Circulars free. BANKS, LORD, & CO., 221 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

Howe's Piano without a Master; also for MELODEON, CABINET ORGAN, GUITAR, ACCORDEON, CONCERTINA, GERMAN ACCORDEON, BANJO, VIOLIN, FLUTE, CLARIONET, FLAGEOLET, FIFE. Each Book contains easy and simple, but very complete rules and exercises, with from one to four hundred pieces of popular music, fingered expressly for the instrument. Price 50 cents each, sent postpaid.
ELIAS HOWE, 103 Court St., Boston.

Lyman Beecher's Autobiography, &c. Autobiography, Correspondence, &c., of Lyman Beecher, D.D. Edited by his Son, Charles Beecher. With Three Steel Portraits and Engravings on Wood. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $5 00.

A more entertaining biography has not been published in many a year, and it will be many a year before another like it appears. Dr. Beecher was a singular great man, with marked peculiarities of thought, habits, and style; original, energetic, bold, religious, sincere, loving God and his fellow-men profoundly, and seeking to do good in his own way. The manner of getting up the book is quite as peculiar as the subject. For years past, before the patriarch's departure to his long home, his gifted children have been in the habit of gathering around him and listening to his reminiscences of former days, asking him questions, and drawing out his views of men and things. Mrs. Stowe's questions are indicated by her initials, and Miss Catharine Beecher's by her own, and the boys have theirs; and these queries and replies, being interspersed with the story, give animation and variety. Then there is a rich material in the correspondence with men and women on public and domestic matters, religious, political, and literary; letters to and from these rare children in the various stages of their intellectual and moral development, beautiful pictures of home life in the country, with rapid and startling remarks on preachers, teachers, and their opinions—the whole making up a book possessing uncommon interest for all types of readers.—New York Observer.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Love or Marriage? A Novel. By William Black. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and graceful language.—London Review.

The composition of a cultivated mind: it is full of thought, of careful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatical remarks, and it is eloquent in suggestiveness.—London Leader.

The tale is simple enough, but well told, and in that lies its chief charm.—Athenæum.

This novel is one of great power....It is certainly the production of an imagination—we may almost say of a genius—which we should conceive fully capable of works of art that might live.—Spectator.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Parents Prize Pain Paint.

Professional People
Patronize Pain Paint;
Preachers Praise Pain Paint;
Physicians Prescribe Pain Paint;
Poor People Prove
Pain Paint Practically;
Papers Push Pain Paint;
Press Propels Pain Paint;
Patients Proclaim
Pain Paint Potential;
Pain Paint Prostrates Purgative Pills;
Pain Paint Prevents Pain;
Pain Paint Procures Practical Peace;
Pain Paint Puzzles Petulant Phools;
People Purchase Pain Paint;
Posters Proclaim Pain Paint;
Pain Paint Punishes Plasters, Pills, Powders;
Pure Pain Paint Proves Practical, Powerful.
Pain Paint 25 and 50 cents, $1, $3, $5, and $8 per bottle.
Pain Paint sold every where by Druggists,
And tested free of cost at
Dr. WOLCOTT'S Office, No. 170 Chatham Square, N.Y.

Reliable Negotiators of Loans can make a mutually advantageous connection in N. Y. by addressing LOANS & DISCOUNTS, N. Y. Post-Office.

Grant and Colfax Watch Charms, 50c. each, by return mail. W. Carpenter, Microscopist, 77 Nassau St., N.Y.

"Try it." A $3 Magazine, in clubs of 10, sent half a year, "on trial," for $10, or only $1 each! The Pictorial Phrenological Journal. New Vol.—48th—begins with July No. S. R. WELLS, 389 B'dway, N.Y.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by Dinah Mulock Craik, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Moonstone," a Novel, by Wilkie Collins, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in Harper's Weekly form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Household Angel," a Novel, by Fitz Hugh Ludlow.

The Bazar, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine, One Year......$4 00
Harper's Weekly, One Year...... 4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year...... 4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

☞ Harper's Periodicals will be delivered to City Subscribers without extra charge.

Bound Volumes of the Magazine, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the Magazine, the Weekly, or the Bazar, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

Terms for Advertising in Harper's Periodicals.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Periodical Dealers supplied with Harper's Weekly and Harper's Bazar at Seven Dollars per hundred each.

THE

Old and Reliable Fall River and Newport Line

BETWEEN

NEW YORK & BOSTON.

☞ Passengers by this route are assured of a comfortable night's rest on boats combining, with the best seagoing qualities, speed, elegant furnishings, and a table supplied with the best the market affords.

THE SPLENDID STEAMBOATS

NEWPORT, AND OLD COLONY,
Capt. WM. BROWN, Capt. A. N. MILLER,

ALTERNATE DAILY (SUNDAYS EXCEPTED),

Leaving New York from Pier 28, North River, Foot of Murray Street, at 5 P.M.

Passengers can take Train on NEWPORT AND OLD COLONY RAILWAY from Newport, R.I., at 4.00 A.M., and arrive in Boston at 6.30, in time to connect with all Northern and Eastern Trains and Boats. Baggage can rest undisturbed, Breakfast on board at 7.00 A.M., and take 7.45 A.M. Train, and ARRIVE IN BOSTON AT EARLY BUSINESS HOURS. Returning Trains leave OLD COLONY RAILWAY DEPOT, corner of Kneeland and South Streets, at 4.30 and 5.30 P.M.

MEALS FURNISHED ON THE EUROPEAN PLAN.

This is the only DIRECT ROUTE for NEWPORT, FALL RIVER, TAUNTON, NEW BEDFORD, MARTHA'S VINEYARD, MIDDLEBORO', the BRIDGEWATERS, PLYMOUTH, and ALL TOWNS ON CAPE COD, and NANTUCKET. Fares always as Low as by any other Line.

FOR FURTHER PARTICULARS INQUIRE OF THE AGENTS,

E. LITTLEFIELD, 72 Broadway, New York.
W. H. BULLOCK, Supt. O. C. & N. R. R., Boston.

New York, June 20, 1868.

TO THE LADIES.

We are Agents for over ONE HUNDRED Foreign and Domestic Manufactures, and are prepared to furnish the whole country with DRY and FANCY GOODS, SILKS, SHAWLS, JEWELRY, SILVER-WARE, SEWING MACHINES, PIANOS, &c., &c., at the uniform price of

ONE DOLLAR FOR EACH ARTICLE.

Send your claim of ten and upward for descriptive Circular, showing what premium can be obtained for Our Dollar, with ten cents for each Check.

CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Presents worth from $3 to $400 sent free of charge to agents sending clubs.

AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN.

CUSHMAN & CO.,
10 Arch Street, Boston.

WATCHES, and ROSKOFF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in Swedish silver. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has entirely occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the encomiums of the press in reference to its general properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal in the Paris Exposition. The improvements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as these goods are manufactured in my own factory I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $25. A fine watch will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of Chains, also Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with privilege.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Campaign Sleeve-Buttons.

IMITATION IVORY.

Perfect Likenesses of Grant and Colfax,
In relief. Red, White, Blue, Black, and Brown.
$1 00 per pair. Sent on receipt of price.
Large Discount to the Trade.
Wm. M. WELLING, Patentee, 671 Broadway, N. Y.
AGENTS WANTED.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 569 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the forward-priced reliable Machines. Examine different Styles, or send for Circular. 569 Broadway.

$325 A MONTH, AND EXPENSES. 38 New Articles. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

YOUNG MEN* who seek personal improvement and promotion; YOUNG WOMEN who would like to do something; Parents, Teachers, and others they have the $3 ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for Months, in clubs of 10, "on trial," at $1 each. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made: 3 New Patents received.
MARTINGALE RINGS, $12 and $20 single gross.
SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross.
RELIABLE BALLS, $2 per doz. per set.
CHECKS, $8, $10, and $12 per 100.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $15 to $150 per gross set.
WM. M. WELLING, 671 Broadway, New York.

ON TRIAL.—$1 Ten copies of a first-class $3 Magazine six months, "on trial," for $10. The PHONOGRAPHIC PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL sent in clubs of 10, from July to January, at only $1 a copy. A new volume—45th—begins with the July No.
THINK OF IT. Get one of the best Scientific and Literary Monthlies ever published. The Trenton Monitor says of it: "A periodical which, more perhaps than any other publication in the world, is calculated to do good to its readers." All should read it.
Terms as above, and no subscriptions—money with the club, in registered letter, or in P. O. order. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

Every VIOLATION

Of the laws of health invariably entails its own punishment, and the warnings administered by the faithful monitor (pain) can not be neglected with impunity. If the admonitions were heeded, and the proper remedy immediately resorted to, a vast amount of suffering would be prevented, and dangerous diseases averted. When the head throbs, the lips become parched, and the cheek is burning—the warning is given; neglect is then dangerous. In the vast storehouse of nature may be found remedies for all the different maladies with which mankind, without resorting to pernicious minerals. The best of these medicinal agents have been incorporated in the preparation known as

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

and offered as a safe remedy to those suffering from the various forms of fever. This medicine has steadily and surely won its way into the confidence of the public, and has received the most unanimous praise from the press and people throughout the Union. As a valuable tonic for the cure of Dyspepsia, Flatulence, Constipation, and General Nervous Debility, it can not be too highly recommended. Every day new cases of its great effect are chronicled through our public journals. There is nothing equal to the enjoyment which the afflicted experience after using this valuable specific. Its mild tone, its sure and vigorous action upon a disordered stomach, and the cleansing of the entire human body, should recommend it to all classes of our community.

GRANT & COLFAX.
A GREAT WORK WANTED for the best LIFE OF GRANT, by HON. J. T. HEADley. Now ready. $2 50. An authentic LIFE OF COLFAX, with a splendid Portrait, in press. Price 25 cts., which we give to our subscribers to the Life of Grant.
TREAT & CO., Publishers,
654 Broadway, N. Y.

"BEAUTIFUL WOMEN." National types: English, French, German, Austrian, Turkish, Russian, Georgian, Swiss, Polish, Hungarian, Swedish, Dutch, Algerine, etc., with portraits, in July No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 25 cts., or by year (10 numbers), $2. Or, Journal "on trial" for $10. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches,

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and stronger than any gold case. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best material, with the improved stem-wind, improved set, and beveled and polished, with a view to the best results in regard to accuracy and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have been warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time for SIX years. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. A correct small size watch can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $12 to $36. Goods sent to any part of the United States or Canada, to be paid for on their arrival with the express agent. Where gold goods are delivered to by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. D. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION.—Many worthless watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the New York Independent.

Our readers have probably observed in our paper the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to have good time-keeping qualities, and in a case which is ornamental and durable, in short of a good imitation of the precious metal one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in all classes of society who can not afford to pay from $100 to $150 for a gold watch, and who can pay $15 for a gold one, and who would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time. The Oroide Watch appears to suit their cases exactly.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

WEST BANGOR, December 3, 1867.

Gentlemen—I have received the watch you sent per the Adams Express, and like it very well. It keeps good time, and is of a handsome appearance. I have disposed of it to a friend of mine, and now wish you to send me one like it, and send it by the Express that comes through here on Saturday. When you send it, direct it to Hayes de Grace, Md., as that is the nearest point for me to get it. Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, yours, &c., V. D. BURROUGH.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

YORK, PA., December 10, 1867.

DEAR SIRS—I received the Watch to-day, and I am very much pleased with it. It is really better than I expected from you advertise. There are five persons who will send for the same watch in a few days. Yours respectfully,

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

OFFICE MERCHANTS' UNION EXPRESS, STORES, Dec. 4, 1867.

GENTLEMEN—Please send me a half dozen Oroide Watches—small, medium, and large. How much you send on the 30th of November is all sound, and will work for a year. I will sell a great many watches. Please send me samples of your chains. I am going to keep two or three men traveling all the time. Yours truly, R. H. MUNSON.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GREENWOOD, Nov. 28, 1867.

DEAR SIRS—Myself and three others wish you to send four of your Imitation Gold Watches, at $15 each, gentlemen's size, and receive payment on delivery. Address Greenwood Furns, Marquette County, Lake Superior, Michigan. Yours, &c., JOHN M. HOWARD, Mining Agent, Michigan Mining Company, Lake Superior. —all of Greenwood. Your watches stand in great esteem here. Yours, &c., MICHAEL LYDON.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

HAYES DE GRACE, KANSAS, Nov. 27, 1867.

SIRS—I wish you to send me a watch. I made quite a spec. on the last watch. I want this watch well finished, for every one will see it. Send me a gold chain. Send me your Circular and Price List. I think I can very well. Send by the U. S. Express. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
P.S.—Forward to Hayesville, Clay, Kan. ERNST A. LUDWIGSON, Jeweler, Co. H, 7th U. S. C.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SALEM, OREGON, December 12, 1867.

GENTLEMEN—I did not receive this place as soon as I expected when I wrote to you from Idaho, but was detained when I arrived yesterday to find that my order was filled, and the watches in the express office. I like the watches well, especially the large one. My brother will start for New York soon, and will forward the money by mail. Thanking you for your promptness, I remain yours, JOHN T. CROMWELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

LA GRANGE, ORE., January 14, 1868.

GENTS—Please send me, C. O. D., two of your Oroide Watches, gent's watch: want one of them most as plain a case as you have, the other one carved. Also two of your two-dollar chains. Send to Lima, Ally Co., Ohio, by M. U. Express. Respectfully yours, C. M. COWEN.

P.S.—The last watch you sent me was all that I could ask for the money. It keeps good time, and is a splendid article. C. M. COWEN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

PORT HURON, N. Y., May 20, 1868.

Please send me per express two watches, gents' size; and if they prove to be as good as the one you sent me, I think I will want more. D. A. WASSON.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sent at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show:

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 50 cents, 60 cents, 70 cents, 85 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 30c., 35c., 38c.; best, 45c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money Order, as the safest, as some of the smaller collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to be collected on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary Teas to Clubs unless of less than Thirty Dollars.

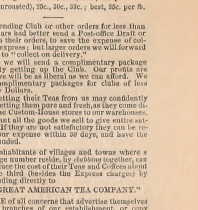
Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct to the Great American Tea Company's warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can order from the Great American Tea Company, and obtain one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or of any name either wholly or in part, as they are Boxes on Earnings.



We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

The Great New England Remedy.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

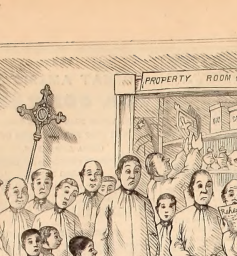
is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of thirteen years in the New England States, with unbounded success. It come as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

The White Pine Compound cures Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidneys and Bladder, and all Diseases of the Urinary Organs.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and Canada, and is prepared at the NEW ENGLAND BOTANICAL DEPOT, by DR. JOHN W. POLAND, Cincinnati, Ohio. O. BURNHAM and VAN SCHAACK, Ill.—General Agents for the West.

10 CTS., postpaid. "SHORT HAND: ALL ABOUT IT." Address G. J. MASON, 37 Park Row, N. Y.

"HUSBAND AND WIVES" may learn something to their advantage by reading the PHONOGRAPHIC PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, at $2 a year, or, in clubs of 10, "on trial," from July to January, at $1 each. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.



$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

RITUALISM.

RITUALISTIC STAGE MANAGER. "Now, gentlemen, rehearsals every morning this week; and on Friday dress rehearsal for Saint Winifred."

TRY the PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue. Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat box. Price 10 and 25 cts. Sold by all Grocers and by Plymouth Color Co. (U. T. Reynolds & Co.,) 194 & 196 Pulton St., New York.

AGENTS WANTED.

MONEY can be made very rapidly by selling our PHOTOGRAPHIC CAMPAIGN CHARTS, giving excellent likenesses of GRANT and COLFAX, Portraits of all the Presidents, the Platform, Letters of Acceptance, and Valuable Statistical Matter. 100 very valuable Maps and Charts. See Fifth Page of this paper. Address, for circular and address

H. H. LLOYD & CO., Publishers,
No. 21 John Street, New York.

TRY

B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,

MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.

Cures Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.

If your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY.

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

SOMETHING NEW.

THE BALLARD BREECH-LOADING SHOT-GUN. This gun, so much called for, is now ready for delivery. Price, $50.00. Neat, securely packed, on receipt of price. Also the well-known BALLARD RIFLES, the Southerner Pistols, Eagle Revolvers, American Metallic Ammunition, all sizes. Superior quality. Send for circular. Address MERWIN, TALOR & SIMPKINS, Sole Agents, 261 Broadway, New York. After May 1st, 595 Broadway.

P. S.—A full assortment of all goods in our line.

WOODWARD'S
Country Homes.
150 Designs, $1.50, postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect,
191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. Babbitt's Lion Coffee." Coffee in the unground, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." Use Coffee in every variety unless Lion Dollar Greenback. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.

B. T. BABBITT.

Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.

GOOD AGENTS wanted to introduce our new SEAM SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE—Stitch alike on both sides. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. We will cossion Machines to responsible parties, and employ Energetic Agents on a Salary. Full particulars and sample work furnished on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., Cleaveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

Sir Robert Ebsor's Celebrated English Life Bitters, cures Dyspepsia and preserves the general health.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!

Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in both MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us, with certainty and dispatch, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Price-List sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & ROLLINS, Clothing Warehouse, 124 Fulton St., and 90 Nassau St., N. Y.

Extract from fashion article, Harper's Bazar, May 9:

"The fire does the work of the laundress without necessitating any unusual labor." etc.

THE AUTOMATIC
CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER

Does the work in 10 minutes, without labor. Fits any stove or range. Warranted to do the work. No. 8, Medium Size, $10 00. Sent, C. O. D. Send stamp for Circular.

State and County Rights for sale, except Conn., N. J., Pa., Del., Md., New York City and Vicinity. Agents wanted for this territory. Address

GENERAL AGENT AUTOMATIC CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER Co., No. 19 Courtlandt Street, New York.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

The Chemistry of Divine Providence has never produced a mineral water which combines in such perfection the qualities of an anti-bilious tonic and cathartic medicine as that of the Seltzer Spa; and TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT is the artificial equivalent of that great natural remedy. Sold by all Druggists.

New Spring Goods

FOR GENTLEMEN.

ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

AGENTS WANTED.

PEOPLE in want of, and AGENTS who are selling or may think of dewing Machines, are requested to address me with stamp for greatly reduced prices and terms. J. K. PEARSON, box 4, Charlestown, Mass.

DRUNKENNESS CURED

By UPHAM'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1 by B. C. UPHAM, 38 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

PAULDING & SON, Manufr's of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 495 Broadway, and Broom St., & 37 John St., near Nassau. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale price-list. Retail price-list free.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!

Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-plated Ware, Cooking Utensils,

CHINA AND GLASS WARE,

at greatly reduced prices.

BASSFORD'S,
Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the CELEBRATED IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without breaking it. We pay agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which we guarantee they can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, Pa., or BOSTON, Mass.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties pirating off worthless cast-iron machines, under the name name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical three machine manufactured.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed FREE by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

"GRANT AT THE HEAD OF THE NATION." Song and Chorus by FREE. Song at New York Festival. Beautiful! Full of rolling Music. Mailed free, 50 cents. O. DITSON & CO., Boston.

GRANT & COLFAX.

CAMPAIGN BADGES in great variety, at the lowest prices. Manufactured by RICHARDS & MARLET, P. O. Box 3131. 55 Murray St., N. Y.

Samples sent postpaid on receipt of 25 cents.
(See Advertisement on Inside Page.)

LAWN, SWISS, LINEN, and CAMBRIC

IN FOUR (QUADRUPLE),
FIVE (QUINTUPLE), and
EIGHT (OCTUPLE) ROWS,

TRADE-MARK. For making and trimming

Ladies' and Children's Wear.

WARRANTED TO WASH
and retain its original
PATENT. BEAUTY AND FULLNESS.

For Sale by the Fancy and Dry Goods Houses throughout the country.

A NEW TABLE KNIFE!

Something that will not Break. A Handle that will not Crack. Is not Offensive to the Smell, like Rubber. Is Beautiful in Design and Finish. Is the Best possible Article for Families, Hotels, Restaurants, and Steamboats. This knife is forged from one bar of steel, handle and blade: is heavily plated with silver, and is the CHEAPEST SILVER-PLATED KNIFE OFFERED FOR SALE.

Made by

J. RUSSELL & CO.,
Green River Works, Greenfield, Mass.

Sold wholesale and retail by

Davis Collamore & Co.,
IMPORTERS of CHINA, GLASS, ETC.
479 Broadway (four doors below Broome Street).

P. S.—We will send this knife to any address, one dozen Table, $12; one dozen Dessert, $10.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN

One Forward and two Backward Arches, ensuring unequaled balanced elasticity, evenness of point, and smoothness of execution. Sold by all Stationers. Each gross in twelve contains a Scientific Gold Pen. One dozen Steel Pens (assorted points) and Patent Ink-retaining Penholder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. S. BARNES & Co., 111 and 113 William St., N.Y.

Live in My Heart

AND PAY NO RENT. New Song . . . . . 30c.
THE EYE THAT BRIGHTENS THE COMB. . . . 30c.
FOLLOW THE BRIGHT GLEAM OF THE STREAM . . . 30c.
DREAM OF THE BALL—WALTZES—Gungl's . . . 30c.
ANYBODY'S MOTHER. 30c. each. Music mailed.

FREDERICK BLUME, 1129 Broadway, 52 door above 26th St.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, and Dissolving View Apparatus, with the improved Calcium Light, and several hundred artistically-colored Photographic Views on Glass, illustrating Art, Science, History, Travels, &c., &c. Priced and illustrated Catalogue free on application. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, No. 49 Nassau St., New York.

Wetzel.

FOUNTAIN PEN. Non-corrosive; Durable; Warranted. Writes three pages with once dipping. Sells quick. $10 a day. Sample Box, 12 Pens, for 75 cents, or 12 Boxes for $2. Address MORSE FOUNTAIN PEN CO., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PRINCE & CO.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Ulcers.)
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts., by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston Proprietors.

CHEAP EDITION
OF
QUEEN VICTORIA'S BOOKS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

THE EARLY YEARS OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE CONSORT. Compiled, under the direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Two Portraits.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS. From 1848 to 1861. Which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal, giving an account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Engravings. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS.

CHEAP EDITION. 12mo, Paper. 75 CENTS EACH.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,

AS IMPORTED FOR N. Y. UNION CLUB.

TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

WALTHAM WATCHES

AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Silver Hunting Watches $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 Carat Cases . . . $80
Gold Hunting Watches. Ladies' Size . . . $70

Each Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Co. Watches sent by Express, C.O.D., with privilege to examine before paying. Every one in want of a reliable time-keeper is requested to write for our descriptive price-list. Address in full

HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N.Y.

PLANCHETTE.

This new, wonderful, and amusing Automaton now ready. Send for Circular. Agents wanted.

HASKINS & CO., 95 Beekman St., N.Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published:

I.

HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST. The Spanish Conquest in America, and its Relation to the History of Slavery and to the Government of Colonies. By ARTHUR HELPS. Complete in Four Volumes. Vol. IV. just ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per Vol.

II.

BELLOW'S OLD WORLD. The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

III.

LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. With a Collection of Meteorological Tables. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and Author of "A Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $2 00.

IV.

KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Scripture History and the Book of Psalms. By FRIEDRICH ADOLPH KRUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite." &c. Translated under the express Sanction of the Author by the Rev. M. G. KYLOCH, M.A. With a Letter from Dr. Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.

WHITE'S MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A., Ph.D. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

VI.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and School-Rooms. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. FREDERICK HOLLAND, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book." Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With Copious and Explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16o, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

VII.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Complete in Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

VIII

BARNES'S THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS. History of the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States. By WILLIAM BARNES, LL.D., Professor. "The Body Politic." &c. With Eighteen Steel Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

IX

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

X.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

XI.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Death of King William IV. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

LOVE OR MARRIAGE? A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A LOST NAME. By J. S. Le Fanu, Author of "All in the Dark." "Uncle Silas," "The Cock and Anchor," "Torrents of Malory," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BRAKESPEARE; or, The Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the Author of "Sword and Gown," "Sword and Gown," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

POOR HUMANITY. By F. W. Robinson, Author of "Grandmother's Money," "Coward Conscience," "Curry Confession," "No Man's Friend," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

JEANIE'S QUIET LIFE. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Miss M. E. Braddon, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c., &c. The Sequel to "Birds of Prey." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. A Novel. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BROWNLOWS. By Mrs. Oliphant, Author of "Agnes," "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ONE OF THE FAMILY. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MY HUSBAND'S CRIME. With Illustrations by Sol Eytinge. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 600.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

HARD-WORKED HUSBANDS.

WHILE women are clamoring for a participation in some rights which they contend are unjustly withheld from them by the male sex, they are imposing upon the men certain duties which are undoubtedly their own, and that it would be more decorous for them to resume.

A husband in the United States performs a larger portion of the purely domestic functions than the most subordinate Benedict of any European household. If any master of a house in England or France should venture to usurp some of those privileges of the mistress which are here not only yielded willingly to but thrust upon him, he would soon be sent adrift with a dish-clout hanging to his coat-tail.

It is not surprising that an American wife should have so much time to dress, to gad about shopping and visiting, to spend the night at balls and parties, and to doze away the morning and still complain of ennui, when her obedient husband does so much of the work which ought to be done by herself. He goes to market and begins each day with testing the tenderness of a tender-loin, scrutinizing the age of a fowl, and discussing with a market-man the comparative mealiness of mercers and pink-eyes. His next visit is probably to the grocer, where he has to replenish the waning domestic stock of teas, coffees, and sugar, and be careful not to forget the pickles, and a slice of citron to garnish the pudding. Again, hardly a day passes without a call upon the hardware, crockery, and other shops, for there is sure to be either a new carver to be bought, some broken domestic vessel to be replaced, a worn-out butter-boat to be refitted, or a decrepit tea-kettle to be set on its legs again. His vicarious duties are not yet all performed. There is a new girl wanted, for Bridget has given notice to quit because the work is too hard for her, as her mistress leaves all the indoor labor to her domestic drudge, as she does the outdoor to her marital one, who probably envies his fellow-servant the privilege of leaving at will. The intelligence-office is then to be visited by the hard-worked husband, where out of a throng of half-civilized Irish and German peasant women he is, according to order, to pick out a nice, willing, industrious, capable, and respectable servant. With the natural weakness of masculine human nature, he probably chooses the best-looking, and of course failing to satisfy the mistress of the household, who wants no such trollops, has to renew the attempt again and again.

THE POLITICAL NIAGARA—"A DROWNING MAN CATCHES AT A STRAW."

To these almost daily services may be added the less frequent but periodical ones of getting Bobby's and his brothers' hair cut, fitting the boys at the tailor's with new suits of clothes, and otherwise keeping them decent. The walking half of the night with a squalling baby, and turning out of a warm bed in mid-winter to turn the key of the pantry down stairs, or to run after the doctor a mile away, are of course but the common duties of humanity, and are no doubt so willingly self-assumed that they are not to be set down among those labors unpaid for imposed by the wife upon her husband. They, however, should be taken into the estimate when calculating his proportion of domestic service.

After an enumeration of the labors the woman shifts from herself to her partner, it would be difficult to specify any work that is left for her to do beyond what nature has provided so exclusively for her own share that it is impossible to be done vicariously by the most willing husband. It would be well for the world if we could reassume those labors now performed by men, but which evidently belong to their sphere. They would be executed by them not only with more grace but more efficiency. Women, too, thus fully occupied with the details of domestic life would have less reason to feel that every which seeks relief in social dissipation. Husbands, also, we can believe, would rise to a more elevated height in the appreciation of their wives if free from those household cares which belittle as well as harass the woman, while they are performed with dignity and facility by woman.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1868.

POLITICAL PARTIES.

A GREAT deal of speculation upon the present political situation assumes that a great party may be marched and countermarched like an army, and that it can change in a day its professions, its habits, and its policy to suit what is called success. But such success is by the very conditions supposed not a success of party doctrines and measures, but merely the acquisition of men and patronage. If, for example, the leaders of the Republican party had supposed that the elections of last year indicated a real revulsion of public feeling, and had therefore refused in their National Convention to approve the reconstruction policy of Congress, or to declare for equal rights, or for a national honor, by saying the date of according to the spirit as well as the letter of the contract; had then nominated REVERDY JOHNSON for President upon the ground that he had advocated the emancipation amendment, and had succeeded in electing him, would any body have been so solemnly waggish as to call it a Republican victory? Or, had it a Republican victory but a triumph of Republican principles at the polls?

So of the Democratic party. If it should acquiesce in the Republican reconstruction; declare for the honest payment of the debt as understood by the national creditors; agree to universal suffrage, and elect Mr. CHASE because he was opposed to the policy of impeachment—how would his election be a Democratic triumph? Those who so voted what would be called a Democratic ticket would indeed have control of the patronage of the Government, but at the price of the professions, and habits, and policy of the party. To suppose such a thing is to suppose such a total want of conviction, of consistency, and of political honor in the party leaders and followers as to expose them to universal contempt.

It is often a rhetorical convenience to compare a party to an army, but it is a very deceptive comparison. Political parties have their origin in human nature. Men are naturally Tories and Liberals, as they are naturally hopeful and generous, or skeptical and selfish. Imagination only can determine how their part in determining our political affinities, as they have in all human relations. The same division is apparent in religion and in science. But a party is not merely a body of men arbitrarily organized to oppose another body, and constantly changing its position to secure an advantage. It is the growth of natural tendencies, and applies to varying social, industrial, or political questions the same unvarying general principles. Thus modern political history is the story of one contest under a thousand forms; the struggle between popular power and that of individuals and classes. With every century its aspect is very different, but the struggle is always evident.

In this country there had always been a Tory and a Liberal party. The Toryism and Liberalism have revealed themselves, of course, according to the issues of the time. Within the last generation the overshadowing issue has been the supremacy of the slave power. Ignorance, passion, materialism of every kind—all the baser feelings and aims of the country not without exceptions—were naturally united in the support of that supremacy; and the party name by which its advocates were known was Democratic. Its struggle, although prolonged and powerful and bloody, was unsuccessful. Slavery was abolished, and the party prestige disappeared. But a party which traditionally attracts the ignorant class of the population is necessarily immense, and is peculiarly susceptible of admirable discipline and organization. Intelligence begets independence.

Now the sentiment of hostility to equal rights, the prejudice of race, the jealousy of free education, indifference to the national honor, all ration, indifference to the national honor, all the meaner tendencies, passions, and influences, still remain, and, politically, they are still attached to the Democratic party. If the leaders of that party can persuade the Convention not to express these tendencies and sympathies, and to nominate a candidate who is politically identified with opposition to them, the result will indicate to the world that the sincere Tories, the reactionaries, the repudiators, and the honest believers in the white man's government, will hold their ranges and refuse to vote, or will vote for another, or they will decline to follow such leading. If they take the latter course, the Democratic party will be divided into two factions, one of which will cry aloud, "Down with the nigger!" while the other thinks it merely, but says nothing. If they take the former the question will be merely whether the party can be kept together in safer in the hands of a party of its hereditary enemies than in those of its proved friends.

It is very true that when great issues change the composition of parties changes also. But the same spirit and tendency still inspire them. The mistake is in supposing that the change in the issues of recent political situation is completed. No war is ended until the last battle is fought. And this Presidential campaign is the last battle in the long and dire struggle of Slavery to rule the country. Nothing can secure the reconstruction which takes precedence of all other national questions whatever except the success of the Republican party. Until the nomination of GRANT and COLFAX the whole Democratic party seemed at the Republican reconstruction. The World said that the country will stand depends upon the result of the Presidential election." And because the World and its party, foreseeing the inevitable election of GRANT and COLFAX upon the reconstruction, as the only hope of peace and of an opportunity to attend to the national financial questions, suddenly profess acquiescence in the policy, and shout for a candidate identified with it, is any body likely to suppose that policy to be more secure in charge of those who four weeks ago denounced it as revolutionary and unconstitutional? In accepting their nomination, Mr. CHASE would virtually say, "I believe that Horatio Seymour, George H. Pendleton, Thomas H. Seymour, and Mr. M'Clellan party of 1864, and Forrest, Beauregard, and the ex-rebels, with the mob who yesterday cried 'Down with the nigger!' are now ready to secure justice, and peace, and liberty in the Union than the Republican party." Does any body seriously suppose that he does believe it? Even under the circumstances of the case, what else would his acceptance of the nomination of this party, upon whatever platform and under whatever profession, mean? It would be but an excellent proof of the thorough dominance of the Republican principles and policy that the Democratic party were forced to ask him. But who would it prove to regard Mr. CHASE himself?

A great political issue, intrenched in the tradition, interest, and feeling of a nation, does not disappear because a party resolves to suppress the use of an election decides to be silent upon it. It does not disappear, but it is evidently about to pass away from its commanding prominence. The present strength, disorganized and demoralized condition of the Democratic party shows that the great struggle of this generation hastens to a settlement which that party has desperately resisted. Its willingness to abandon what it called its principles, and to seek a candidate among its most radical opponents, is the symptom of a political change which the election of GRANT will complete. But the party of progress, of justice, of humanity will not rise from the Democratic, but from the Republican side of the issue. The future will still be a party of resistance, of reaction, of hostility to progress, and it will be composed of the great mass of what is now called the Democratic party.

THE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

IT is announced that a Convention of soldiers and sailors is to meet in the Cooper Institute upon the 4th of July to confirm and sustain the Democratic Convention at Tammany Hall upon the same day.

Let the soldiers and sailors remember that five years ago this same day was one of the most painful national anxiety, for it was known at an early hour that the Army of the Potomac was engaged with LEE, and that at my moment the final struggle of the Western armies for Vicksburg and Port Hudson might begin. On that day the Union soldiers and sailors in the field were truly America herself. Their defeat would have been an incalculable disaster for the country, for liberty, for civilization. The duty of every generous, patriotic man was plain. It was to join in sending to the front one great, hearty, sublime chorus of sympathy and encouragement, that the men there might know in the midst of the sharp struggle that they were in the minds and hearts and upon the prayerful lips of their brothers at home.

Upon that day as now there was a great Democratic meeting at the Academy of Music close to the new Tammany Hall. Chief among the speakers was Horatio Seymour, then Governor of the State, and now as then one of the chief leaders of his party. He said that the authorities which were directing the armies in the field and had taken measures to recruit them were despots and tyrants; that the fundamental principles of the Government were in danger—not from the rebels upon the hills of Gettysburg and intrenched in Vicksburg and Port Hudson—but from the lawful authorities; that the arrest of VALLANDIGHAM for exhorting forcible resistance to recruiting the armies in the field was the destruction of every precious right of American citizens, and that the only hope of the country against anarchy and ruin was the Democratic party. Then, speaking to thousands of the most lawless and ignorant of men in a moment of unparalleled excitement and of the greatest peril and doubt as to the issue of the war, he warned the Government that the plea of military necessity might be urged by a mob as well as by a Government, and then concluded, amidst the shouting applause of his Democratic audience, "Where are the victories that were promised for to-day?"

And when within a week his contemptuous question at Gettysburg and Vicksburg the air was thick with battle smoke, the ground was soaked with heroic blood, fiery charge after charge was impending the rebel lines, and thousands of brave men were falling for the salvation of their country. But not one solitary word which fell that day from the lips of Horatio Seymour, or Thomas H. Seymour, or Richard O'Gorman, who called the war wicked, was a word of sympathy, or cheer, or faith, or hope addressed to the soldiers, or would have consoled one wounded or dying boy upon the field. A few days later, stimulated by the appeals of the Governor, the draft riots began in the city of New York which threatened to expand into a counter-rebellion in the rear of the national army.

The orators of that day will be the orators of his. They will be the counselors of the Convention. Probably they will profess to acquiesce in the results of the war. Perhaps they will claim the credit of the national victory. But, soldiers and sailors, the truth remains. Five years ago your companions fell at your side and are buried upon your fields of victory. Do you consent to act with them, or to betray the cause for which you fought? Do you come to support those who derided you as LINCOLN'S hirelings, or give the hand of fellowship to those who denounced the war as wicked? "Where are the victories that were promised?" sneered Horatio Seymour. You helped to win them. Will you abandon them? And will you maintain them by supporting those who supported you and would now secure the peace you conquered by force, if they could, would gladly undo the work of the war and restore rebels to power?

THE HAPPY FAMILY.

IT is clear that Mr. PENDLETON does not intend to follow the counsel of those who are opposed to him and gracefully yield the Presidential nomination to Mr. CHASE. He very naturally thinks that if Mr. CHASE is coming over to the Democratic party for the sake of the nomination he will be quite willing to bring with him; while, if the Democratic party is going to adopt the Republican platform, the candidate of that platform is already nominated. Either Mr. CHASE is false to his Republican principles or he has renounced them. If he holds to them, he is no more a Democrat than Mr. SUMNER; if he has renounced them, he is too fresh a deserter to be promoted to a place of command.

A Democratic paper in North Carolina says that Mr. CHASE, as the Democratic candidate, would get every Democratic vote which the white interest—that is the Democratic white interest—could control. That would not be a very formidable number. At the North Mr. CHASE, as the Democratic candidate, would receive the support of Mr. DIXON and Mr. DOOLITTLE and their friends. But they have voted against Mr. CHASE before for a long time, and have already included in the Democratic estimate. The Chief Justice, moreover, has no personal prestige or popularity. There is nothing in his name or in the history of his public life that would arouse the enthusiasm of the Democracy. The CHASE meetings would be obliged to be strictly silent about the candidate. The irrepressible Nasbys who do the hack work of the campaign would constantly bring "the natural governors of the country" to grief by denouncing measures and measures which the candidate had steadily opposed and defeated.

The nomination of Mr. CHASE would bring no material and no inspiration to the campaign. Mere abuse of General GRANT, one of the most honest, simple, and unassuming of men, would fall flat upon an audience which knew that his virtues had compelled the party to choose a candidate from its foes. There could be no ridicule of "the nigger," for Mr. CHASE has been his especial champion. There could be no exaltation of "the superior race," because the candidate would be chosen in the hope of winning the vote of "the inferior." Indeed, the party would be reduced to the dismal plight of Mr. W. L. SCARBOROUGH, who, in a word meeting that was favored with the approving presence of that eminent friend of the colored man, Captain RYNDERS, said: "This was intended to be a white man's Government. That did not mean that the Democratic party meant any thing unkind to the black race. In fact, the Democratic party meant to do good to the African race, while the Radical party fed him up with fancies." Exactly; and the most pernicious fancy with which the Radicals have fed him is freedom, and the African race knows it.

Under the same direful necessity the New York World remarks, with animation, that the Democratic party—which has been the great Democratic party—which has been the great bulwark of the country, and which tried to dissolve the Union to secure the perpetuity of the system—is the party of equal rights. By all means. It will be altogether remembered that the excellent Captain RYNDERS always took the Anti-Slavery Conventions under his protection; while the World itself always speaks of its colored fellow-citizens, especially when assembled in Southern Conventions, with an urbanity and fine feeling that shows how sacred in its view are the equal rights of the class.

We wish with interest the meeting of the Democratic happy family of PENDLETON and CHASE, of BELMONT and VALLANDIGHAM, of the LA CROSSE Convention and the New York World, upon the 4th of July.

FREE SCHOOLS.

IT is interesting to remark that while we are told that the Church of Rome entertains the liveliest hopes of reclaiming the United States from error and turning them gently into her fold, in Europe, one of the most entirely Romish countries in Europe, Austria, is shaking herself free from ecclesiastical domination. The two great events in the recent history of Austria are the civil marriage act and the religious freedom of the schools. The Pope protested in a curiously cajoling and threatening letter, but FRANCIS JOSEPH, the head of his shoulders, knew that he couldn't help himself, and approved the acts. They are most significant both as signs of the actual condition of the Empire and as means that do rapid further emancipation from ecclesiastical control. But the Vatican is fully awake to the danger to its authority that lurks in such reforms, especially in the free school act.

A year ago a circular was issued from Rome to the Catholic Bishops which declared the direful consequences of civil marriages, and declared that the strongest means the withdrawal of the public schools from the ecclesiastical authority, and submitting them to the civil and political. The Bishop of Trieste fulminated a denunciation, and a very able and efficient officer, calls attention in a late speech to two results of the papal circular: one is the assault that was made in the Reichsrath by the Catholic party upon the general system of instruction in France, and the other the espionage, or system of spies, which, in the eighty-three archbishoprics and superior education in France, in which seven hundred professors give lectures accessible to every body, suddenly filled the audience with informers. The result was that the most calumnious charges against some of the professors, and a strenuous attempt to have the lectures more strictly supervised by the Government. But this attempt of the clerical party was defeated, and the schools remain as free as before.

The free public school system is the citadel of liberty. The attempt of any ecclesiastical party to control it to sectarian ends should be resisted in every country. In Austria the schools wholly secular. There may be as many private sectarian schools as can be supported. But the State has no schools, and the State schools should be under no special church domination.

In Ohio there was a proposition last year to bring the Roman Catholic parish schools under the public school system. But they were all to retain Roman Catholic teachers as such. Now it should be as grave an offense to inquire, as a qualification, into the religious faith of a teacher as into that of a President or a Governor. All the people of every faith are taxed to support the schools, and they are open to all children of whatever faith may attend them. Therefore there should be nothing allowed in the schools to which any person of any belief can fairly object; and as the common version of the Bible is offensive to Roman Catholics it would be better, since Roman Catholic tax-payers help to maintain the schools, to omit the reading of the Bible as a school exercise. If any body is comforted by declaring that then the schools would be "godless," let him have that comfort. We certainly suffer with him. The School Board of Cincinnati offered to have read the Douay, or Roman Catholic version of the Bible. But of course that did not prevent the objection. The difficulty was not the one or other version of the Bible, but the control of the schools. But as the Roman Catholics object to the Protestant Bible, and as it is not a necessity, it might wisely be laid aside as a part of the regular school exercise.

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Legislature, proposing to give a large sum of the public money to the support of Roman Catholic schools in the city of New York, was seriously modified, doubtless in consequence of the loud and vehement protest of the press. But it is not a purpose which is relaxed, and the intelligent opposition to it should be constantly stronger. At present there are not enough schools. This is not only a very serious inconvenience but it is a public danger. The man who pays his school-bill has a right to have proper room and instruction for his child, and a right to complain if they are not afforded. But, on the other hand, schoolhouses are costly, and the debt of the city is very high—half a mill upon every taxable dollar higher than ever before. This is burdensome, but it is the most necessary burden of all, and it should be cheerfully borne even if made heavier by an equal necessity. If it be true that there are forty thousand children who are crowded out of the schools, that is the most pressing public necessity than the provision of more school-houses. But at every door of the new and of the old let public opinion, like a flaming sword, forbid the entrance of any ecclesiastical control whatever.

THE CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

WE hope that Congress will not adjourn until it has expressed its opinion upon MR. JENCKES's Civil Service bill. It has been received with universal favor by the papers of all parties; and it could there ever be a better opportunity for such a reform than when, as now, one of the great parties of the country is renouncing principles and traditions of long which, after the settlement of reconstruction, must lead to a reorganization of parties. The civil service reform proceeds naturally from the party which has inspired always by a profound conviction and an earnest purpose, and which has drawn to itself the sympathy of the most intelligent and thoughtful minds in the world. As the principles of that party are rapidly ascending to an unchallenged supremacy which will mould for many years the policy of the government, it is only becoming that the spirit of those principles should be diffused through all the details of administration. It should be the rightful glory of the Republican party that a restored justice to the policy of the Government, and honesty and capacity to its conduct, and if, by any hesitation or timidity, action upon this bill should be delayed, the majority will have needlessly defrauded the party of a part of its honorable and legitimate fame.

There is no way in which Congress could more efficiently aid the good cause and its candidates than by a judicious simplification of the Tax bill and the passage of the Civil Service bill.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

A MOST interesting and significant meeting was held last week to found a National Institute of Letters, Arts, and Sciences. The first meeting for organization, which was signed by sixty or seventy of the most eminent names in each department, in the city of New York, described with peculiarity the objects of the new association. The want of united effort and mutual support, of a tribunal of their peers, is a serious misfortune to the men of the country named, and they therefore propose an organization, such as in older countries has been of the utmost service to intellectual development.

The Institute is to comprise eighty members of not less than thirty nor more than two hundred members. It is to include members, fellows, honorary members, corresponding members, and founders, and is to issue diplomas. It is to issue every month Proceedings, containing reports of the acts of each Academy, and abstracts of memoirs and debates; and every year Transactions consisting only of memoirs read before the Academies and accepted by the council of the Institute. The Constitution is very properly extremely simple and was approved by the meeting.

The value of such an association, as of all others, will depend upon the sincere interest and sagacious zeal with which its objects are pursued. If any body mistakes a means for an end, he always suffers. If a multitude make the same mistake, they are very sure to pay the same penalty. An Institute of Letters, Science, and Art will not of itself, and by the form of membership, make eminent authors, savans, and artists, as an Academy of Design can not guarantee genius to its members. But organization of force is of the greatest use; and comparison, criticism, opportunity, are all ministers of excellence. The Della Cruscan and the Arcadian Academies can not be mentioned without smiling at some airy extravagances, and plenty of delicate-winged satire has been blown at the Academies of Painting. But Sir JOSHUA was none the less an excellent painter that he was President of the Royal Academy, nor the most illustrious Frenchmen that they were members of the Institute. The object of the Institute is of no service to French letters, or the Academy to English art, because literature and art spring from genius, which gives and does not take academic rules, is wholly to mistake the intention and scope of an Institute and an Academy.

The proposition has been received by those of the various guilds elsewhere with enthusiasm. BOSTON, Philadelphia, Princeton, as well as remoter points, North and South, had a voice in the meeting of organization, and an Executive Committee of active and sagacious men was appointed to complete the necessary details.

A CORRECTION.

IN an article upon NEW YORK Politics, in which it discusses several possible candidates for Governor, the Sun says of WILLIAM A. WHEELER, the President of the late Constitutional Convention, that he rather lost than gained strength in that position. The Sun is curiously mistaken. MR. WHEELER, by his dignity, urbanity, entire impartiality, ample parliamentary knowledge, and genial courtesy with which he presided, made so deep an impression upon all parties in the Convention, that the resolution of thanks, moved and unanimously adopted in his temporary absence, called forth the warmest and most sincere expression of respect and admiration. But, besides the peculiar accomplishments of a presiding officer, the delegates of his own party found in MR. WHEELER a quiet political sagacity, moderation, and sound sense, united to the strongest conviction and the highest honor. He is also a man of great practical political experience; and should his name be presented for the office of which the Sun speaks, it would rally to its support, in all parts of the State, a multitude of enthusiastic and devoted friends, and votes for a man wholly free from cliques, bargains, and jealousies.

"PITY THE SORROWS OF A POOR OLD MAN."

THE poor we have always with us, but the aged poor appeal to our tenderest sympathy. In the order of natural debt of living, the care which the child in a sense incurs to the parent the mature man or woman pays. But when age is destitute and neglected, and in all the world no loving hands or thoughtful care, there is no spectacle so sorrowful, so suffering that should be sooner relieved. Two years ago some excellent citizens of this city founded a home for aged women at No. 259 West Twenty-seventh Street, in which twenty-five now find a comfortable retreat. The same kindness has just opened a similar home for aged men, in which it is hoped the same consolation will be afforded to some at least who must otherwise sadly suffer. It is a simple charity which knows no sect, and has neither the will nor the means for any but a most noiseless and unostentatious career. Yet it needs gifts of all kinds—subscriptions for the available fund, food, clothing, books, and whatever may make life decent and comfortable. It is, as we know, well-organized and managed, and there is no charity more modest and deserving.

PURE REASON.

WE had scarcely finished reading the neat sentences of Senator HENDRICKS of Indiana, one of the innumerable candidates for the Democratic nomination, to the effect that the entire success of the Southern States were vile inventions of the Radicals, intended to overthrow the Constitution of the United States, when we found the Tribune describing one of the Senator's party-papers, speaking of the murder of a Republican member of the next South Carolina Legislature as "one of the unfortunate results of the fierce political struggle which excited the badinage of the waggish News were merely that a party of the Ku-Klux Klan went to the house of Mr. DILL and murdered two or three persons who were guilty of being colored men and non-believers in the Ku-Klux Democracy.

"Very well," exclaims the Democratic organ of VALENCIA and SEYMOUR; "you are responsible for it." "How?" "By exciting hatred of race with your confounded equal rights and suffrage." "And how would you have prevented it?" "By putting the nigger in his place, and keeping him there."

Such a conversation is a free but a remarkably accurate rendering of the speech of the Indiana Senator, candidate, etc., who said that in his judgment "the people" of the late rebel States meant the late rebel class, and that they alone were rightfully invested with political power. Let them do as they choose with the rest of the population. Such a plan would not, of course, excite any hatred of race. "I am a perfectly reasonable man," says the angry husband. "All that I ask is to be allowed to do exactly as I please—please."

AN OBVIOUS QUESTION.

"A MODEST INQUIRER" wishes to know whether, in case MR. GRACE, the President of the American Freedman's Union Commission, should be nominated by the Democrats for President, they would also nominate for Vice-President the Vice-President of the Commission, WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON?

The probability may perhaps be inferred from a recent published remark of MR. GARRISON's, that he would as soon trust Satan to head a moral reform as the Democratic party to advance the cause of justice and equal rights.

A DUELIST PROMOTED.

IT is stated that BARON KUSSEROW, the Prussian private secretary of LEGATION, who fought a duel with MR. LAWRENCE, and whose censure was asked of the Prussian Government, has been transferred to Washington, and to a higher post than that he filled in Washington. This is not surprising, for Prussia is a strictly military monarchy, and the censure or disgrace of a diplomatist for a practice which military honor imperatively justifies, is not to be expected from its Government. The Prussian Court and society are military, the military codes of honor prevail, and it will be long yet before the duel will disgrace in public estimation any officer of the Government. MR. SEWARD, of course, could ask and expect nothing more than the recall of a diplomatic person who has violated our laws and defied the public conscience.

A CASE OF EXTREME DESTITUTION.

A PHILOSOPHIC rural paper of the Democratic faith, the Staten Islander, says that one of its neighbors of the same party has nominated several candidates for the Presidency, "but no Democrats among them, we believe." It proceeds to say that if the faithful must be beaten again, "or else succeed with a Republican who is a Democrat as to the main live issues," it will fall into line; for, says this sorrowful censor, "we confess we are tired of being beaten; we 'cry, enough'—of that; and, since Samho is made ruler of the land, we, of course, shall walk heartily for 'MASSA CHASE,' if nominated."

THAT LEG.

WE return our sincerest thanks to the generous friends who have so promptly responded to our invitation in behalf of CHARLES BERKELEY, late of Company E, First Regiment United States Colored Infantry, who lost his right leg before Petersburg, and afterward unfortunately broke the substitute furnished by the Government. We have already received forty-four dollars in various sums, and none is too small to be welcome. Should the generosity continue, we shall be able, we hope, by next week to state that the leg is secured. And when it is given to the grateful soldier we shall not fail to accompany it with the suggestion of "D," who sends five dollars, that "when he gets on his pins or his pins on again, he had better keep out of haylofts, or else he should be more careful than tumbling."

Advice which the poor fellow will be very sure to follow.

LITERARY.

"MANUAL of the James Collection of Early Italian Pictures," by RUSSELL STURGIS, Jun. This interesting, instructive, and valuable gallery of early pictures is now in the Yale school of the Fine Arts at New Haven to remain for three years, before which time it is hoped that it may be permanently secured. MR. STURGIS's little pamphlet is, as he properly calls it, a brief guide to the study of early Christian art, containing simple descriptions of the pictures, just biographical notices, and a most careful expression of opinion. MR. STURGIS is a ripe and conscientious student of the subject, and his little work is singularly free from meaningless adjectives and generalities. Indeed, with his book and the collection, a student may acquire a very accurate conception of the characteristics and progress of early Christian art, so that a visit to the Great European Gallery would be merely a continuation of the delightful study. MR. STURGIS has prepared an ingenious and simple chart, by which at a glance the time in which every noted Italian painter flourished, the school with which he is associated, and his relation to the epochs of the other painters is plainly seen. We wish the same knowledge, and skill, and conscience were brought to the preparation of much larger works that MR. STURGIS has shown in this. His faith is evidently that of every true artist and successful worker—that is worth doing at all is worth doing well.

WILD ROSES.

I WALKED in the joyous morning,
The morning of June and life,
Ere the birds had ceased to warble
Their sweetest of love and strife.

I walked alone in the morning,
And who so glad as I
When I saw the pale wild roses
Hang from the branch on high?

Fairer than stars were the roses,
Faint was the fragrance and rare,
Not any flower in the garden
Could with those roses compare.

But the day was all before me,
The tumult of youth's delight,
Why bear a burden of roses
Before the calm of the night?

Till then stay a while in gladness
The air, and the earth below,
With tender beauty and sweetness
They can not choose but bestow.

So I kissed the roses, and highly
I breathed of their peace divine;
It is time, when I come back, I said,
To make the sweet roses mine.

I went in the gladsome morning;
I said, my part for an hour
Of wild rose-buds will roses trembled,
The dew was on every flower.

I returned in the joyless evening,
I yearned with passion then
For the pale and peerless roses
I never should see again.

For another had taken delight
In color and perfume rare,
And another hand had gathered
My roses beyond compare.

I may wander east, may wander west,
Wherever the sun doth shine,
I never shall find the wild roses,
The roses I thought were mine.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

The important legislation of the week has been the adoption of the bill restoring the Southern States. The bill, as passed by the Senate and the House, on July 19, 1867, and June 22, admits the States of North and South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Arkansas to representation in either House, and restores them to all the rights of self-government, which they abandoned by their rebellion of 1861. Arkansas and Tennessee having already been restored, Texas and Virginia will have received the President's this fall, when it shall have received the President's signature or been passed over his veto, will leave only Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas to be dealt with. The conditions on which these six States have been admitted are briefly as follows: Their Legislatures must have ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, forever abolishing slavery, and the new Constitutions must guarantee that there shall never be any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise on account of race or color, Indians not taxed excepted. Georgia was required to strike out the provisions in her Constitution proven to be in violation of contracts made before the war in 1861. All the States except Georgia prior to the 4th of July, when the President shall proclaim the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment by the requisite number of States, which is to do within the Legislature, which is to do within ninety days after it shall have received the Governor's approval. The amendment provides that immediately upon the proclamation of the President's proclamation the State officers and members of the Legislature shall be installed, and that no duly elected person shall be prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment from holding office shall be eligible.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Texas Reconstruction Convention is now in session, and has talked of nothing else but the test oath required by the General Government. Some of the more bitter rebels in the Convention want to secede from the State Government, as they did in 1861, adopted under Confederate rule.

The South Carolina Democratic Convention has selected among its delegates to the New York Democratic Convention Hon. F. H. Elmore, Hon. B. F. Rhett, Jun., and M. W. Gary, three of whom were generals in the rebel army.

The new Governor of Florida, Mr. Harrison Reed, has been inaugurated, and the new Legislature has assembled at Tallahassee. The military authorities objected to the action which the Convention bill before Congress had been passed. The Radicals have a majority of one vote in the Legislature on a joint ballot.

The President on June 13 sent to the Senate the nomination of Reverdy Johnson as Minister to England, and they promptly confirmed him.

The name of President Andrew Johnson has been inscribed on the roll of membership of the New York Union League.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE MAUNA LOA volcanic eruption still continued forty-one days after the first denomination, and the accounts received from Honolulu speak of it as a new feature in that Hawaiian. Nature has also been largely indulging in water-spouts and earthquakes.

Michel the Third, ruler of Servia, was assassinated at Belgrade on June 10. His nephew, MILAN OBRENOWITZ, succeeds him.

CZAR ALEXANDER of Russia and Emperor Napoleon of France have turned all nations to agree to discussions at the next time of war of torpedoes and bullets which explode after entering the flesh. A wise amendment would prohibit the use of all torpedoes and bullets in time of war.

The Sultan of Turkey, in addition to his other reforms, has wisely concluded to attract foreigners to Syria, by empowering them to hold real estate.

The Viceroy of Egypt contemplates an attack on the rear of Abyssinia.

The Republic of Paraguay has been badly repulsed.

DUEL BETWEEN COLORED MEN NEAR SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

THE SAVANNAH DUEL.

UPON this page we give an illustration of a duel lately fought at Screven's Ferry on the South Carolina shore, opposite Savannah, between two colored men, JACKSON BRAND and EUGENE MOREHEAD, who were formerly slaves. The facts as reported to us from Savannah are, that BRAND was formerly a staunch Republican and member of the Loyal League, but had recently joined the "Conservative" party, and was President of a Conservative Club of which MOREHEAD was Vice-President. The latter, suspecting the fidelity of BRAND, accused him of having said, as a member of the Loyal League, that he would yet wash his hands in the blood of Southern men. BRAND indignantly denied the charge, and the disputants were separated by friends. The next day BRAND sent a challenge to MORSEHEAD by HARDEE the Secretary of the Club. It was accepted by MORSEHEAD, who chose double-barrelled shot-guns loaded with eight slugs; and the combatants were next morning placed at fifteen paces distance. Both fired together. MORSEHEAD was untouched, and cried, "By ——, I have got him!" as BRAND fell, exclaiming, "I am not whipped yet!" He was shot in both thighs, and bled profusely. MORSEHEAD professing that he had intended merely to lame him, BRAND refused to be supported upon his feet for another shot. This was of course refused; and after MORSEHEAD had approached and shaken hands, BRAND was carried to his lodgings, where physicians were called; but the prostration was such that he lived only two hours and a half. Unfortunately there was no surgeon on the field.

KING THEODORE, AS HE LAY DEAD AT MAGDALA, APRIL 13, 1868.—[SEE PAGE 405.]

In itself this duel was just as absurd and tragical as a duel between any other two men. But, although memorable in itself, this incident has a great significance. The personal courage of the combatants is undeniable. The canons of "the code" were all faithfully observed. It was, indeed, the imitation of a very wretched example set to these men by the lately dominant class, whose chivalry was but a form of barbarism. But the duel must be regarded as an illustration of an awakening sense of manhood and even of self-respect, showing itself in an irregular and deplorable form. It suggests, also, the hopelessness of any effort at renewed degradation of that manhood by any practical reaction; and exhorts us to still more diligent labors to promote that education in the moral, and, hand in hand, conscience which will make such men as BRAND and MORSEHEAD truly valuable fellow-citizens.

KING THEODORE'S BODY.

WE give, as the fitting sequel to our illustrations of the Abyssinian war, a sketch of the dead body of King THEODORE laid upon a hammock in the camp at Magdala, surrounded by a guard of British soldiers. His face, though in complexion very dark, had nothing whatever of the negro about it. The features were finely cut and very expressive of power and strength of will; the brow massive and thoughtful, indicative of great natural intelligence. His frame was slight, but well shaped and firmly knit. He had refused to take any food, it is said, during the last three or four days before his death. His body was placed in the outer porch of the hovel at Magdala, called a church, for as a suicide THEODORE could not be given Christian rites or military honors. It was intended that the church should be spared from the general conflagration of Magdala, lest the priests should say that the common tie of Christianity between conquerors and conquered had been forgotten. But, despite the precautions taken, the flames seized fiercely upon the building, and in a few minutes not a trace was left to distinguish the spot in which the Emperor lay from the blackened ruins around.

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER VIII.

LATE that evening I was surprised at my lodgings by a visit from Mr. Bruff.

There was a noticeable change in the lawyer's manner. He had lost its usual confidence and spirit. He shook hands with me, for the first time in his life, in silence.

"Are you going back to Hampstead?" I asked, by way of saying something.

"I have just left Hampstead," he answered.

"I know, Mr. Franklin, that you have got at the truth at last. But, I tell you plainly, if I could have foreseen the price that was to be paid for it, I should have preferred leaving you in the dark."

"You have seen Rachel?"

"I have been here after taking her back to Portland Place; it was impossible to let her return in the carriage by herself. I can hardly hold you responsible—considering that you are not her guide and by my permission—for the shock that this unlucky interview has inflicted on her. All I can do is to provide against a repetition of the mischief. She is young—she has a resolute spirit—she will get over this, with time and rest to help her. I want to be assured that you will do nothing to hinder her recovery. May I depend on you not making no second attempt to see her—except with my sanction and approval?"

"After what she has suffered, and after what I have suffered, you may rely on me."

"I have your promise?"

"You have my promise."

Mr. Bruff looked relieved. He put down his hat and drew his chair nearer to mine.

"That's settled," he said. "Now about the future—your future, I mean. To my mind the result of the extraordinary turn which the matter has now taken is briefly this. In the first place, we are sure that Rachel has told you the whole truth, as plainly as words can tell it. In the second place—though we know that there must be some dreadful mistake somewhere—we can hardly blame her for believing you to be guilty, on the evidence of her own senses, backed, as that evidence has been, by circumstances which appear, on the face of them, to tell dead against you."

There I interposed. "I don't blame Rachel," I said. "I only regret that she could not prevail on herself to speak more plainly to me at the time."

"You might as well regret that Rachel is not somebody else," rejoined Mr. Bruff. "And even then I doubt if a girl of any delicacy, whose heart had been set on marrying you, could have brought herself to charge you to your face with being a thief. Any how, it was not in Rachel's nature to do it. In a very different matter to this matter of yours—which placed her, however, in a position not altogether unlike her position toward you—I happen to know that she was influenced by a similar motive to the motive which actuated her conduct in your case. Besides, as she told me herself, on our way to town this evening, if she had spoken plainly, she would no more have believed your denial then than she believes it now. What answer can you make to that? There is no answer to be made to it. Come! come! Mr. Franklin, my view of the case has been proved to be all wrong. I admit—but, as things are now, my advice may be worth having for all that. I tell you plainly, we shall be wasting our time and eudgeling our brains to no purpose if it may be prepared to redeem it when the year's time has expired. If he redeems it, Mr. Luker must himself—according to the terms of his own arrangement—take the Diamond out of his bankers' hands. Under these circumstances I propose setting a watch at the bank, as the present month draws to an end, and discovering who the person is to whom Mr. Luker receives the Moonstone. Do you see it now?"

I admitted (a little unwillingly) that the idea was a new one, at any rate.

"It's Mr. Murthwaite's idea quite as much as mine," said Mr. Bruff. "It might have never entered my head but for a conversation we had together some time since. If Mr. Murthwaite is right, the Indians are likely to be on the look-out at the bank, toward the end of the month too—and something serious may come of it. What comes of it doesn't matter to you and me—except as it may help us to lay our hands on the mysterious Somebody who pawned the Diamond. That person, you may rely on it, is responsible (I don't pretend to know how) for the position in which you stand at this moment; and that person alone can set you right in Rachel's estimation."

"I can't deny," I said, "that the plan you propose meets the difficulty in a way that is very daring, and very ingenious, and very new. But—"

"But you have an objection to make?"

"HE STARTED IMPULSIVELY TO HIS FEET AND LOOKED AT ME."

"Yes. My objection is that your proposal obliges us to wait."

"Granted. As I reckon the time, it requires you to wait about a fortnight—more or less. Is that so very long?"

"It's a lifetime, Mr. Bruff, in such a situation as mine. My existence will be simply unendurable to me, unless I do something toward clearing my character at once."

"Well, well, I understand that. Have you thought yet of what you can do?"

"I have thought of consulting Sergeant Cuff."

He has retired from the police. It's useless to expect the Sergeant to help you."

"I know where to find him; and I can but try."

"Try," said Mr. Bruff, after a moment's consideration. "The case has assumed such an extraordinary aspect since Sergeant Cuff's time that you may revive his interest in the inquiry. Try, and let me hear the result. In the mean while, I be continued, rising, "if you make no discoveries between this and the end of the month, am I free to try, on my side, what can be done by keeping a look-out at the bank?"

"Certainly," I answered—"unless I relieve you of all necessity for trying the experiment in the interval."

Mr. Bruff smiled, and took up his hat.

"Tell Sergeant Cuff," he rejoined, "that I say the discovery of the truth depends on the discovery of the person who pawned the Diamond. And let me hear what the Sergeant's experience may be."

So we parted for that night.

Early the next morning I set forth for the little town of Dorking—the place of Sergeant Cuff's retirement, as indicated to me by Betteredge.

Inquiring at the hotel I received the necessary directions for finding the Sergeant's cottage. It was conducted by a quiet by-road, a little way out of the town, and it stood snugly in the middle of its own plot of garden ground, protected by a good brick wall at the back and the sides, and by a high quicket hedge in front. The gate, ornamented at the upper part by smartly-painted trellis-work, was locked. After ringing at the bell I peered through the trellis-work, and saw the great Cuff's favorite flower every where: in the borders of the garden, covering over his door, looking in at his windows. Further on the crimes and the mysteries of the great city, the illustrious thief-taker was placidly living out the last Sybarite years of his life, smothered in roses!

A decent elderly woman opened the gate to me, and at once most unmistakably let the hopes I had built on securing the assistance of Sergeant Cuff. He had started, only the day before, on a journey to Ireland.

"Has he gone there on business?" I asked.

The woman smiled. "He has only one business now, Sir," she said, "and that's roses. Some great man's gardener in Ireland has found out something new in the growing of roses—and Mr. Cuff's away to inquire into it."

"Do you know when he will be back?"

"It's quite uncertain, Sir. Mr. Cuff said he should come back directly, or be away some time, just according as he found the new discovery worth nothing, or worth looking into. If you have any message to leave for him, I'll take care, Sir, that he gets it."

I gave her my card, having first written on it in pencil: "I have something to say about the Moonstone. Let me hear from you as soon as you get back." That done, there was nothing left but to submit to circumstances, and return to London.

In the irritable condition of my mind, at the time of which I am now writing, the abortive result of my journey to the Sergeant's cottage simply aggravated the restless impulse in me to be doing something. On the day of my return from Dorking I determined that the next morning should find me bent on a new effort forcing my way, through all obstacles, from the darkness to the light.

What form was my next experiment to take? If the excellent Betteredge had been present while I was considering that question, and if he had been let into the secret of my thoughts, he would, no doubt, have declared that the German side of me was, on this occasion, my uppermost side. To speak seriously, it is perhaps possible that my German training was in some degree responsible for the labyrinth of useless speculations in which I now involved myself. For the greater part of the night I sat smoking, and building up theories, one more profoundly improbable than another. When I did get to sleep my waking faculty pursued me in dreams. I rose the next morning, with Objective-Subjective and Subjective-Objective inextricably entangled together in my mind; and I began the day which was to witness my next effort at practical action of some kind, by doubting whether I had any sort of right (on purely philosophical grounds), to consider any sort of thing (the Diamond included) as existing at all.

How long I might have remained lost in the mist of my own metaphysics, if I had been left to extricate myself, it is impossible for me to say. As the event proved, accident came to my rescue, and happily delivered me. I happened to wear, that morning, the same coat which I had worn on the day of my interview with Rachel. Searching for something else in one of the pockets, I came upon a crumpled piece of paper, and, taking it out, found Betteredge's forgotten letter in my hand.

It seemed hard on my good old friend to leave him without a reply. I went to my writing-table, and read his letter again.

A letter which has nothing of the slightest importance in it is not always an easy letter to answer. Betteredge's present effort at correspondence with me came within this category. Old Candy's assistant, otherwise Ezra Jennings, had told his master that he had seen me; and Mr. Candy, in turn, wanted to see me and say something to me, when I was next in the neighborhood of Frizinghall. What was to be said in answer to that, which would be worth hearing, it was written on? I sat idly drawing likenesses from memory on it. Candy's remarkable-looking assistant, on the sheet of paper which I had vowed to dedicate to Betteredge—until it suddenly occurred to me that here was the irrepressible Ezra Jennings getting in my way again! I threw a dozen portraits, at least, of the man with the pinched hair (the hair is never case remarkably like) into the waste-paper basket—and then and there wrote my answer to Betteredge. It was a perfect commonplace letter—but it had one excellent effect on me. The effort of writing a few sentences, in plain English, completely cleared my mind of the chaotic nonsense which had filled it since the previous day.

Devoting myself once more to the elucidation of the impenetrable puzzle which my own position presented me, I now tried to meet the difficulty by investigating it from a plainly practical point of view. The events of the memorable night being still unintelligible to me, I looked a little farther back, and searched my memory of the earlier hours of the birthday for any incident which might prove of some assistance to me in finding the clew.

Had any thing happened while Rachel and I were finishing the painted door? or, later, when I rode over to Frizinghall? or afterward, when I went back with Godfrey Aldewhite and his sisters? or, later again, when I put the Moonstone into Rachel's hands? or, later still, when the company came, and we all assembled round the dinner-table? My memory disposed of that string of questions readily enough until I came to the last. Looking back at the social events of the intervening dinner I found myself brought to a stand-still at the outset of the inquiry. I was not even capable of accurately remembering the number of the guests who had sat at the dinner-table with me.

To feel myself completely at fault here, and to be conscious, moreover, that the incidents of the dinner might especially repay the trouble of investigating them, formed parts of the same mental process at the time. I believe other persons in a similar situation, would have reasoned as I did. When the pursuit of our own recollections has become the objects of inquiry to ourselves, we are naturally suspicious of what we don't know. Once in possession of the names of the persons who had been present at the dinner, I resolved—as a means of enriching the deficient resources of my own memory—to appeal to the memories of the rest of the guests; to write down all that they could recollect of the social events of their birthday; and to refer the result, thus obtained, by the light of what had happened afterward when the company had left the house.

This last and newest of my many contemplated experiments in the art of inquiry—which Betteredge was probably born and destined to the clear-headed, or French, side of me being supermost for the moment—may fairly claim record here, on its own merits. Unlikely as it may seem, I had now actually groped my way to the root of the matter at last. All I wanted was a hint to guide me in the right direction at the beginning. Before another day had passed over my head that hint was given me by one of the company who had been present at the birthday feast.

With the plan of proceeding which I now had in view, it was also necessary to possess the complete list of the guests. This I could easily obtain from Gabriel Betteredge. I determined to go back to Yorkshire on that day, and to begin my contemplated investigation the next morning.

It was just too late to start by the train which left London before noon. There was no other train but to wait, nearly three hours, for the departure of the next train. Was there any thing I could do in the interval which might usefully occupy this interval of time?

My thoughts went back again instantly to the birthday dinner.

Though I had forgotten the numbers, and, in many cases, the names of the guests, I remembered readily enough that by far the larger proportion of them came from Frizinghall, or from its neighborhood. But the larger proportion was not all. Some few of us were not regular residents in the county. I myself was one of the few. Mr. Murthwaite was another. Godfrey Aldewhite was a third. Mr. Bruff—no: I called to mind that business had prevented Mr. Bruff from making one of the party. Two or three ladies been present whose usual residence was in London? I could only remember Miss Clack as coming within this latter category. Perhaps there were three of the guests, at any rate, whom it was clearly advisable for me to see before I left town. A note off at once to Mr. Bruff's office; not knowing the addresses of the persons of whom I was in search, and thinking it probable that he might put me in the way of finding them.

Mr. Bruff proved to be too busy to give me more than a minute of his valuable time. In that minute, however, he contrived to dispose—in the most discouraging manner—of all the questions I had to put to him.

In the first place, he considered newly-discovered method of finding a clew to the mystery as sound as it was ingenuously fanciful to be seriously discussed. In the second, third, and fourth places, Mr. Murthwaite was now on his way back to the scene of his past achievements; Miss Clack had suffered losses, and had settled, from motives of economy, in France; Mr. Godfrey Aldewhite and his sisters not be skipping somewhere, where in London. Suppose I inquired at his club? I might suppose! I excused Mr. Bruff if he went back to his business and wished me good-morning?

The field of inquiry in London being now so narrowed as only to include the one necessity of discovering Godfrey's address, I took the lawyer's hint, and went to his club.

In the hall I met with one of the members, who was so old friend of my cousin's, and who was also so ready a dispenser of advice, that the gentleman, after enlightening me on the subject of Godfrey's address, told me of two recent events in his life, which were of some importance in themselves, and which had not previously reached my ears.

It appeared that Godfrey, far from being discouraged by Rachel's withdrawal from her engagement to him, had made matrimonial advances next to the married to another young lady, reputed to be a great heiress. His suit had prospered, and his marriage had been considered as a settled and certain thing. But, here again, the engagement had been suddenly and unexpectedly broken off—owing, it was said, on this occasion, to a serious difference of opinion between the bridegroom and the lady's father on the question of settlements.

As some compensation for this second matrimonial disaster, Godfrey had soon afterward found himself the object of fond pecuniary remembrance, on the part of one of his many admirers. A rich old lady—highly respected at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes-Conversion-Society, and a great friend of Miss Clack's (to whom she had left nothing but a mourning ring)—had bequeathed to the admirable and meritorious Godfrey a legacy of five thousand pounds. After receiving this handsome addition to his own modest pecuniary resources, he had been heard to say that he felt the necessity of getting a little respite from his charitable labors, and that his doctor prescribed "a run on the Continent, by way of a prescription of much future benefit to his health." If I wanted to see him, it would be advisable to lose no time in paying my contemplated visit.

I went, then and there, to pay my visit.

The queer feeling which had made me just one day too late in calling on Sergeant Cuff made me again one day too late in calling on Godfrey. He had left London, on the previous morning, by the tidal train for Dover. He was to cross to Ostend; and his servant believed he was going on to Brussels. Of course, I was disposed to a little uncertain; but I might be sure that he would be away at least three months.

I went back to my lodgings a little depressed in spirits. Three of the guests at the birthday dinner—and those three all exceptionally intelligent persons—were now out of reach, at the very time when it was most important to be able to communicate with them. My last hopes now rested on Betteredge's memory, and on the kindness of the late Lady Verinder whom I might still find living in the neighborhood of Rachel's country house.

On this occasion I travelled straight to Frizinghall—the next day but one after my first arrival in my field of inquiry. I arrived too late in the evening to be able to communicate with Betteredge. The next morning I was in the carriage with a letter, requesting him to join me at the hotel as his earliest convenience.

Having taken this precaution—partly to save time, partly to accommodate Betteredge—of sending my messenger in a fly, I had a reasonable prospect, if no delay occurred, of seeing the old man within less than two hours from the time when I had sent for him. During this interval I arranged in myself in general terms the contemplated inquiry among the guests present at the birthday dinner who were personally known to me, and who were likely to be within reach. These were my relatives, the Ablewhites, and Mr. Candy. The doctor had expressed a special wish to see me, and he lived out in the new street. So to Mr. Candy I went first.

After what Betteredge had told me, I naturally anticipated a considerable change in the doctor's face of the severe illness from which he had suffered. But I was utterly unprepared for the sight that met me when I entered the room.

If I saw in him when he entered the room and shook hands with me. His eyes were dim; his hair had grown completely gray; his face was sunken; his figure had shrunk. I looked at the once lively, rattle-pated, humorous little doctor —associated in my remembrance with the perpetration of incorrigible social indiscretions and innumerable boyish jokes—and I saw nothing left of the old man but the coarse, commonplace, vulgar smartness in his dress. The man was a wreck; but his clothes and his jewelry—in cruel mockery of the change in him—were as gay and as gaudy as ever.

"I have often thought of you, Mr. Blake," he said, "and I am glad to see you once more, though at last. If there is any thing I can do for you, pray command my services, Sir—pray command my services."

He said those few commonplace words with needless hurry and eagerness, and with a curious look to leave them unheard. The voice, which he was perfectly—I might say childishly —incapable of concealing from notice.

With the object in my mind that I then had of course foreseen the necessity of entering into some sort of personal explanation, before I could hope to draw out Mr. Candy's memory for me, in doing their best to assist my inquiry. On the journey to Frizinghall I had arranged what my explanation was to be. I was to mention my opportunity now offered to me of trying the effect of it on Mr. Candy.

"I am in Yorkshire the other day, and I am in Yorkshire again now, on rather a romantic errand," I said. "It is a matter, Mr. Candy, in which the late lady Verinder would still took some interest. You remember the mysterious loss of the Indian Diamond, now nearly a year since? Circumstances have arisen, in connection which lead to the hope that it may yet be found —and I am interesting myself, as one of the family, in recovering it. Under these circumstances, I am sure, there is no occasion to apologize to you for my intrusion. I have only to request you will favor me with your opinion in the hope that I might help him at starting.

"It's a long time since we met," I said. "We last saw each other at the last birthday dinner my poor aunt was ever to give."

"That's it!" cried Mr. Candy. "The birthday dinner!" He started impulsively to his feet, and looked at me. A deep flush suddenly overspread his faded face, and as abruptly sank down again, as if conscious of having betrayed a weakness which he would fain have concealed. It was plain, evidently, that he was aware of his own defect of memory, and that he was bent on hiding it from the observation of his friends.

Thus far I was grateful to my companion only. But the words he had just said, few as they were, roused my curiosity instantly to the highest pitch. The birthday dinner had already become the one event in the past at which I looked back with strangely-mixed feelings of hope and distrust. The answer was the birthday dinner unmistakably proclaiming itself as the subject on which Mr. Candy had something important to say to me?

I attempted to help him out once more. But at this moment the waiter came at the bottom of my compassionate motive, and they hurried me on a little too abruptly to the end that I had in view.

"It's nearly a year now," I said, "since we sat at that pleasant table. Have you made any memorandum—in your diary, or otherwise—of what you were then so kind as to say?"

Mr. Candy understood the suggestion, and showed me that he understood it, as an insult.

"I require no memorandums, Mr. Blake," he said, stiffly enough. "I am not such a very old man yet—and my memory (thank God) is to be thoroughly depended on."

It is needless to say that I declined to understand that angry protestation for me.

"I wish I could say the same of my memory," I answered. "When I try to think of matters that are a little out of the common, my remembrance so vivid as I could wish it to be. Take the dinner at Lady Verinder's, for instance—"

He looked round at me again, the moment the allusion passed my lips.

"Ah! the dinner, the dinner at Lady Verinder's!" he exclaimed, more eagerly than ever. "I have got something to say to you about that."

His eyes looked at me again with the painful expression of being wistful, so vacant, so miserably helpless to see. He was evidently trying hard, and trying in vain, to recover the lost recollections. "I have never pleased about dinner," he burst out suddenly, with an air of saying exactly what he had wanted to say. "A very pleasant dinner, Mr. Blake, wasn't it?" He nodded and smiled, and appeared to think, poor fellow, that he had succeeded in concealing the total failure of his memory by a well-timed exertion of his own presence of mind.

It was so distressing that I at once shifted the ground. Betteredge interested in his recovering the lost remembrance—to topics of local interest.

Here he got on glibly enough. Trumpery lie he scrutched up to the town, some of them as much as a month old, appeared to recur to his memory readily. He chattered on, with something of the old unreserved garrulity of former times. But there were moments, even in the full flow of his talkativeness, when he suddenly hesitated, stopped short for a moment with the vacant inquiry once more in his eyes—controlled himself—and went on again. I submitted patiently to the infliction (it is hardly nothing less than martyrdom, to a man of cosmopolitan sympathies, to shiosh in silent resignation the news of a country town) until the clock on the chimney-piece told me that my visit had been prolonged beyond half an hour. Having my own reasons to remember the sacrifice as complete, I rose to take leave. As we shook hands Mr. Candy reverted to the birthday festival of his own accord.

"I am so glad we have met again," he said; "I had it on my mind—literally on my mind, Mr. Blake—to speak to you. About the dinner at Lady Verinder's, you know? A pleasant dinner—really a pleasant dinner now, wasn't it?"

On repeating the phrase he seemed to feel sensibly a return of having prevented me from suspecting his lapse of memory as he had felt on the first occasion. The wistful look clouded his face again, after apparently succeeding in it. He accompany me to the street door, he suddenly changed his mind, rang the bell for the servant, and returned with me to the drawing-room.

I went slowly down the doctor's stairs, feeling the disheartening conviction that he really had something to say which it was vitally important to me to hear, and that he was morally incapable of saying it. The effort of remembering that he wanted to speak to me was but too evidently the only effort that his enfeebled memory was now able to achieve.

At last I had reached the bottom of the stairs, and had turned a corner on my way to the outer hall, a door opened softly somewhere on the ground-floor of the house, and a gentle voice said behind me—

"I am afraid, Sir, you find Mr. Candy much changed?"

I turned round, and found myself face to face with Ezra Jennings.

THE THEATRE.

HAYDE sat in a low rocker crocheting. The soft Berlin wool wound itself around the small nervous fingers, and seemingly without care or thought from the fair architect the article grew into wonderfully symmetrical proportions. Now in a while, it is true, she held it up for a moment's inspection, and then rattled away again with the little ivory-handled, steel-barbed instrument, with which in some unaccountable manner she seemed to entangle my heart with so much definess and apparent carelessness as the fleecy wool which unwound itself from her white aproned lap. This was a pretty picture—a picture that had often presented itself, and one which would bear the closest and most critical inspection. But some way this morning my sensations were not so productive of satisfaction as they had been on previous occasions, and I accounted for it in this wise: Harriet Hertford, the fair lassie described above, had passed during the winter with my cousin Blanche Perry; old schoolmates these young ladies were; about the same age, Blanche said, and she was twenty-one. I was also a visitor, with considerable privilege. At the close of the Rebellion she rested in health, and entirely dispirited by a severe wound in my left shoulder, and a nervous prostration resulting from protracted military duty, for any kind of business. I accepted the invitation of my uncle to make his house my home until I found myself perfectly well again. My aunt, a most estimable lady, and capital nurse, promoted my comfort in every imaginable way. Blanche, too, was sensible, kind, and unassuming, willing and apparently glad to bring her stock of entertainment (which, by-the-way, was a well-assorted one) for my amusement. But sometimes, I fear, querulous criticism. Hattie, as they all called her, was at first extremely shy of me; but after a little season she fell into the loving magnetism of the family, and many were the little favors I received at her hands. The morning paper she always opened for me, and, when my toast was not exactly the shade of brown she thought suitable for an invalid, she offered to make me some more, and was always the home-made slice; and from thenceforth her fair fingers prepared not only the toast, but many other delicacies which she had learned to make her ever heard of. I used to wonder how she became possessed of so much culinary ability; and one morning when she had placed before me an omelet which, in point of flavor and delectable appearance, I never saw equaled, I ventured to ask her how she came by this wonderful knowledge.

"I eat your breakfast like a good boy, Robert, and I will tell you," she replied. "I longed to. God bless him, was an invalid for many years before he died, and my mother, a very domestic woman, spent a great deal of time in endeavoring to tempt the miserable appetite. I believe (though it is extremely unfashionable to admit it) that I was born with a very strong natural 'penchant' for the details of cookery; and I grew to assisting until I really cultivated my experimental talent to such a degree that I could originate a single French verb I was familiar with every housekeeping detail. I wonder," she concluded, "that all you boys do not like to cook, there is something as artistic to me in the preparation of a beautiful appetizing dish as in the painting of a fine picture. One requires not does not go daubed any more with the former than the latter."

But as I was telling you this morning I was uneasy. Hattie had read every thing of interest in the Times, had assisted me from the breakfast parlor to the library (an unusual favor), and now with her head bent over the most amusing knitting seemed, even while she wrought still more entanglement with her delicate manipulations, to be entirely unconscious of me, so entirely engrossed with some foreign subject as to preclude all thought of me. The evening before Frank Edwards had come down from town down from the city and taken Hattie sleigh-riding. I shall never forget how sweetly she looked in that sled, fleecy robes enough to have smothered her, and bonnet-strings folded with the immaculate white to give the brown eyes a still fonder shade, and form a tasteful frame-work for the exquisitely oval face.

"I am so sorry, Robert, you can not have any fun this winter," she said, coming up to my armchair and smoothing back the hair from my temples. "But the first real fine day I will go out some riding myself;" and she hurried off. I watched her spring into the sleigh, haughtily throw up a good-by kiss, and then—I was depressed than I had ever been in my life, I went to bed. Hattie noticed, the moment her eyes opened on my face the next morning, that I was not looking as well as usual; and I noticed that on the forefinger of her left hand she wore a ring. My conscious solitude was intolerable, and, so far as I was able to judge, there had been no mention made of the affair to the family. "Who but a fool and an invalid would ever have been caught in such a scrape as this?" I whispered to myself. For what purpose had a mysterious Providence thrown me into this singularly friendly companionship? I was puzzled to discover any justice in the arrangements, and the man who had perfectly fitted his thirty pretty fairly on the battle-field; who had faced grape and canister with tolerably good grace, had now succumbed entirely to a little arrow which had entered the soul without pain, but bade fair to produce more excruciating misery than I had ever in my life endured. So I watched the precious stone scintillate and sparkle—watched the little hands weave the intricate and torturing meshes, until it seemed that one more evolution of the glistening needle—one more flash of that engagement diamond, would drive me insane. Fine place for a soldier! But Hattie worked away industriously, and I changed my position.

"Do not attempt to read, Robert," said she, as her quick ear caught the sound of a page turning.

"The doctor, you know, has especially forbidden that. Allow me, and the work was thrown aside, and the dear girl took possession of the magazine, and insisted upon knowing what article I preferred.

"But you are busy with your knitting," I replied. "I dislike very much to interfere with every one's pleasures, as I seem to be constantly doing."

"Nonsense! What do you think I care for this foolish crocheting? Really, I have not given the work a moment's thought; only you set it in so natural for me to be employed; and, after all, what does it amount to? My wish seems to me, Robert, very tame and purposeless to-day."

"To-day, Hattie? Why, that is almost incredible," and I attempted to look very grave, and almost amused. A fellow might as well put a good face on such matters, and then a sort of by-and-by determination possessed me to make her confide in me.

"Why not to-day, Robert?" and her eyes took on a weary look, and the little hands busied themselves over the magazine in a sort of try-to-be-resigned manner, which was new, to say the least.

"I should not be a man, Hattie," I then continued, without giving me time to answer her last question. "Men have an opportunity for grand active life-work." Men can live outside of a given circle—can do something to elevate humanity—something noble, and become distinguished—but the moment a woman attempts to step out of the sort of mannerism that woman becomes unwomanly; and she is only mentioned by the masses in terms of condemnation."

"Just as it should be, Hattie," I replied. "A woman's kingdom is home; that is her own especial province, and there should always become distinguished. What would life be to me now without the loving protecting influence of women? Hattie, if you knew how grateful and refreshing were your kind ministrations, you would never sigh for a broader field."

The pink or the cheek deepened a little as she caught my earnest expression, and she replied,

"But you are ill now, Robert, and overrate our endeavors. Your comfort—that we were able to fill other positions with credit besides those of nurses and housekeepers?"

"And wives and mothers," I added, quietly. "I think not with distinction."

"Well, perhaps not," she answered. "And one might as well be content with the sphere assigned one; and, after all, this vague longing after something unattainable is ridiculous, and I will not spend another morning so foolishly."

I had almost forgotten the sleigh-ride—and new subjects of interest had our conversation become; and when a few moments after Hattie came in, and in her impulsive manner declared a storm was coming, and opened the piano and commenced, "The day is cold, and dark, and dreary," I felt that my day was indeed a cloudy one. An invalid—almost a prisoner—in love with a woman who had plighted her troth to another—my keenness and weakness so bereft me of all manliness? "Now, Ike," said I to myself, after retiring, "you and I must come to an understanding," and we did. I promised my own soul that I would persistently manifest every feeling of gratitude, and play my part as well as I could until able once more to mingle with the outside world. Day after day came, and some way I did not improve. Frank came down once or twice a week, but I never saw him with Hattie on account of being compelled to retire early. Once my aunt said to me:

"Robert, I think Frank is very fond of Harriet, and I am glad to know it; for I can think of no one I could take to my heart as a daughter so easily." So she was not aware of the engagement. I wondered that Frank could keep the pleasant news to himself, for he was a very demonstrative young man, and extremely fond of his mother.

"Now, Robert, do you remember that I promised to take you out riding the very first suitable day? The air is as balmy as May, and we will have a fine drive," said Hattie one morning after my late breakfast. The sun seemed in an unusually genial mood, and poured his warm, revivifying beams into the bay-windowed library, lighting up old volumes, playing hide-and-go-seek with lace and damask drapery, painting the bouquets of roses so lavishly sprinkled under our feet, and dispelling for a while the miserable discontent which had taken such firm possession of my soul. So, in innumerable wrappings—looking more like an Egyptian mummy than a soldier of the Army of the Potomac—I took my place in the carriage. Hattie handled the ribbons with a professional air that set me wondering again—as much at home driving as making tea.

"Now, Robert, isn't this lovely? Do you not feel ever so much stronger? You will gain very rapidly when the weather allows you to ride every day;" and so Hattie rattled on, tucking in the robe now and then, embarrassing me by her womanly manner to make me entirely comfortable.

"But you seem abstracted, Robert. Not blue, I hope, this beautiful day?"

"No, Hattie, not blue, but though—ah," unaccountably impelled to utter the feeling of my soul.

"Life is very pleasant, but I have been so long a drone in the great hive that I feel I ought to be very willing to give it up, instead of holding on to it so tenaciously."

"Give it up, Robert? What do you mean?" and the little hands closed spasmodically over the reins, bringing the well-trained animal to a full stop.

"Only this, Hattie. I am certainly not improving; and the chances are decidedly against me. I could look my position full in the face like a man; but—"

"Oh, Robert!" said she, interrupting me, her manful eyes swimming with—tears! "Please do not say any more on that dreadful subject. You shall get well; I am sure of it, dear."

"The only incentive I have to recovery is another," I continued. "But some way that fails to arouse my will-power. Sometimes I think if I had taken one who loved me fondly—whose life was so bound up in mine that existence without me would be unendurable—I might rally; but to see nothing worth living for makes my case hopeless."

My companion was now weeping bitterly.

"I had no idea my misery would pain you thus, Hattie. You are a kind-hearted, loving Christian woman, and Frank has won a prize in the great lottery of life. I have never complained either of you, because you have kept the affair so private."

"What do you mean, Robert? Congratulated? You speak in riddles;" and the big tears now looked beseechingly into mine.

"Are you not engaged to Frank Percy, Hattie Hertford?"

"No, Sir!" without removing her eyes from mine. "What ever put such an idea into your head?"

"But that diamond ring, my dear child?"

"Is one my father gave me long ago. Did you think it the symbol of my betrothal?"

My excitement can be better imagined than described. I tried to check my joy, but it came out of exposing my feelings. I tried to remember that I was a cripple, an invalid, with only a slight hold upon life; but love's impulsiveness was uncontrollable, and when Hattie added, "I was never engaged—never cared in my life told a man I loved myself, I could not help saying, "Hattie—"

"Neither have I ever whispered love to mortal woman! Robert, I will tell you that I love you. Would you could reciprocate it!"

"Indeed I do! Robert, will you live for me?" was my choked reply. And here I am to-day, hale and hearty.

THE HADJIS OF CENTRAL ASIA.

THE great success of Vámbéry's remarkable book on the East (Travels in Central Asia. Being a Journey from Teheran across Turkoman across the Turkoman Desert, on the Eastern Shore of the Caspian, to Khiva, Bokhara, and Samarcand, performed in the Year 1863. By Arminius Vambery, Member of the Hungarian Academy of Pesth, by whom he was sent on this Scientific Mission. Harper & Brothers, New York.) has induced the author to publish a second volume, entitled "Sketches in Central Asia," in which he gives many interesting facts which did not come within the scope of his narrative of travel. He gives, among other chapters, an account of the "Dervishes and Hadjis" of Central Asia, from which we select the following in relation to the latter sect.

The Hadjis are a class of hypocrites who, under the pretense of carrying out sacred vows, indulge in their natural vices. Every one who after their return assume authority and a good deal position, under this title which means literally "Pilgrim." Khanikoff, in Kuna, "Wander to my house if circumstances permit." These "circumstances" are reduced to the following seven conditions by the commissioner: 1st, The pilgrimage must be undertaken, 1st, With sufficient money for traveling expenses; 2d, In bodily health; 3d, In an unmarried state; 4th, Without having debts behind; 5th, In times of peace; 6th, Overland and without danger; and, 7th, By persons who have reached the age of puberty. That our good Tartars ill-observe these conditions will be evident to all who have some idea about the countries situated between Kazan and Yarartes. In Persia people go to Kerbela, Meshed or Mekka, only when sufficient funds enable them to do it comfortably. In Central Asia, on the contrary, it is always the poorest class who undertakes pilgrimages. A certain taste for adventure, coupled with religious fanaticism are the true motives which prompt the inhabitants of Central Asia to start from the remote East for the tomb of their Prophet. True, they do not suffer any material losses, for a beggar's bag is a money-bag, but they frequently lose what is most precious to them—their life; as every year at least one-third of the pilgrims from Turkestan die from exposure to the climate.

The travelers form themselves in larger or smaller companies, and elect a chief from among themselves, who also fills among them the office of Imam (the person who first says the prayers to be repeated by the rest), and who enjoys a considerable respect over his companions. A visit to the Kaaba and the tomb of the Prophet (which may be paid at any season) is not so much the ultimate object of the whole pilgrimage as the ascent of Mount Arafat. This can be made only once a year, viz., on the Kurban festival (the 10th of Hajiag), which is nothing more or less than the sacrifice of Abraham and Isaac dramatized. All those who have taken part in this festival and have joined in the cry "Lebeik Allah!" "Command, O God" (in allusion to Abraham's implicit obedience), are regarded as genuine Hadjis. This cry of "Lebeik! Lebeik!" uttered at the most solemn moment of the whole pilgrimage, seems also to have the deepest impression upon the pilgrim himself.

However painful and heart-rending separation from home may be when so long and dangerous a journey has to be undertaken, the joy which the Hadjis experience on their return fully counterbalances it. Friends and relations, informed of their near arrival, go out to meet them several days in advance. Hymns are sung, and tears of joy are shed when the Hadji makes his entry into his native place. Every one wants to embrace him, to kiss the fold of a "Hadji" is a patent of nobility, which, during his lifetime, he parades on his seal, after death on his tombstone.

The Hadjis, of course such as are not mere beggars, often transact, during their pious pilgrimages, a little commercial business. "Commerce and pilgrimages together" are not allowed by their religion; but nobody seems to suffer any pricks of conscience in taking to his coreligionist in Arabia a few articles from distant Turkomania. The products of Bokhara and other holy places of Central Asia are in high esteem among the people of Arabia; besides, every one wishes to show a Hadji some favor, and is easily induced to buy double the value of any article offered. This small trade is carried on between the easternmost point of Islamitic Asia to the Galata bridge of Constantinople. Among the crowd of that famous capital one often sees a Tartar, whose features contrast as strangely with the rest of the Mohammedan population as the thin silk kerchief differ from those of our European manufactures. Fine ladies seldom become purchasers of such articles, but the poorer ones frequently seem, inspired by feelings of piety, paying a good price for them, pressing them repeatedly to their faces and fondly murmuring or repeating a load of "Allahum u Selik," and continuing their walk.

Thus the successful sale of the exported articles leads to the introduction of similar merchandise needs no confirmation. No Hadji leaves the holy places without making some purchases. At Mekka he finds in a stock of scents, dates, rosaries, and combs, but especially water from the well well called Zemzem. (Zemzem is the name of a famous well on the road, of miraculous power, the water of which is exported in small vessels to all Islamite countries, as a single drop of it taken just at the moment of death frees from 500 years of purgatory. The origin of the well is ascribed to Ismail, who, after being left behind by Hagar, stamped his little foot and made the well spring up.) In Jamba and Djedda are bought Indian goods; these go by the name of Mali Istambul—"Stamboul Goods;" as the unbelieving Franks must not obtain credit for any thing, and they consist of penknives, scissors, needles, thimbles, etc., which are highly prized to enjoy the reputation of supplying the best mixwa, a fibrous material used for brushes by all pious Moslems. In Bagdad are bought a birka, made of camel's-hair, and of superior quality at this place, as it is the kind of garment which the Prophet is said to have worn next his skin. Finally, in Persia, ink, powder, and pens made of canes are purchased. Central Asia all these articles are great curiosities, and they are paid for handsomely, partly from necessity, partly from religious motives.

Generally speaking, a caravan of Hadjis are the best traveling companions one can have in Central Asia. Robbery is the whole of the East, provided one can manage to agree with them. Nobody is more clever than a Hadji in negotiating, be the people he has to deal with believers or unbelievers, nomads or agricultural tribes. A Hadji may be converted into any thing, he being thoroughly penetrated by the principle, "When in Rome do as Romans do." Instead of being cast down and gloomy, as his ragged exterior would lead one to suppose, he is of a merry disposition, and during the long marches the greatest fun and mimicry-worker occasionally indulges in a profane joke.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A young man and woman stopped at a certain hotel to pass a day or two. Their awkward appearance attracted the attention of one of the family, who commenced a conversation with the female by inquiring if she had traveled that day. "I traveled?" repeated the stranger somewhat indignantly, "would I walk, if I could ride?"

"How long did Adam remain in Paradise before he sinned?" asked an admirable cara xposa of her son-in-law. "Until he got a wife," answered the husband, calmly.

"My dear," said an anxious matron to her daughter, "you are very improper, allowing people to be throwing kisses at each other." "Why so, mamma? I'm sure they don't hurt, even if they do not."

KISSING CASUISTRY.

When Sarah Jane, the moral Miss,
Declares 'tis very wrong to kiss,
I'll bet a shilling I see through it;
The damsel, fairly understood,
Feels just as any Christian should—
She'd rather enjoy kissing than do it!

A lawyer on his death-bed willed all his property to a lunatic asylum, stating as his reason for so doing that he wished to give back to society, to the liberal class of people that had patronized him.

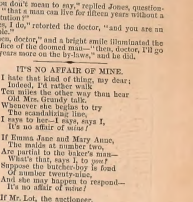
"Have I not offered you every advantage?" said a doting father to his son. "Oh yes!" replied the youth; "but I could not think of taking sustenance of my father."

A young man, who recently fell in love with a very beautiful young lady, says that when he accompanied her evening that she reciprocated his passion, he felt as though he was sitting on the roof of a meeting-house and every shingle was a Jews-harp.

MOSES IN THE BULRUSHES, AND CHASE IN FOR A PARTY.

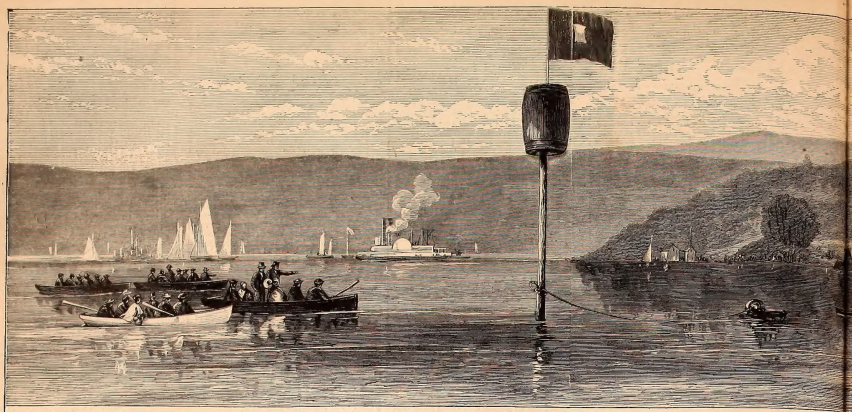
IT'S NO AFFAIR OF MINE.

I hate that kind of thing, my dear;
Indeed, I'm rather walk
You miles the other way than hear
Old Mrs. Grundy talk;
Whenever she begins to try
The scandalizing line,
I says to her—I says, says I,
It's no affair of mine!



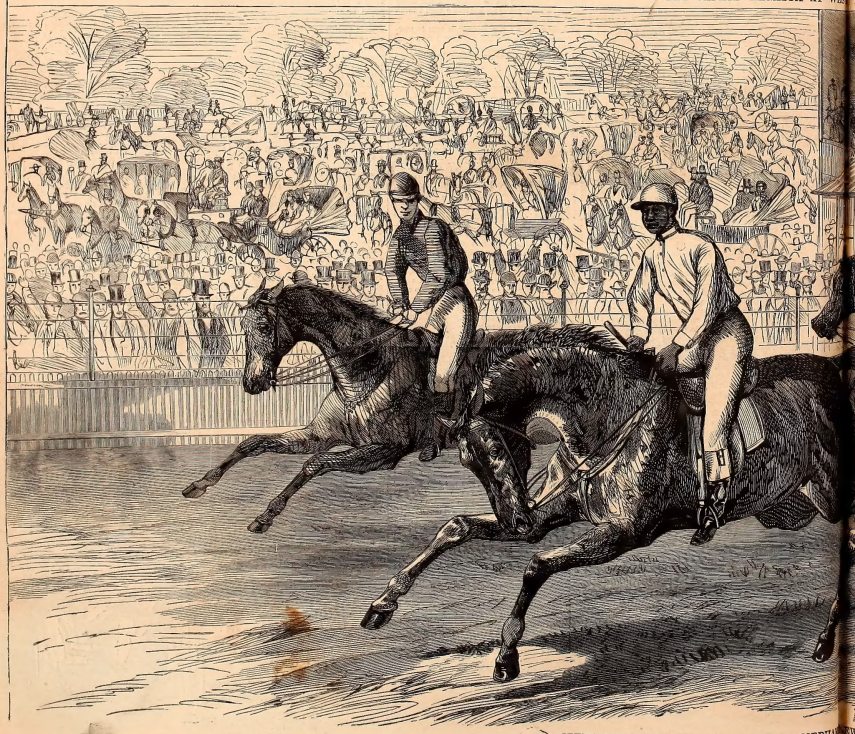
If Emma Jane and Mary Anne,
The maids at number four,
Are partial to the baker's man—
I won't tell, says I, to your
Suppose the butcher-boy is fond
Of amateur tenor-ing,
And she may happen to respond—
It's no affair of mine!

If Mr. Lot, the auctioneer,
Has got a shrewish wife,
It's not for us, I says, my dear,
To pry at married life;
If Captain G. comes back at night
A deal the worse for wine,
And kicks the children left and right—
It's no affair of mine!



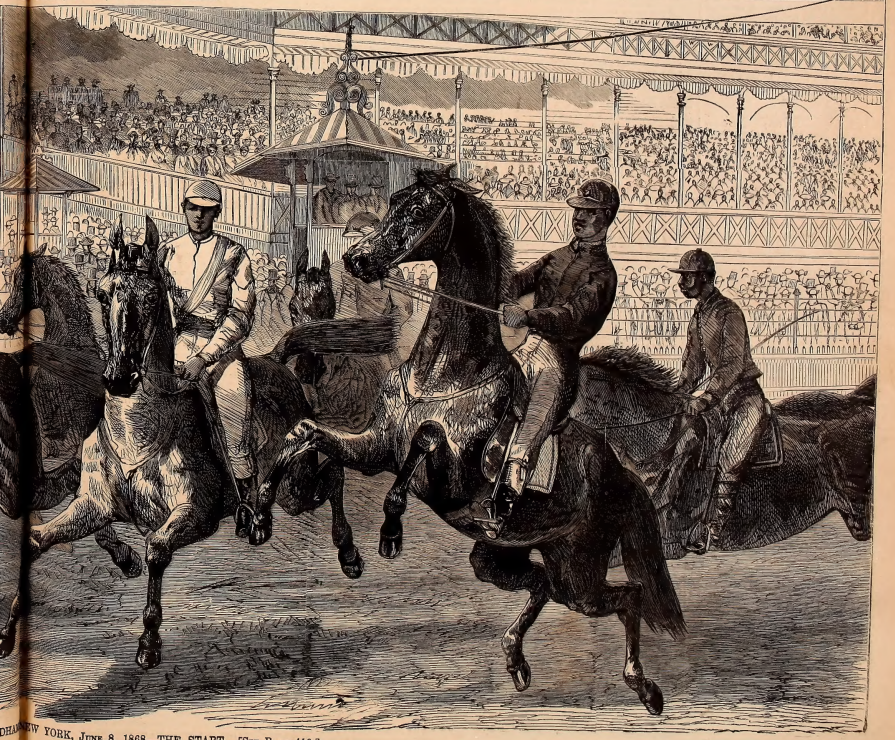
I'm sick of Mrs. Grundy's ways,
And Mrs. Grundy too;
No doubt she goes about and says
Queer things of me and you.
She's always dropping in to see
Or looking in to dine—
And yet the brute—but then, you see,
It's no affair of mine!

MALTHUS.—To plunge a young lady six fathoms deep in happiness give her two canary-birds, half a dozen mockingbirds, fifteen yards of silk, an ice-cream, several rose-buds, a specimen of the hand, and a promise of a new bonnet. If she won't melt it will be because she can't.



A lady who had read of the extensive manufacture of odometers to tell how far a carriage had been run, said she wished some contrivance could be invented in her instrument to tell how far husbands had been in the evening when they put step down to the Post-office.

TUB RACE AT WEST POINT.



THE CADETS' REGATTA AT WES POINT.

OPENING RACE AT THE JEROME PARK, FORDHA NEW YOR

T WEST POINT, JUNE 8, 1868—THE START.

NEW YORK, JUNE 8, 1868—THE START.—[SEE PAGE 410.]

OUT OF DOOR SPORTING SEASON.

THE sporting season for 1868 has certainly opened briskly, as the commercial men say, and an exciting time is anticipated alike by the lovers of the national game, the frequenters of the turf, and the yachtsmen. Two of the "crack" base-ball clubs of the country are now on tours to the various cities, and are daily engaging in games with the various clubs of the country. The spring meeting at Jerome Park, New York; Woodlawn, Kentucky; Paterson, New Jersey, etc., have taken place, and have passed off with more than usual success, and the yacht and boat-races are almost every river of the country; the regattas of the West Point and New York Yacht Clubs have taken place; another yacht race is contemplated between the Red Wilkie and Blue Jacket, and a boat of the size of the John F. Ford, which we had last year; while the Little Western, still smaller, is shortly to leave Chicago for a trip, a la Rob Roy, through the Lakes and the St. Lawrence to the ocean, and thence across it to England.

For illustrations this week are of the regatta at West Point, and the races at Jerome Park.

THE WEST POINT REGATTA.

The race of this year, which we illustrate on pages 408 and 409, is the first ever instituted by the West Point boats. It took place on June 8, and, all circumstances considered—newness of crews, training, etc.—it was a triumph. Two persons, a floral arch erected with the canvas awning of a pontoon frame, made a capital judges' stand, and here General Ruger, Colonel Delafield, and other cadets stationed them-selves to act as judges. A similar station was arranged a hundred yards south for the accommodation of the boats and duties immediately interested in the race. All the boats started together, and in a few strokes the second boat drew off and got half a length ahead of the first class; but this distance was soon made up by the first class boat, which kept the lead to the end, and came in in 11 minutes and 46 seconds—28 seconds ahead of the third class boat, and 16 seconds ahead of the second class boat—amidst the cheers and hearty cheering on the part of the spectators. The champion flag—a beautiful blue silk one—was then presented to the crew of the first class boat by General Webb in a neat speech.

THE TUB RACE.

The regatta was followed by the tub race, which was contested on pages 407. Ten cadets, loosely clad, were placed in as many tubs. At the word a start was made, and away paddled the tub crew. Only three of the contestants reached the end of the prescribed 100 yards, the others capsizing in the most grotesque attitudes, much to the merriment of the spectators. The frantic efforts made by some of them to get into the tubs after they had been upset made the hills reverberate with peals of laughter, and the unlucky ones had to get to shore the best way they could. The victor proved to be a young cadet named Mc. Lean, who was congratulated by his cadetship from Mississippi by General Grant, under the following circumstances: On the 21st of May, 1863, General Grant's army were put into position in front of the rebel works at Vicksburg. While General Joseph A. Logan's skirmishers were fighting for the ground position known as Fort Hill, a young lad who lived in a house near by asked permission to join them. He soon secured the musket of a dead soldier, and went at it, keeping away as busily as the oldest campaigner. He was slightly wounded, but continued to battle away, and each day of the siege had to be led round on the skirmish line. Two years since, by recommendation of General Logan, and for this action, he received his appointment to West Point.

JEROME PARK RACES.

Our large illustration on pages 408 and 409 is of the first race of the season at Jerome Park, on June 16. Over 15,000 people witnessed four races, all of which were very exciting to the large crowd in attendance. Some of the finest racing stock in the country was entered on this the course this season, and the success of the Association has been of the most brilliant character.

HOME FROM THE RACES.

There is a very great moral in the vigorous denunciation of the strongly-colored pattern of ve we give under this title on page 413 of this issue; and one so plain that "he who runs may read." It is very timely at this present period of excesses in gaming of all kinds.

We have said gaming, but, of course, that was not the proper word to use; it is the new mania by o-victe, or at least never mentioned to ears polite. Gambling, we are happy to say, has been put de——able—blotted out—abolished; nowadays we speculate. There is not at this time a single "gambling hell" in New York city; they are all "club houses." All the lotteries throughout the country have been "restrained" by legal "injunctions," and only "gift enterprises" are tolerated. There are no "thimble-riggers" nowadays—save in politics; no "players," only mechanics; no "dealers," only "brokers;" the "faro table" is changed to the "Gold board," and it is not "chips" but "stocks" with which they play. And then, above all, the game is no longer stake Love and Life and Dignity and Honor—it is only Conscience which is staked and sacrificed with their money.

The picture really requires no legend. The characters are few. Youth reclines on the back seat of the carriage, with Craft at his side pacing his pocket; in front is Youth again, with the Wanton at his side; Mephistopheles mounts the box, and Death is the tiger! And in the back-ground a sign-board points to Home! It reads: "Off To Hell!"

ONE YEAR AGO.

See Illustration on page 412.

Last year, under the chestnut-trees,
Under the chestnuts white;
Two of us walked, two of us talked,
Would it were so to-night!

Two were the voices, tremulous, sweet,
Two were the heads, bent low;
Two were the hands, together clasped,
One, white as the flower-snow.

One year! But a year, what is told,
Two lives, one day by day!
Yet my footsteps flag, and my youth seems old,
And my heart feels heavy and cold.

Two were the hearts that together beat,
Two were the hearts, yet one;
Two were the lives that, interlaced,
Strolled, 'neath those trees, in the sun.

Those trees, those leaf-lades, bloom-strewing trees,
That glimmer and glisten so;
Now they strike the golden chords of my soul,
Sound sweet in the autumn blow.

Ah, leaves! ye fall, and grow green again,
Nor mourn for the spring-time fled;
Ah, trees! ye bloom, in your summer glow,
But the life of my life is—dead!

THE KING'S TEMPLE.

See Illustration on page 412.

A mighty king on his couch reclined,
With a haughty thought in his mind:
"Has not this world reserved me more than all?
A nation would rise at my single call,
And its latest and worst will I command or wear
A crown by the side of my crowned gray hair:—
For truly I am a home for my greatness' sake,
And nobody's aid will I claim or take.
From the gilded ceiling to the marble crypt stone,
It shall be my offering and mine alone."

Then the site was chosen, the builders brought
To find a shape for the monarch's thought;
Now the cubic form, now the pyramid pile sky;
And they built it broad, and they built it high;
But if any offered their skill to aid him,
To give his labor for naught to God,
Then the poor man's mite to the temple was spurned,
And he paid him for every stone he turned.

Till at last, on a gorgeous autumn day,
All the solemn priests in their white array,
With prayer and solemn ceremonial rite,
And opened the abbey in God's great name.

Now there lay in the chancel a great white stone,
With the mark of the builder on its bone;
And the king stood near it with haughty brow,
And pondered, "The future will know me now,
By the strength and the temple I have made,
Unrolled by any plebeian aid."

And far away, where the melody came,
But softly, there stood a poor cripple—dame:
Her garment was worn, and her hair was thin,
And her cheek was pale with the toil for kin.
Who had none to love, who had none to blame,
Who would start at the sound of her Christian name.
Yet she said as the hassle of the king was spread,
"Thank God, that His house is complete at last!"

The monarch, that night, on his couch reclined,
With a proud smile on his face resigned;
But when he slept, then he strangely dreamed:
In his abbey chancel alone he seemed,
And he seemed his own name by record to read,
But lo! another was there instead.
One name was there that he never heard,
And his heart with wonder and wrath was stirred.

And when he awoke, throughout his land
By mouth of his heralds he made command
That a woman, bearing a certain name,
Within a month to his presence came,
Bringing, have a right to the reward riven,
Besides the honor of seeing him.

On the second day, as he sat aloud,
The courtyard was filled with the throng
Informed him the woman was at the gate:
And they thought, of course, he would have to wait
(For even to all the royal kin)
For the kingly pleasure to let her in.
But the monarch, all fain for the sight, cried "Begone!
And straightway bring her, and leave us alone."
So a great hall-door, that had never had aware
That the king awaited her at the door!

Then slowly and trembling, in there came,
In her poor best weeds, a poor old dame,
And the king's head (there was none to stare)
Kindly led her up to a velvet chair
And when she grew used to the splendid place,
And found she could gaze on a royal face,
He begged it, he asked, what a gift he known
Why he deemed her name on the chancel stone.
For what work were worthy the name therein said:
"I've built all the abbey, and asked no aid."

And the old dame lifted her stemming eyes,
And held up her hands in her great surprise:
"My Lord," she answered, "how could I do
At a great good work that was meet for you?
I am poor indeed, and I'm old and weak,
I could not have given, for I have naught;
But I've begged for alms, and I've prayed in His plan.
There's something to do that any one can.
So when the builders were ready to sink,
Each morning I came, and gave them to drink."

The king said nothing.

Ere morning shone,
His name was gone from the chancel stone:
And with looks of wonder the courtiers read
The name of the woman writ there instead.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Not long ago we heard one of the elder inhabitants —we would not by any means venture to call him the "oldest"—of the city, which he could well remember, when a guide-board stood near the spot where the Fifth Avenue Hotel is now located, on which were the significant finger pointing southerly and the words, "One mile to New York." Such a time seems fabulous as to-day we thread our way through crowded streets from the Battery to Central Park. Further and further up town the tide surges. Business and pleasure, public and private life, go hand in hand. Theatres and churches, stores and offices, hotels and palatial dwelling-houses, rise literally one above another in the direction of the Park, which at no very distant time will doubtless be the great fashionable centre of the city.

The rapid rise of the public northward is noticeably shown in the increasing demand for first-class up-town hotels. Our really good hotels have no local custom, and during the busy season applicants often turned away from want of accommodations. Proprietors are ambitious to sustain the reputation of first-class houses, and several prominent ones—the Astor House, the St. Nicholas, the Fifth Avenue, and others—have recently been renovated, and improvements added. The same is now the case with the southerly situated first-class establishment in the city; but no one would venture to open another in its immediate vicinity. Old keepers have been driven from the most crowded business haunts; first above Canal Street, then above Grand Square. The junction of Fifth Avenue and Broadway is a favorite locality for the latter, and the journey still higher up town. At the corner of Thirty-fifth Street and Broadway a large hotel is now erected. We understand that it is to be constructed of white marble, and six stories in height. Still further up, at the corner of Forty-second Street and Broadway, the St. Cloud Hotel has been recently opened; and this, which is a first-class establishment, is doing a very large business at present.

It is, by-the-way, a real pleasure to go through the St. Cloud Hotel, as we did recently, and note the comfort and elegance of its internal appointments. It contains one hundred and fifty suites of rooms, large, light, and well ventilated. The furniture is black walnut—substantial and handsome: the carpets are rich and tasteful: hot and cold water is supplied in every room; and all the details of furnishing are in the most approved modern style. The hotel is conducted on the European plan, and the culinary department is in charge of a lady whose experience and skill are plainly indicated by results. The dining saloon has a capacity for seating three hundred guests at one time; is light, airy, and neat in minute details. The unusually large and pleasant aspect of the St. Cloud, its ample and luxurious larder, and its location—so near the Central Park, and yet easily accessible from business quarters—are points and etcetera—will undoubtedly render this a popular establishment.

A summer resort for those who sup with obstinate customers appears to have been adopted by a restaurant in San Francisco. The proprietors, finding that occasionally a man would come in, eat his dinner and then slipped off without paying for it, have laid down the rule, and posted a notice to that effect in the bill before eating. The plan does not seem to be palatable. Recently a man ordered a dinner, and when the bill of fare was brought it and then held out his palm. "What for?" inquired the stranger. "Pay, Sir?" "What! before I eat it? not I, by a long shot." "No, Sir! we never pay before you eat!" "Well, that I never do; when I get through eating, I will pay and not before." "That won't answer; I want pay now!" exclaims the waiter. "Well, I don't want to eat it at all to pay, let's see you," he replied, holding on to the plate and commencing to eat. At this the waiter whips out of his pocket a knife, cuts off the pants-button from the soup, and empties the dish before the astonished man can fully recover from his amazement at the strange proceeding.

Reports of the marriage festivities of Prince Hubert and Princess Alice continue to arrive. Some of the royal personages must be getting weary of such never-ending wedding rejoicings. A little paper, it is humorously said that the Court functionaries and masters of ceremonies have all their "last pegs." An unfortunate gentleman among them having in one day written sixty-seven notes, changed his dress nine times, been in eleven carriages, and received a stroke of the sun, was declared entitled to repose, and was permitted to go to bed midnight on condition that he should come on duty again not later than seven in the morning. But he was found in his dressing-gown, and that they are dragging the Arno for his body.

An article of interest recently appeared in the Paris Figaro in regard to the New York Press. The writer remarks:

"At the moment that a new réphora is being inaugurated for the Opera House, it may be interesting to have some details of the New York newspapers. It is not an indication of luxury in the American press to be superiors in respect of publicity, and that they enjoy it to this middle of liberty?"

After giving some details in regard to the great skill, ingenuity, have a pity of the known in the issuing of our most prominent daily newspapers, illustrated journals are then considered:

"With the exception of Harper's Weekly the illustrated papers are of little value, and are not much considered. Their coarse and somewhat licentious engravings, and their bad morals (not as appearance of nakedness, however modest, would create at school."

In this connection, we may be pardoned if we quote from a kindly notice of Harper's Periodicals given by the Nation. Speaking of the contents of the Easy Magazine, it says: "It is reading so good and so characteristic that, in spite of this its immense circulation, is a thing to rejoice over. It may almost be doubted if there is any other work in the English vocals, and we do not exclude the pervading Times, the Messrs. Harper have not been the most potent of late civilizers of the English people. Their influence must be, humanly speaking, incalculably great, and that it is, on the whole, a good influence, would not be denied even by the defunct Alabama Legislature."

New York is famous for the number of her ship-yards and the enormous size of her vessels. In no other city of the United States have so many large steamships been built, and in no other city is the business of that kind. Among the ship-yards where magnificent specimens of naval architecture have been produced is that of Messrs. Steers & Stack, on the East River, at Williamsburg. Their establishment is noticeable, more than a hundred and thirty vessels having been constructed by them within the past twenty years, at least twenty-eight of which have been large steamships. The vessel now building at the Dunderberg, built at this yard for the United States Government, is the largest vessel of the kind which has yet been constructed, being 318 feet long, 66 feet wide, and 22 feet deep. At the Westervelt ship-yard over a hundred and eighty vessels have been constructed. The proprietors of this yard have carried on an active business for many years. Greenpoint, Long Island, some of the largest and finest steamers have been constructed, although the proprietor of Steers's ship-yard is one of the youngest of American ship-builders. One of the two steamers ordered by the Pacific Steamship Line, to run between San Francisco and China, we are modelled here; its consort is being constructed by Mr. Webb. These are the largest of the wooden steamships built in this country. Many of the magnificent Sound and river steamers have been built at the yard of Messrs. Englis & Son, at the foot of Tenth Street, East River. The St. John, the Dan Richmond, the Newport, and Old Colony are well known as elegant specimens; and others of equal excellence are being constructed.

If one has a leisure hour which he is at a loss to know what to do with, he will find it an amusing occupation to read the advertisements in a daily newspaper. As every body advertises nowadays, it is something of an undertaking to peruse all those long columns, but an occasional examination of them is worth while. In general these advertisements are well expressed; but occasionally you are surprised at a specimen of bad style who wants "to find a gentleman for breakfast and tea;" at the benevolence of the boarding-house keeper who advertises that "Single gentlemen are furnished with pleasant rooms, also one or two gentlemen with wives;" and wonder at the boldness of the merchant who, in this free country, openly gives notice, "Wanted—A woman to sell an onion." Perhaps, if you query about the expediency of attending a concert of which it is said, "During the evening a variety of pieces will be expected, too tedious to mention." You marvel at the new specimen of humanity referred to in an advertisement of "A boy, 16 years old, wishes a gentleman made of calf-skin;" and laugh at the entreaty that "the green bonnet and veil and beautiful cat will address the subscriber to-day on the left." And so on through the columns, you will constantly find something to excite your risibilities.

A short time ago, on a single Saturday, six persons committed suicide in Paris. Perhaps a far greater number actually murdered themselves, but only six accomplished their purpose by violent means. A young man, aged 21, in the Rue Poissonière, suffocated himself by burning a large quantity of paper in his room, from grief at the loss of his situation. A tailor, for years out of work, who had three children, was found dead in a room of the Rue Campagne-Premiere, with four charcoal pans which he had lighted in his stomach; he had taken the precaution to gag his mouth with a handkerchief to prevent himself from calling for aid. A laborer, aged 50, in the Rue du Poteau; and a carriage-painter, aged 49, in the Boulevard de la Gare, hanged themselves. A stranger, about 50, was found suspended to a beam in a house in course of construction in the Rue de Vaugirard. And, lastly, a young woman, in the Rue des Rats, after burning all her papers, took a dose of laudanum, and then hanged herself from her bed-rail. In addition to the above cases, a young man aged 27, attended a policeman on the Pont Neuf, and said that he had taken poison; almost at the same moment he fell down on the pavement in a fit, and was quickly afterwards. He was removed in an alarming state to a hospital, where a portion of a pint of arsenic was found in his pocket. Only a few days ago one of the city evening papers published a column of suicides—in one number. This is a terrible record in the New York city, nor in a single day, but in different sections of the country, within a few days. And the record was both sad and fearful.

While a family in Taunton was moving into a house, a girl carrying a coffee-pot full of gunpowder saw an open fire before her to the fires. The unavoidable presence of mind she promptly set the coffee-pot on the stove and saved the situation. The coffee-pot so promptly exploded, burning the child, shattering the windows, and knocking the furniture about promiscuously.

A curious typographical blunder recently appeared in an English paper. In a report of a meeting at which addresses delivered by Mr. John Stuart Mill before the University of St. Andrews had since been republished in book form, in place of a five-shilling elephant," The word pamphlet will make the sense more intelligible.

In Utah, as in many western portions of the country, the grasshoppers have become a formidable plague. Great efforts have been made to destroy them, and several hundred bushels are reported slaughtered in Utah.

A spiritualist has predicted that the millennium will come within two years, and that before that time men will have to work but two hours a day, and that there will be no more forts in service.

A San Francisco paper announces that one thousand unmarried women are wanted in Colorado.

LOVELY, YET UNLOVED.

In Hungary there exists no necessary limit to the ambition of a Roman Catholic priest until he shall have reached the highest grade in the hierarchy of his country. In other parts of the Austrian empire nobility and patronage have still great weight in the nomination of high ecclesiastical dignitaries; but in Hungary the talented and distinguished son of the humblest peasant may one day become the chief magnate of the kingdom. The natural consequence of such a possibility is, that no clergyman hides his light beneath a bushel, but, considering the title of the brilliant future he may realize, and he is rarely overlooked by those who have the coveted promotion in their gift. The result is therefore scarcely prepared to find a very distinguished and learned clergyman in a far-off little country parish, and landed gentleman who spends the winter in the magnificent city of Pesth. The natural consequence of such a state of things is that the parish priest, while interesting and yet somewhat stony countenance, whom I see now with my mind's eye, as I have often seen him in the body long ago, is a person of this stamp? No! Pater Andreas had none of the above-mentioned qualities. A worthy man he was for the fullest meaning of the word, a blessing to his flock, and would have been still more so but for the continual sadness, the unalterable silent melancholy on his countenance, and the monotonous and somewhat unearthly tone of his deep voice.

The first time that I saw him was on the occasion of an ecclesiastical festivity in his parish, and in the presence of other priests of this land of the ever-recurring cathedral at their head. Pater Andreas was treated by his superior, and by all the confraternity, with the greatest distinction; which he owned, as I afterward heard, not only to the general excellence of his character, but also to his great wealth, having inherited many beither and richer benefices than that he held. "Alas!" as his patron said to me with colossal grimness, "I alike for him and for me."

I could not understand why my friend had presented the living to a priest whose disposition was so little suited to his tastes, till he informed me that Pater Andreas had been recommended to him some years before by a person of importance, whom he did not wish to offend by a refusal. Why the Pater had given up his former and far richer benefice none knew, but he had done so of his own free-will, and his character, professional and social, had all along been blameless. His health, it is true, was not robust, and removal to a milder climate and less work might have been beneficial; but in these respects the change that he had made was for the worse, as the living was too small to afford a curate, and its situation more northern, and therefore colder, than that which he had left. All this could not fail to heighten my interest in the man, and a conversation to which I was a witness, on the evening of the day above alluded to, seemed to afford a clew to the labyrinth of thought in which his eccentric conduct had involved me.

One of the younger clergymen present told of an event that had lately occurred in his parish, where a man had been nearly buried while still alive, although his death had been unhesitatingly certified by the inspecting physician of the district. Every one had something to say on this interesting subject, and the doctor of the next town, a clever but extremely skeptical and peremptory old gentleman, declared that, in the present advanced state of medical science, such a gross mistake could only be made by a very inexperienced person. This assertion was warmly controverted by others, who related many startling instances, to prove that even with the exercise of the greatest caution it is scarcely possible in some cases to exclude this dreadful danger. As it happened, my place at table was exactly opposite to Pater Andreas, and I could not help remarking the nervous and uncomfortable contraction of his features when the subject was first introduced, and the deep and evidently most painful interest he felt in the whole discussion. At the conclusion of it a bitter smile parted his lips, but he said nothing, and in a few moments his countenance became sadder and more stony than before. I know not where I found the courage, but in the midst of the silence that followed the storm, I requested our reverend friend to give us also his opinion on the subject. Never shall I forget the unspeakably sad and sorrowful glance he cast on me, and I would gladly have given a world to be able to recall my thoughtless question.

From this time it was my earnest wish to atone to the Pater for my rashness, and so far to obtain his confidence as to induce him to relate his experience, or at least give me his opinion on what I considered the most terrible incident that can befall a human being. But what was at first little more than vulgar curiosity soon merged in the nobler interest excited by this evidently unhappy man; and this feeling, expressed rather by a sympathetic and respectful demeanor than in words, had in time its due effect even on the stern and reserved nature of the priest; and my patience was rewarded by the following narrative:

"My father was steward to Count B——, who, as you are aware, was one of the wealthiest magnates in the Banat. His regard for his old, trust-worthy servant was so great that I was allowed not only to be the constant playfellow of his children, but also shared their studies under a learned young priest, who was their tutor and domestic chaplain at the castle. My companions were a boy of my own age, and a beautiful girl some years younger. I loved them both as dearly as if they had been my brother and sister, having none of my own. The health of neither was robust, which endeared them all the more to me, and led to the exercise of a sort of protecting tenderness on my part in all our childish undertakings. Aladar, my elder play-fellow, was clever, and gave brilliant promise for the future; but God willed that this promise should never on earth be fulfilled, for he died even before I had left the seminary and received consecration as a priest.

"About this time our former tutor accepted a very honorable position as professor in a public college, and the Count invited me to return to the Castle as chaplain, until, as he kindly said, he should find a more important opening for the dearest friend of his ever-regretted son. The period when I entered anew the family of my benefactor was one of peculiar interest for every member of it, and especially for my former playmate, the young Countess. In compliance with the wishes of her parents—but also, as I soon saw, with all the fond affection of her own warm heart—she had become the bride-elect of one of her cousins, a very rich nobleman, whose estates not only matched with those of her father, but who also was supposed to be his heir-at-law.

"The health of Countess Isor was still delicate, and more precarious than her loving friends could have desired; but her animation, and the radiant happiness depicted on her lovely face, forbade all sad foreboding, and we entertained the cheering hope that even in this respect her marriage might prove a blessing to our darling. At times, I must confess, a voice of doubt in my own soul would ask the question, 'Is this bridegroom, in spite of all his shining qualities, exactly the man into whose keeping one would willingly intrust so delicate a flower?'

"The engagement had been made during my residence in the seminary, before the death of Aladar, and with his consent—as he himself had told me in a letter full of praise of his future brother-in-law, whom, however, he had only known for a short time, as he had been brought up in the capital of a foreign land, where his father had lived as Austrian embassador. When I myself made the acquaintance of the young nobleman I felt that it was only natural that he should have made so favorable an impression on my friends. He was fascinating when he chose to be so; and if he did not always choose, his success when he was in the humor was only the more certain. He was a man of the world, no doubt; but yet not given to its ridiculous bagatelles, so long as their recognition seemed unnecessary to the maintaining of his position, of which he was both proud and jealous. This was a great fault in his character; but not so dangerous a one for the happiness of his future wife as another which I was not long of detecting—a merciless iron will which even his unusual self-control could not conceal.

"Some months after this the wedding was celebrated in the chapel of the castle with all the splendor usual on such occasions in the families of the magnates of our country. It had been the wish of the young Countess that I should act as priest at the nuptial ceremony; but the noble bridegroom declared that 'it had for centuries been the custom' that the marriages of members of his family should be celebrated by a prelate of high rank, and that thus it must be now. I was rather glad to escape the office, being in a somewhat foreboding mood of mind, that might, perhaps, have thrown a dismal coloring over the address usually delivered at the altar on such occasions. The officiating prelate, unembarrassed by any such sad anticipations, spoke eloquently and hopefully of a brilliant future.

"The newly-married pair left the same day the bride's parental roof—not, according to modern fashion, for foreign travel, but to go directly to the princely castle of the young husband in a neighboring county, where a splendid reception awaited them, 'according to the custom of the family for centuries,' and in spite of a timid observation of the bride, who would have preferred a less noisy inauguration of her new life.

"During the next three years I had only once an opportunity of seeing the young lady for a lengthened time, and that was on the mournful occasion of the last illness of her worthy mother, when there was, of course, such sufficient cause for depression and sad looks, that no inference of a normal condition of unhappiness could reasonably be drawn—though I could not help feeling that her manner in speaking of her new home was not so unembarrassed and cheerful as I had always previously found it when she spoke of what was dear to her heart. The presence of little children seemed especially to sadden her, and this I could well understand, for I had often heard her parents speak of the strong desire of the young couple to be blessed with a family, and specially of the anxiety of the Count for a male heir, expressed, perhaps, too often, even in the presence of his wife. Beyond this, however, there was nothing to raise uncomfortable doubts; and very soon after the funeral of her mother, the whole family, including even the old Count, quitted the castle, and I was left alone, with much to occupy me, not only in my clerical duties, but in the arrangement of many secular matters intrusted to me by my kind patron. My solitude was, however, of short duration, and was ended by a letter which announced a great change in my future life. The Countess Isor wrote, in her husband's name, to offer me the incumbency of a large and important parish on their estate, where the clergyman had lately died. I was not without ambition, and I thankfully accepted the gracious offer.

"When I reached my new sphere, I heard the praises of the Countess sung on every side, and found that she was as much beloved as she had been in her maiden home. Not unfrequently, however, my anxiety was aroused by the use of an adjective that seemed to doubt her happiness; for many of the people spoke of her as the 'poor Countess.' What could such a prefix mean in the case of one to all appearance so richly endowed with the elements of a happy life, and adored almost as a superior being by those around her? I could not bring myself to ask an explanation of the unpleasing adjective, and the manifold arrangements necessary to be made in entering on my new position left me little time for conjectures on the subject.

"Soon, however, I had much cause to rejoice on account of my patroness; for a new and blessed hope had come into her married life. As for the magnate himself, and happy father in spe, he had made, long before that hope could be realized, all the preparations 'which for centuries had been the custom in his family,' for the due reception of a male heir!

"The decisive moment came at length, the child was born, it was a boy—but dead! Through all the night that followed the gentle mother knew nothing of the terrible blow that had fallen on her new-born happiness, and slept with the sweet smile upon her face that blessed dreams impart. Down in the chapel of the castle, before the altar, and covered with sweetest flowers, lay the little cradle with her child in its first and last long sleep; while on the altar-steps, with his face buried in his hands, sat the poor father!

"It became my melancholy duty next forenoon to acquaint the unhappy lady with her heavy trial, the Count himself remaining shut up in his own room, and seen by no one. I shall pass rapidly over this sorrowful day, and many others that followed. The illness of the Countess was very serious, and aroused in the mind of the distinguished physician who attended her sad forebodings for her future life. As for the magnate himself, when he emerged from his solitude, he looked as if years had passed over him, and his manners were even sterner and haughtier than before. From passing observations that I could not help overhearing between lady relations of the family, I inferred that his behavior to the sick lady was not such as it ought to have been to a wife in so sad a situation.

"The progress of the Countess toward convalescence was but slow, but when it had so far advanced that she could travel without risk, a prolonged visit to a celebrated bathing-place in Germany was recommended, and, indeed, insisted on by her physician. This new scheme seemed to inspire the mournful soul of her lord with brighter and more hopeful thoughts. The great castle was, therefore, once more deserted, and I returned to my everyday life of scientific study and parochial work. Summer passed, autumn and winter came, but my lord and his wife did not return as had been expected. From the bathing-place above-mentioned they went in succession to several of the capitals of Europe, to consult eminent physicians in reference to the health of the Countess, as she herself informed me in short notes from time to time. The baths had not had the desired effect. Our family doctor heard all this with sadness, but without surprise, as one who had foreseen the fact, though he had held it to be his duty to prescribe the remedy. Spring came, and then another summer, yet the castle was still empty, but autumn saw the young couple re-established in their home. Alas! how changed was my lovely play-fellow! The once blooming rose had become a lily, and one that missed the warmth of the blessed sun to uphold her pure but drooping head. And so it was indeed; her sun, his love—the love of her adored husband seemed to have gone. The temper also of her lord had not improved; he was stern and haughty as before, and he seemed to have lost his former self-control. The Countess did her best to soften the effects of this harsh manner, and made a point of always being in the drawing-room when guests were there; but both seemed equally anxious to avoid a tête-à-tête, and therefore it may have been that I was very often invited to spend an evening at the castle. The Count, who usually sat on a low seat beside the fire, reading the newspapers of the day, spoke seldom, but insisted, notwithstanding, that I should read aloud to the Countess, who worked silently opposite to him. The doctor also was often invited to spend the evening at the castle, but he came very seldom, and excused himself by alleging professional engagements—sometimes when I knew very well that he passed the hours quietly at home. I asked him the reason of his refusal, and his answer gave me a clew by which to unravel mysteries for which I had hitherto found no explanation. He said angrily, 'Unless some miracle shall happen, the Count will kill his wife with his detestable rebellion against the will of God; they are childless, it is true, and are likely to remain so; but this poor dear lady might at least regain her health and strength, were she not made to feel every hour how bitterly her husband resents this disappointment in his married life.'

"'The Countess has great self-command,' said the doctor another day, 'but her whole organization, and especially her nervous system, has been terribly shaken; I feel convinced that when she is alone she suffers all the more on account of the self-control she manifests when in the presence of others; but I can do nothing, for she never complains, and seems as much as possible to avoid all medical consultation.'

"I might have told the doctor that my relations with the Countess were similar to his own, for I found myself entirely excluded from her confidence in spiritual matters; but I refrained, knowing full well that her reticence in both cases sprung from the same sad root, the tender delicacy of a poor tortured woman's heart.

"Thus autumn and winter passed in a melancholy and uncomfortable way; the Count becoming more irritable and moody, the Countess paler and weaker, sometimes sending forth a flash of nervous irritation never seen before in this gentle lady. Now and then, when seated in our evening trio, she would abruptly ask some question of her husband that had no connection whatever with the subject we were reading, and as it seemed to me with no other purpose than to hear him address herself directly. But the poor thing was always punished for her boldness by the polite but freezing tone of his reply, and that even when the question bore some tender reference to happier days. Such intermezzos were extremely painful to me, and I rejoiced when the book which we were reading had sufficient interest to fix the attention of both my gloomy listeners. The post brought weekly a packet of new books from Pesth, and I well remember one rainy, misty, and cold evening in the beginning of March, when I visited the castle by express invitation of the Count to examine a number of interesting volumes which had just arrived. When I entered the drawing-room the Count was sitting as usual by the fire, reading a political pamphlet. The Countess came in a little later, holding in her hand a book which she placed carelessly among the others. Its color attracted my notice, but I did not see its title, and just at this moment the doctor entered to inquire after the health of the family, before obeying an urgent summons to a castle about ten miles off, where the sister of the proprietor had been seized with serious illness. On his departure I proposed that we should examine the new books, to which the Countess gladly assented, and approaching the table read the titles of a number of them, but put all aside until she came to the volume which I had seen before in her hands. This she opened, and glancing at the first page, said in a low voice, 'This perhaps will do.' Her hand trembled perceptibly when she put the volume into mine. I read the title aloud; it was a collection of letters of the Empress Josephine, preceded by a short biographical sketch of the unhappy lady. On hearing the title the Count turned his arm-chair more toward the fire, and dropping the pamphlet he was reading, folded his arms as if ready to listen. The youth of Josephine Beauharnois, her first marriage, and even the earlier portion of her life with her second husband, the great conqueror and diplomatist, were treated very superficially. The main interest of the work lay in the last and saddest period, because the collection of the letters was from the exile of Malmaison. They were evidently edited by one who had been a personal witness of the tragedy, and had a tender interest in the picture, which gave the well-known events fresh charm. At that point of the narrative where Napoleon first seizes the idea of separation, from his desire for a male heir, I heard the Countess say something to her husband in an under-tone, and as I felt that she would not be heard by any other, I raised my voice, and the conviction flashed upon me that her choice of this book had not been a random one, but that the house in which we were was the scene of a similar tragedy, and that the actors were before me. The Count said something in a louder tone, but without my understanding what it was, rose from his chair, which he pushed back vehemently, and hastily left the room.

"I looked up from my book; the Countess was standing erect, her face was flushed, and her work had fallen from her hands, which were clasped upon her breast; but the moment the door had closed she became pale and sank back into her seat, without a cry, a word, or sigh. Respecting her emotion, whatever might have caused it, I did not venture to approach, or even to address her, but thought it better to go on with my reading as if nothing had happened. Sometimes I made a short pause, but the lady took no notice of the interruption, and about an hour afterward when the master of the household (Haushofmeister) came to announce supper, and at the same time to inform her ladyship that the Count had retired for the night, I closed the book and waited till the Countess should rise.

"The servant then said in a low voice, 'Her ladyship is asleep.'

"In her weak state of health, and after such emotion as she had lately manifested, it seemed quite natural that this should be the case; but as the place where she sat lay deep in shadow, I rose and approached her with the reading-lamp. Her eyes were closed, her head bent forward on her breast, and her countenance bore the same expression of ineffable sadness which, alas! I had seen it too often wear. Trembling, I bent over her—no respiration; I took her hand—no life-warmth, no motion. Alarm once given, the whole castle was alive; grooms on horseback were sent in every direction for medical men, while her maids used all possible means to bring their lady back to life—in vain. The Count himself, pale as death, and utterly helpless, sat in his wife's bedroom opposite to her outstretched body, capable only of following with his eyes the vain endeavors of the women. As for me, I paced to and fro in the ante-room, praying to God for the poor soul which was perhaps already standing before His eternal throne, but hoping still that my dear friend might be given back to us on earth. The family doctor at length returned, and after a few words with me went directly to the chamber of the Countess. In about a quarter of an hour the door was once more opened violently, and the Count came out, looking unconscious of all around, and instantly disappeared. Soon after, the doctor followed him from the chamber, flung himself on a seat, and covered his face with his hands. I needed no explanation, and asked no question; but he exclaimed, as if in reply to one, 'Nervous apoplexy!'

"This verdict was confirmed by three other physicians, among whom was one very celebrated man who happened then to be on a professional visit to a neighboring castle. Our dear lady was dead, and beyond the reach of human skill. The Count himself saw no one but the doctors, and them only to receive the unanimous report of his irreparable loss, declining friendly consolation. Of course, all ceremonies had to be attended to, as 'had been the custom in the family for centuries,' and oh, it was a dreadful time for me, the first priest on the estate, and therefore the chief actor in all such matters! So many were there to be gone through, and all of such a sadly sombre character, that it seemed as if the first inventor of funeral etiquette had wished to see how far the human nerves could be drawn out without being drawn asunder. Amidst these prescribed observances, however, were two which could not be fulfilled; the one because the Count himself opposed it, the other because circumstances did not admit of its fulfillment. The first was the embalming of the body, to which the Count had an invincible dislike; the second was the placing of it in two coffins, the inner one being of glass, and the outer of lead, as the latter could not have been procured from the capital for more than a fortnight.

"It was decided, therefore, that the remains of the poor lady should meanwhile be placed only in the transparent receptacle, and after lying in state for the prescribed period in the chapel, be deposited in the family vault. A sable banner floated from the highest pinnacle of the castle tower, and the arms of the family over the great entrance gate were draped with black. So also was the interior of the chapel, and numberless candles burned around the lofty catafalque. The monks of a neighboring cloister, which had been founded by the ancestors of the magnate, held uninterrupted watch, excepting at mid-day and between eleven and one o'clock in the night, when the duty devolved on me to watch and pray beside the coffin. This exposition lasted for three days and nights, and in the middle of the second night, as I was alone in the chapel, I heard the door open and a slow, firm step approach the catafalque. It was the Count himself. Without noticing my presence, he stood motionless for a very long time, then extended his hand, probably to take that of the dead, and left the chapel slowly and sternly, as he had entered. Kneeling as I was, I could not see his face, and even had I done so, the proud self-possession that never failed him would have prevented my reading the true feeling of his heart. Perhaps I was unjust. He may have chosen the hour of midnight for his visit to the chapel that he might weep there unobserved; yet on the day of the funeral, when he walked behind the coffin of his wife, his stern and gloomy aspect forbade the utterance of any word of compassion, if it did not repress all feeling of it for him, and rouse harsh judgments. The glazed coffin once deposited in the vault, its heavy iron door was closed, and the massive key replaced by myself among the family archives, which occupied a wing of the castle, and whose keys were always in the Count's own keeping.

.....Wearied alike in mind and body, I retired to my parsonage to seek needful rest after these days and nights of sorrow and excitement. But the needed rest I could not find, and an irresistible longing seized me to walk in the fresh evening air. My house was situated in the immediate neighborhood of the church, from which a beautiful avenue of old chestnut-trees led to a little hill, on the top of which stood the family vault, not many paces from the road-side. This building had the appearance of a small chapel, and the massive iron door was surmounted by a semicircular window. I chose this way mechanically. The moon shone brightly through the trees, which had scarcely yet put on their summer foliage, and just at the moment when the vault first came in sight, I saw a dark figure advance with extreme rapidity toward me. It was a man, and as he passed me I recognized with astonishment the Count himself, though it was with difficulty that I convinced myself of his identity, so convulsed with terror was his countenance, so disturbed his manner and his gait. I felt that I ought not to let him go on alone, and followed till I saw that he returned to the castle by the nearest way. What could thus have discomposed him? He was probably as restless as myself. Impulse had brought him unconsciously to the tomb of his wife, and then some terror of the imagination had driven him away. After examination of that side of the house on which were the apartments of the Count, seeing they were lighted, and that no signs of unwonted disturbance were to be seen, I returned home and got at last some sleep. Shortly after daybreak I was awakened by the sudden opening of my bedroom door, and the hasty entrance of my sacristan. In hurried words he told me that the evening before he had been to the next village, and that in returning a little before eleven o'clock by the road which passed near the burial-place, he had twice distinctly heard a cry proceed from the interior of the building, and that running home he had immediately related the incident to his wife.

"HER HAND TREMBLED PERCEPTIBLY WHEN SHE PUT THE VOLUME INTO MINE."

"'Why did you not at once come to me?' asked I, strange to say, not doubting for a moment the truth of his narrative. The man hesitated a little, reddened very much, and then told me that his wife had not believed a word of his story, but bid him sleep himself sober, and would not let him out of the house. I dressed myself in haste. My meeting with the Count at the same spot—his terror, probably arising from the same cause as that of the sacristan—all this, and something which in such a case we can not well define, assured me that some mystery lay behind the strange coincidence. Accompanied by the sacristan, I went at once to the castle and asked for the Count, but his valet told me that he had ridden out at sunrise, after a sleepless night. This was very perplexing, for I did not dare to take his keys without permission, and it was my belief that somebody, perhaps a child, had hidden himself during the funeral of the Countess, that he might witness the ceremonies, and had been shut in by mistake.

"I had forgotten to enjoin silence on the sacristan, and during my conversation with the Count's valet this man had told his story to others, so that on leaving the castle I found nearly the whole household ready to accompany me to the vault. I thought at first to decline this numerous escort, but afterward reflected that it was well so many should see the natural explanation of the mysterious occurrence. I therefore ordered them to take a ladder long enough to reach the window above the door, through which one could at least see a portion of the inner space, the tomb itself being in a subterranean chamber. In passing through the neighboring village our little crowd became a great procession. Not wishing to trust any thing to other eyes than my own in so serious a matter, so soon as we reached the vault I myself ascended the ladder. The iron bars were far enough apart to enable me to insert my head between them, and the inner window was fortunately open for the sake of ventilation. Blinded as I was by the bright morning sun, it was at first difficult to see distinctly any thing within; but I soon began to see more clearly than at first, and great was my horror at length to recognize, outstretched on the highest step of the staircase, and immediately behind the iron door, the body of the dear dead lady! I descended trembling, and when at length able to speak connectedly, my first words nearly put all my companions to flight, but my next words brought them back, and set the bravest among them to hammer furiously against the door—all in vain! a locksmith only could effect an entrance, and during the time that we awaited his arrival I knelt down before the building, the people following my example, and prayed to God for a mild solution of this dreadful riddle. The locksmith came at last, and fortunately he was a clever workman, otherwise he must have been baffled by the complicated lock.

"My eyes had not deceived me: near the door there lay the lifeless be by of the unhappy lady—her head bent upon her left arm, her teeth had been buried in her own sweet flesh! Her face and hands bore also marks of wounds from the broken glass of the coffin.—While we stood around, and looked down at this terrible sight, the doctor also kneeling bewildered and half mad with grief at the side of the body, a horse's hoofs were heard approaching, and down the highroad came the Count, returning from his ride. When he reached the spot he looked over the heads of the people; he saw, and comprehended the dreadful truth. The next moment the horse darted forward, with his rider, in full career, and in about half an hour came back—without him!

"'Was he killed?'

"'No—he had been thrown and seriously injured. The accident was followed by a brain-fever, which brought him to the brink of the grave, but from which he ultimately recovered, and left his home for years of foreign travel. He is now widower for a second time, but has a male heir, whom, it is said, he idolizes. As for myself I never saw him more; I left my parish, lived for some time in a convent in the mountains, and then came hither."

Thus far the priest. Some years later I visited the scene of the above-told tragedy. Once more the sable banner floated on the top of the castle tower; once more the arms above the gate were draped in black; once more a funeral procession wended along the old chestnut avenue; but this time there were two coffins, a great one and a little one. The boy had died. The father, in mad grief, had shot himself beside the body of his son.

ONE YEAR AGO.—(SEE POEM, PAGE 410.)

THE KING'S TEMPLE.—(SEE POEM, PAGE 410.)

HOME FROM THE RACES.—[SEE PAGE 410.]

A TEXAS HAIL-STORM.

TEXAS is certainly a great State—territorially, agriculturally, and, as appears by the following statement, it excels most States meteorologically. We have long been aware that that climate was famous for sudden changes of temperature, but not one of the proverbial "oldest inhabitants" whom we have encountered has been able to recall such a hail-storm as that which one of our Texas friends thus describes and illustrates. His letter is dated at San Antonio, Texas, May 20, 1868, and reads as follows:

"One of those terrific hail-storms which one hears of but seldom sees or believes visited this city last evening.

"Captain A——, Doctor B——, and myself, were returning from a day's fishing, some ten miles from town, in an army ambulance. About seven o'clock P.M. we noticed indications of rain. Dark clouds were rising in the northwest, accompanied with a great deal of what we at first supposed to be heat-lightning. The lightning gradually became more vivid, the clouds blacker, and the thunder began to make itself heard; and our first supposition of a light shower changed to a certain prospect of a severe thunder-storm. The mules which drew our ambulance were put to their swiftest gait with the hope of reaching town before it came on, but to no purpose—the storm broke on us when about two miles distant. A fierce wind, driving sheets of rain right in our teeth, put a stop to any further progress, and compelled us to turn the ambulance from the direction of the storm into the 'mesquite' bushes, where we prepared ourselves to quietly sit and take it. Suddenly, however, something hit the side of the ambulance with a noise such as that of a stone violently thrown—another and another—and soon we heard the 'thuds' on the bodies of the mules. Neither mule nor man knew what to make of this; and the former, frightened at this unexpected and unusual castigation, dashed off wildly into the 'mesquite.' It was impossible to see, and, fearing a capsize and a long tramp in the chaparral, we jumped out. Staggering blows on the head and body soon gave us to understand what was going on. It was hailing young cannon-balls! Stones of ice of all shapes, and of the size of a man's fist, cut and bruised our bodies; and, with our arms crossed above our heads, we scarcely the slight protection of a 'mesquite' bush. There are no trees on this prairie-land. We were at different times knocked down by blows about the head—Captain A—— three times. Cut, bleeding, and bruised, with no other prospect than to 'grin and bear it;' not knowing how long such a phenomenon might last, nor how soon we might be knocked senseless, we felt it to be an awful situation.

"In the mean time the mules were 'slewed around' by repeated blows on the head and sides, and stunned. We took advantage of the confusion of the mules, and as they passed us we leaped into the ambulance. Providentially the ambulance was soon brought to a halt by a rail-fence, and the mules were too much stunned and frightened to exert themselves further. We placed the seats over our heads, and, thus protected, awaited the end of the storm, drenched through, shivering with cold, and badly beaten on the legs and sides.

"The hail fell for twenty-two minutes, and was accompanied with heavy rain, bright, blinding flashes of lightning, and continuous roars and sharp cracks of thunder. The curtains of our ambulance were cut to ribbons, and we scarcely thought the mules would weather it; but they did, and, though badly bruised and stunned, brought us safely to town, with black eyes, bloody heads, smashed and cut hats, bruised arms, and torn and muddy clothes, as looked as if just from a 'free fight,' and very badly whipped. Only by experience could we have believed that one could have been exposed to its violence and lived.

"We found our house flooded with water, and all the window-panes and Venetian blinds on its north side knocked into 'smithereens;' and the whole town presents the appearance of a bombarded city. The houses look as if thousands of rifle-pounders had played against their walls and roofs at point-blank range. The walls, covered with an inch thickness of plaster on the outside, show, as in the photograph which I send you of our own dwelling, every scar on which was made by the hail. This also shows, as well as so small a picture can, the effect on the blinds and windows. The shingle roofs are broken and torn to pieces by the hail and wind; great holes are cut through tin roofs and gutters. Several houses were entirely uncovered by the wind; among others that of General

A TEXAS HAIL-STORM—EFFECT ON THE HOUSES.

A TEXAS HAIL-STORM—THE FRIGHTENED MULES HALTED.—[SKETCHED BY A U. S. CAV. OFFICER.]

Mason, who, with his family, took refuge between the walls of a door. The walls of an old church were blown down, and its roof landed in the street. Trees, in some instances, were torn up and thrown down. In one house a stone penetrated the roof, and tumbled, spent, to the floor. The trees and bushes are entirely stripped of their foliage and small branches, cut off by the hail; the corn cut down as if with a scythe; and vegetables and flowers absolutely beaten into the ground.

"The largest authenticated stone that I have heard of weighed three and a half pounds. The very large ones of two pounds and upward, must have been few and far between, for no one could have stood them. They probably averaged a weight of from a quarter to half a pound and were of the size of one's fist—such at least was my experience. They were irregular in shape, as if in their descent many had been frozen together, and as hard as rock.

"A woman, who, with her husband, was camping out on the prairie, had two ribs broken and is believed to be fatally injured; a dog had his brains knocked out; and there are numerous cases of cuts and bruises more or less severe; there are also several reports of fatal casualties to human life, which have not yet been authenticated. You see holes four inches in diameter through tin roofs and sheet-iron stove pipes; boards of fences are knocked off and split by the hail, and the trees barked as if by cannon-balls. Five miles to the westward of this town there was no hail, though wind and rain, and I judge the storm proper, of hail, not to have extended over a diameter of more than six miles."

PARISIAN HONORS.

We submit the following to our readers. Comment is unnecessary:

"At the Paris Universal Exposition, Messrs. Wheeler & Wilson, No. 625 Broadway, received the gold medal, and the only one, awarded for the most perfect Sewing Machine and Button-hole Machine exhibited. J. C. Derby, New York, United States Agent for the Exposition."

"The only gold medal for the manufacture and perfection of Sewing Machines and Button-hole Machines was awarded to Messrs. Wheeler & Wilson, of New York. Henry F. Q. D'Aligny, member of international jury, and reporter of same."—Demorest's Magazine.

Ex-President Martin Van Buren and his physicians testified to the wonderful efficacy of Jonas Whitcomb's Asthma Remedy in his own case.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A TIMELY WARNING,

AND

THE REASON WHY.

How sublime, how beautiful the thought that the researches and developments of the Nineteenth Century have added fresh and glorious laurels to the great temple of fame and science! In every department and phase of progressive development the hand of the sage and philosopher is ever busy—ever ready to devise means for the amelioration of human woe and the prolongation of life.

Think you his an enviable position—an existence without stern obstacles and perplexing cares? Nay, far from it; for he plucks the lovely rose in peril of the thorn; he climbs to eminence and renown, and every step he gains is planted on a prostrate foe. He digs the gold and tries it; another and a bolder hand must strike the blow that stamps its worth and gives it currency as genuine.

It must be admitted by every rational mind that the man who contributes the most toward promoting the happiness and welfare of the human race must of necessity be the most highly esteemed by his fellow-men; acting upon this principle, Prof. R. L. HAMILTON, of New York, has, by patient investigation and vast experience, solved the uncertain question in relation to the vexed and important subject of Liver Complaints and other chronic diseases.

The Doctor, having been very extensively engaged in the treatment of Liver Diseases for a whole lifetime, found a class of those cases that invariably, in spite of the most positive treatment, proved fatal—showing that there were yet some remote, hidden causes that medical science had not fully and perfectly demonstrated. In view of these uncertainties, and for the purpose of benefiting the human race, Prof. Hamilton set about a series of experiments and scientific investigations which have been crowned with complete success—proving the fact which he had suspected, that in all these lingering Liver Complaints the ordinary remedies used by physicians were of no avail, or worse than useless, by destroying the constitution, and hastening the unfortunate victim to a premature grave.

Dr. Hamilton's valuable discoveries consist mainly in his having perfected a combination of remedies which are purely vegetable, and perfectly safe in any case, no matter how delicate the constitution or feeble the person may be; in fact, after having stood the test for years, it is positively proved that they can not fail in any case to cure where there is sufficient vitality left in the system to respond to the specific action of any human agency whatever. So many thousands having been saved by their use, after every thing else had been used in vain, these natural remedies may with safety be looked upon as specifics, in the full sense of the word. For the benefit of the sick who may wish to know positively when they have derangements of the Liver of more or less severity, a combination of the usual symptoms found in such cases will be found below.

SYMPTOMS OF LIVER COMPLAINT.

A sallow or yellow color of the skin, or yellowish-brown spots on the face and other parts of the body; dullness and drowsiness, with frequent headache; bitter or bad taste in the mouth, dryness of the throat, and internal heat; palpitation of the heart; in many cases a dry, teasing cough, with sore throat; unsteady appetite; sour stomach, with a raising of the food and a choking sensation in the throat; sickness and vomiting; distress, heaviness, or a bloated or full feeling about the stomach and sides, which is often attended with pains and tenderness; pains in the sides, back, or breast, and about the shoulders; colic pain and soreness through the bowels, with heat; constipation of the bowels, alternating with frequent attacks of diarrhœa; piles, flatulence, nervousness; coldness of the extremities; rush of blood to the head, with symptoms of apoplexy; numbness of the limbs, especially at night; cold chills, alternating with hot flashes, female weaknesses and irregularities.

Another very prominent and common symptom is the peculiar lowness of spirits and gloomy forebodings of the unfortunate sufferer. Persons of naturally buoyant and cheerful dispositions are often changed to dull, morose, and desponding hypocondriacs; those amiable and sprightly become peevish, irritable, and unsociable—in short, undergo an entire change of manner and character.

IMPORTANT FACTS.

Dear reader, if you have any or all of the above-mentioned symptoms, Prof. HAMILTON has remedies that will strike at the root of them as by magic. There is no such word as fail in his treatment. By them the Liver and Stomach are speedily changed to an active, healthy state, the appetite regulated and restored, blood and secretions thoroughly purified and enriched, and the whole system renovated and built up anew.

It depends much upon the length of time the difficulty has been existing, organization of the particular system affected, climate, general habits, occupation, sex, etc. Of course, the longer the derangement, the more numerous the symptoms of internal discord. If nature, in her salutary struggles to relieve the blood from its poisonous qualities, throws or deposits the greater portion of it on the Lungs, there is at once more or less cough, with eventually all the long train of symptoms of Consumption. It is a law of the animal economy that, to be natural and free, the body must throw off all worn-out and poisonous irritating materials, by the processes called secretion and excretion, as fast as it takes on new particles by assimilation and nutrition. Now, I have ascertained by experiments that the majority of all this worn-out bilious matter, taken up by the blood from the system, is separated from it by the liver when in a healthy condition, and then thrown into the bowels and passed off with the excretions. By this you see, the moment the liver becomes affected, from any cause, it fails to separate the offensive matter from the blood and fluids to an extent proportionate to the torpidity or disorder of the organ. Consequently, nature seeks other outlets, through which she can rid the blood of its unhealthy mass, when it is thrown to the surface through the pores of the skin, which it irritates, and, if the unnatural process is continued long, various forms of rashes, blotches, eruptions, sores, ulcers, boils, swellings, etc., are induced, such as are seen in different persons and localities of the globe.

So with all kinds of fits and nervous diseases. The same poison matter that is naturally, and should be, taken up by the liver, is left in the blood; and if the brain and nervous system are weakened by over-action, or any cause, they are thrown into a negative position, which renders them incapable of resisting the accumulation, and the consequence is, irregular action of the brain and nervous system takes place, and, in their efforts to free themselves of the offending substances, convulsions or fits of various kinds are produced, in all degrees of severity, from the slightest fainting fit to the most dangerous cases of apoplexy or epilepsy. Should the irritation settle, and be confined to the general nerves of the system, neuralgia and all grades of nervous affections supervene, from the most intense pains and irritability to the simple restlessness so often found in females of a delicate and imperfect organization. Restlessness at night is produced from the same; and nervous headache, drowsiness, heaviness, dizziness, roaring, buzzing, and singing in the ears and head, dimness of sight, deafness, throbbing or darting pains in the head. If the bilious matter should settle upon the mucous membrane that lines the stomach, throat, and bowels, then we find the following symptoms or manifestations of the internal derangements, namely: Water-brash, heartburn, sickness and vomiting, colic, pains in the sides, stomach, bowels, back, or breast; sick headache, palpitations of the heart, wind in the stomach, with distress and fullness, choking spells, heat and dryness in the throat, bad taste in the mouth, canker in the mouth and throat, bad breath, thirst, cold chills alternating with hot flashes, dysentery, diarrhœa, cholera and cholera morbus, sour stomach, with raising of the food, unsteady appetite, constipation of the bowels, all-gone feelings, etc.

POSITIVE PROOF.

CONTINUATION OF PROFESSOR HAMILTON'S THEORY.

Hoarseness, Spitting Blood, Bronchitis, Asthma, or Phthisic, and Consumption are produced by the same cause. The bilious material is thrown upon the delicate membrane that lines the air-passages, causing irritation, with more or less cough, severe soreness through the throat, breast, sides, back, or shoulders, or pains of various degrees of severity; and unless something be done immediately to relieve nature, inflammation will supervene, followed by ulceration, night-sweats, cold chills, hectic fever, raising of matter, with perhaps a little blood, diarrhœa, sore mouth and throat, etc., which are indications of a powerful effort of nature to relieve the system of poisonous material which has fastened itself upon the most delicate and sensitive organs in the human system—the lungs and air-passages.

In connection with the above cause we have another which is not understood by physicians, and that is a superabundance of action of the lungs, or, in other words, they have been compelled to labor too hard. That any machine may run well, all the parts must be well oiled and properly balanced. Thus it is with the human system. God, whose hands so daintily fashioned this wonderful body, has allotted to each organ a specific amount of labor, which, if properly and faithfully performed, will cause all to run smoothly and easily through life. But the moment one organ attempts to shirk its usual amount of labor upon a neighboring organ, that moment the harmony of the system is destroyed, and the organ, overtasked by its increased action, becomes, as a natural consequence, enfeebled, and, no longer able to perform even its ordinary amount of work, falls into decay.

Suppose, for instance, that the action of the heart—the tiny seat of life—has become impaired, and, instead of performing its customary amount of labor, it now performs only half as much as it should do—what is the result? In all cases where there is a lack of action in the liver, digestive organs, and heart, the lungs are necessarily brought into powerful action, and are obliged to perform the work of their neighbors, as well as their own proper functions. The labor imposed upon the lungs is, therefore, greatly in excess of what it should be in a normal condition, producing irritation, inflammation, and ultimately ulceration, general prostration, and consumption. In brief, the above are the causes that produce all lung diseases, throat affections, and catarrh. Now, the natural and proper treatment for the full and permanent cure of all such complaints is simple, safe, and reliable. Instead of applying remedial agents to the lungs exclusively, we have, by vast experience, learned that other organs should be aroused to action at once, and be compelled to perform their full, healthy functions, and thus establish harmony, vigor, and vitality throughout the body.

IS WELL KNOWN THROUGHOUT THIS CONTINENT.

Professor R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D., having for many years given his whole time to the treatment and investigation of Chronic Diseases, more especially of the Liver and Blood, and having been long and favorably known in every state and territory in the Union as the most skillful and successful physician in the cure of Chronic Diseases, being formerly Professor of Materia Medica, Therapeutics, Pharmacy, Medical Botany, and Diseases of Females and Children, in Central Medical College, also Physician to the New York College of Health and the Central City Hospital, etc., has had opportunities within his reach of no mean importance, and added largely to his skill and experience.

Nor is this all. His present connection with that popular and useful Institution known as the NATIONAL BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY, as its President and general Manager, is positive evidence that Professor Hamilton has the full confidence not only of the Trustees of the above public institution, but of the American people. It is now admitted by the best physicians that Prof. Hamilton is the only physician in the world that has made Liver, Lung, and Blood Diseases a specialty for a whole lifetime, and the only one that has written a full and true theory of the origin and cure of Liver Complaints.

The views advocated by him more than a quarter of a century ago are now adopted by the most eminent physiologists of the world.

HE HAS TREATED MORE CASES OF THIS KIND THAN ANY OTHER MAN.

After having successfully treated over two hundred thousand cases of Liver, Lung, and Blood Diseases throughout the United States and British North America, the people can have no excuse for doubting his skill and ability to cope with all diseases to which the human family are subject. The name and fame of Professor R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D., have become a household word throughout this continent, and the mere mention of them are a sufficient guarantee that the public may place full confidence in his worth and reliability. By the new system of treatment adopted by Prof. Hamilton, all chronic diseases are fully and permanently cured, with more speed and certainty than any other known method. In a majority of cases, cures are made in one quarter of the time usually required by other treatments; and there is also another advantage to be gained which is of great benefit to the laboring classes, in that no mineral or poisonous remedies are given. Consequently, patients are in no danger of exposure, and need not be kept from work, or compelled to change diet or general habits of every-day life.

THE REASON WHY!

WHY IS DR. HAMILTON SUCCESSFUL?

1st.—Because he has studied these diseases for a lifetime—first becoming interested by his own sufferings.

2d.—Because he has investigated every remedy known to science, and, in addition, has new remedies, from the fields and forests, of his own discovery, and of the greatest possible efficacy and value.

3d.—Because he has no routine way of treating all cases alike, but treats each patient who sacredly commits his health to his care according to the actual condition of each patient.

4th.—Because, having made a specialty of Liver, Lung, and Blood Diseases, he has an experience which has extended to tens of thousands of cases—a greater experience, it is safe to say, than any other living man.

5th.—Because he selects his remedies for each case with such care, uses harmless vegetable agents, and devotes his whole life and energies to making his practice successful—to get his patients thoroughly and permanently cured.

REMEMBER ONE THING!!!

Reader: Do not think that you can not be cured because you have tried other remedies. Let it be distinctly understood that many of my remedies are known only to myself, for many of them are discoveries of my own, and are compounded according to my own reasoning and extensive experience with the sick.

All sick persons must remember that, if they wish to be put upon a course of treatment which will cure them, they can write me their present symptoms, plainly; or patients can mark the symptoms they have, as above published. I can, in every instance, prescribe for them just as well as though I saw them, for I have constantly thousands under my treatment, in various parts of the world, whom I never see, all of whom I cure as speedily and safely as those I see in person—in fact, some of the best cures ever made I have perfected in cases I never saw.

All I wish to know in any case is the most prominent symptoms, and they can just as well be written as told to a physician, and he can treat the case as easily as though the patient were present.

Please write to me at once, all ye afflicted, and I will answer you promptly and to the point, and state fully the facts as they appear, and whether you can or can not be saved. Do not give up, even though your family physician has done you no good; for I have saved thousands after all hope had fled and the grave was near. The wisdom and goodness of a just Providence will not withhold the noble means for the salvation or happiness of his suffering and erring children. Also, if you expect a full and specific reply to your letter, always inclose ten cents; postage must be paid in advance. I am always in attendance, and attend to all cases in person, and the afflicted public may rely upon my responsibility, and that they will be dealt with justly and honorably.

ANOTHER APPEAL TO THE INCREDULOUS.

So well knowing the general custom of the American people to denounce all advertising physicians as "humbugs," without knowing any thing at all in regard to their merits, in addition to the numerous and wonderful estimonials from some of the thousands who have been cured by me, I publish below the names and addresses of a few reliable persons who know me well as a man of integrity and a reliable physician. Any one desiring can call and consult any of them, or address them by letter on the subject:

Benjamin Berry, Matteawan, N. Y.
Alexander Hughes, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.
John Proper, Waterford, N. Y.
Alice J. Palmer, New Milford, Conn.
Thomas B. Slingerland, Rome, N. Y.
Charles Carroll, Attorney-at-Law, No. 63 Liberty St., New York City.
Timothy Cronin, Attorney-at-Law, No. 161 Broadway, New York City.
J. M. Emerson, No. 83 Nassau Street, New York City.
J. K. Van Slyke, Stationer, No. 2 Broad Street, New York City.
William Wright, Broker, No. 50 Broad Street, New York City.
Norval M. White, Clerk in New York City Post-office.
F. Dennstadt, M.D., No. 296 Broome Street, New York City.
G. D. Smith, M.D., Gettysburg, Pa.
E. Harmon, American Hotel, New York City.
Dr. Palmer, No. 79 Fourth Avenue, New York City.
William B. Betts, Norwalk, Conn.
Edwin Burlingame, Troy, N. Y.
S. O. Gleason, Druggist, Troy, N. Y.
Harvey Wilcox, Ridge Mills, N. Y.
The Hon. R. G. McCreary, Gettysburg, Pa.
G. W. Lord, Attorney-at-Law, No. 55 Liberty Street, New York City.
S. S. Street, M.D., Margaretsville, N. Y.
S. S. Parker, Alabama, N. Y.
J. Jackson, Broker, No. 137 Broadway, New York City.
Charles Van Benthuysen & Sons, State Printers, Albany, N. Y.
Joseph Anderson, No. 81 Adams Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Riley Merrill, Sanford, N. Y.
Daniel Edwards, Otego, N. Y.
Martin Decker, Rockland, N. Y.
Burr Wilson, Rockland, N. Y.
Marvin Kimball, North Branch, N. Y.
Thomas Colby, Moresville, N. Y.
Thomas Fitch, M.D., Prattsville, N. Y.
J. W. Parmenter, No. 9 Spruce Street, New York City.
A. B. Sands & Co., Druggists, No. 141 William Street, New York City.
William Youngblood, No. 83 Nassau Street, New York City.
Renatus Bachman, Chemist, No. 188 Fulton Street, New York City.
John E. Van Etten, Attorney-at-Law, Kingston, N. Y.
Oscar Hamilton, Stamford, N. Y.
Henry Biers, Chicago, Ill.
Joseph Palmer, New Hamburgh, N. Y.
George H. Bates, No. 63 Liberty Street, New York City.
Rev. Ira Hugg, Pointville, N. J.
Rev. Wesley Quinlan, West Sand Lake, N. Y.
Rev. Henry Kimball, No. 9 Beekman Street, New York City.

The Truth must be Told, if the Heavens Fall.

NEW AND WONDERFUL TESTIMONIALS IN FAVOR OF PROF. HAMILTON'S SUCCESS IN CURING CHRONIC DISEASES.

"HAD OFTEN RECEIVED SIMILAR ASSURANCES."

It is with much satisfaction that I invite particular attention to the following voluntary statement of the eminent divine and missionary the Rev. A. A. Constantine, recently located in the interior of Africa:

No. 90 Fulton St., N. Y. City, April 21, 1868.
Dr. R. Leonidas Hamilton, No. 546 Broadway.

My Dear Benefactor: A sense of duty impels me to say that your medicines have done for me what no other physician has been able to do. I have been a sufferer for many years from diseases contracted while laboring as a missionary in Africa. Last fall I was declining fast, and had all the symptoms of quick consumption. I applied to you for help. You remarked, "Before I get through with you I will make you feel several years younger than you have ever felt since you left Africa." I thought but little of that, as I had often received similar assurances from eminent physicians, both here and in Europe; but in less than two weeks all my symptoms were entirely changed, and my health and strength improved very fast. In a few weeks I found myself in the enjoyment of better health, and able to perform more labor, mental and physical, than at any previous time since I left Africa. May God bless you in all your researches in His great laboratory, and make you His agent in restoring thousands to health. A. A. Constantine.

GOOD PROOF.

Webster City, Iowa, May 10, 1868.
Dr. Hamilton, New York City.

My Dear Sir: Your medicine was received in due time, and I certainly feel very happy to inform you that it had the desired effect. Shortly after I commenced taking it the whole combination of symptoms left me. My husband and I have such confidence in your ability and honesty that we are recommending all the afflicted we know to write to you. If we are ever in need of medicine again, we shall apply to you.
Yours very gratefully, Mary E. Lyon.

"PRONOUNCED INCURABLE!"

Mrs. Almira S. Brackett Freest, of Lee Centre, Oneida Co., N. Y., writes, May 19:

"I feel, through the mercies of God, you have done me great good. I have not had a vomiting spell in over fourteen weeks. My case is known in North Adams, Mass., where I lived when under your treatment, and in all the towns in Berkshire County. If you were to publish my cure in that county, you would get many cases, for I was pronounced incurable by all the doctors in that part of the country. I will cheerfully vouch the truth of this to all strangers who may doubt it."

A CASE OF PILES COMPLETELY CURED.

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. N. Bruett, of Jefferson, Wis., written May 17, 1868:

"I have used the medicine you sent me, and though I can not say I am thoroughly cured in all respects, yet I feel under great obligation to you for the removal of my worst symptoms and the great mitigation of others.

"The piles with which I greatly suffered are entirely cured; indeed, before I had finished the first course they ceased, and have never returned, and my blood is better, the irruptive tendency of slight flesh wounds is removed, and such now heal quickly."

"BENEFITED HER MORE THAN ALL THE REMEDIES SHE EVER USED IN HER LIFE."

Mrs. E. A. Ellsworth, of Dannemora, Clinton Co., N. Y., writes:

"About one year ago I sent for and received your medicine, which benefited me more than all the remedies I ever used in my life, and I now want you to let me know what you can do for a neighbor of mine."

Mrs. Lethea A. Smith, of Evergreen, Avoyelles Parish, La., writes, May 6:

"I feel and know that I am gaining rapidly all the time, and I know not how to express my gratitude to you for relieving me of pain and misery. I have no more gloomy forebodings; menses are regular, digestion good; in short, I feel like my former self again. Any thing I can do for you, by influencing others to apply, shall be done with earnestness and great pleasure. Send me some circulars, for I feel that one should be in the hands of every diseased person throughout our impoverished Southern country."

AN OLD LUNG DIFFICULTY.

C. D. Smith, Esq., of Paducah, Ky., writes thus, March 23, 1868:

"Dear Doctor: My brother commenced taking your medicines about 11 days ago, since which time he has materially progressed toward better health. He sleeps and breathes much easier, and his strength is returning very fast. He is gaining in flesh also. He coughs much less; indeed, yesterday he walked with me some three miles—slowly, of course—and he coughed but once during the ramble, which would not have been done at any time before for two years. You will hear from this place in the way of other patients."

GAINS TWENTY POUNDS IN THREE MONTHS.

Miss Annie Applegate, of Le Claire, Scott Co., Iowa, writes, Feb. 26, 1868:

"I know your remedies are invaluable. I gained 20 pounds of flesh while taking them. If any one complains, I tell them to try your remedies, for I was very bad with liver disease."

"TAKES PLEASURE IN MAKING KNOWN THE GOOD RESULTS."

Mr. J. H. Moshell, of Columbus, Georgia, writes:

"I received your medicine, and took as directed. The effect was entirely satisfactory. Have handed out the circulars you sent me, and take great pleasure in making known the good result."

"IS MAKING THE HAPPY RESULTS KNOWN."

A. W. Harney, of Woodson, Morgan Co., Ill., writes:

"I have acquainted two young men in this place, who are suffering with liver complaint, with the happy results attending your treatment in my case."

"RESTS WELL NIGHTS."

Mr. Willis De Long, of South Edmeston, Otsego Co., N. Y., writes:

"I received your medicines in due time, and have used them with great benefit. Previous to taking the remedies I could not lie on the left side, nor rest scarcely any nights. My sleep is now sound and refreshing, and I can lie on either side. All the bad feelings about my stomach and sides are gone, and I begin to feel like my former self again."

"MONEY NOT THROWN AWAY."

Mr. Job Coslett, of Danville, Montour Co., Pa., writes:

"I received the medicine you sent, and before I had finished taking it I was able to work, and have been ever since. When I expressed my intention to try your remedies, many of my neighbors said I 'would throw away my money.' I feel that I have not thrown it away, for I received great benefit—indeed, I may say a perfect cure."

"DOES NOT DEEM IT NECESSARY TO SEND FOR ANY MORE."

Mrs. Margaret Nellis, of Eagle Rock, Pa., writes:

"I received your medicines in due time, and have used them as directed. They have effectually cured me, and I do not deem it necessary to send for any more."

WHEN DOCTORS DISAGREE, WHO SHALL DECIDE?

Miss Mary C. Webster, of Pilcher, Belmont Co., Ohio, writes:

"When I first told my regular physician, who had been attending me, that I was taking your remedies, he said: 'I tell you, Miss Webster, there is no use in taking Dr. Hamilton's or any other doctor's medicine, for you have no constitution on which to build; there is not sufficient vitality in your system to respond to the action of the medicine; no power on earth can save you, and if you live a month, 'twill be owing to the favorable condition of the weather.' The fact that I am still living, and far better than three years ago, is evidence that the doctor was not very correct in his remedies. I feel that it is your remedies alone that have kept me out of my grave. I attribute all I enjoy to the favor of God and your treatment; I will never ever feel grateful for my deliverance from what seemed an untimely death."

"CHEERFULLY RECOMMENDS HER FRIENDS."

MRS. SUSIE E. DAVIS, of WARWICK, MASS., writes:

"Previous to my taking your remedies I was unable to do any of my work, and confidnot sit up only a portion of the time. I can say truthfully and sincerely that your medicine and advice have been of the greatest benefit to me; and I have cheerfully recommended you to such of my friends as have needed medical advice and treatment."

A CURE OF SALT RHEUM AND SCROFULA.

MRS. Charlotte Rhoades of Courtland Centre, Kent Co., Mich., writes under recent date:

"It is like the first winter in eleven years that my health have not troubled me with Scrofula and Salt Rheum. It is your remedies that have accomplished this. When I see any one out of health, I tell them to at once write to you for help and advice."

"HER STORY IS SOON TOLD." A CASE OF PILES CURED.

Corrie E. Phillips, of Middletown Centre, Susquehanna Co., Pa., after making application for a friend of hers, adds:

"As for myself, my story is soon told: I am well again. Have no use for and your medicines. I believe you have saved me from an untimely grave: you have cured me from the Liver Complaint and the Piles. My sufferings from the latter disease (incident, I believe, to the former) were intolerable. I can express my thanks to you for what you have done for me, and they are genuine and unbounded, and are manifested while doing it. God will be your rewarder. If I or any of mine are sick again I will send for you first from us."

"FOUND HIMSELF A SOUND MAN."

MR. C. D. Inman, of North Chemung, Chemung Co., New York, writes:

"Three years ago I was suffering with a severe case of Liver Disease, and after trying our local physicians, and nearly every patent medicine, without relief, I was induced by a neighbor of mine, who had been cured by you, to try you a trial; and after taking your remedies for a single month, I found myself a sound man. I can't say my wife and family were pleased like relief. I now make application for my daughter, also."

HAS LEARNED FROM EXPERIENCE THAT AGE DOES NOT AGREE WITH THE WAY OF MY MATCHLESS REMEDIES.

MR. Elvira Ely, of Rock Falls, Whiteside Co., Ill., writes, May 1st:

"When I first wrote to you for counsel and advice, I did not think I was very sick, for how could you not give me my encouragement; but, sir, let me say to you, I have learned from experience that age does not stand in the way of your matchless remedies."

"HAD OFTEN PASSED THEM BY AS A HUMBUG."

HUDSON, ILL., May 3, 1868.

"DEAR DOCTOR: I delayed writing to you that I might see whether the relief I realized from your invaluable medicines would be as lasting and permanent as it was unexpectedly magical. I am glad to be able to say that I have experienced no relapse, and I feel it due to you and others, and my sympathizing readers below in their behalf, that I should acknowledge your skill and power in the treatment of Liver Disease.

Having suffered three years from a very disordered and deranged state of the liver, and having visited the best physicians in Jacksonville, Illinois, an adjoining town, and consulted to no benefit, I determined to try your remedies, of which I had frequently read, and passed them by as a humbug. I tried one bottle, which relieved; tried another, and felt so much relieved as to change my former decision. Suffice it to say that time I have continued to convalesce, and am now, comparatively speaking, a new man. I shall never forget my indebtedness to you, nor forget to cherish the remembrance of your name.

Truly yours, ARTHUR W. HARVEY.

CONSUMPTION CAN BE CURED.

NONE KNOW BETTER THAN ALL THE PHYSICIANS.

MRS. Catharine Anderson, of Southampton, Bucks Co., Pa., writes:

"Your medicines have worked wonders in my case. Previous to taking your remedies I had doctored with three physicians, two of whom pronounced my case consumption, and incurable. Cod-liver oil and different kinds of syrups were taken in great quantities, but to no purpose. I was confined to my bed for six months, extremely low, and raised profuse quantities of matter. My throat was swelled out nearly even with my chin, and my sufferings were almost beyond endurance. I had taken your medicines more than one week before I found great relief, my cough was much loosened, and I breathed with greater freedom and ease. My appetite was good, and I felt like a new person. I persevered before me. I owe my very existence to your great skill and your matchless remedies."

"YOU HAVE BEEN THE MEANS OF SAVING MY LIFE."

WESTPORT, N. Y., April 25.

DEAR SIR: I have used nearly all the medicine you sent me, and shall finish it before the receipt of another package. I think you will find few cases more obstinate than mine was. My bowels and back were weak and in a bad state, and many of my weak points seemed to be there. I had a very severe pain in my head, and was so nervous and seemingly deranged at times that I could not account for myself; now I am much better now, and I feel almost free from disease. I think one more package of your remedies will complete the cure. But you will hear from me again, for you have been the means under the blessing of Providence) of saving my life. My faith is fully established, and I think I understand your theory, and believe you are able to cope with any disease to which the human system is heir to. Indeed, I had tried every other means and every other physician that I had faith in; and was all but failed to despair, when the Lord, by some special means, directed me to you, and from the first I had faith to believe that you could cure me. In fact, I have for many years felt as well and free from disease as I now do.

Truly, your life-long friend, SIMEON MCCORD.

A LADY'S LIVER AND DIGESTIVE ORGANS CURED.

Prof. Hamilton. WEEDSPORT, N. Y., April 18, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I have used three quarters of the package of medicine you sent me, and thanks to the Kind Providence, from whom all should bless, for the great good they have done me. I may believe myself entirely cured of my liver and digestive organs; and I find I not received timely assistance, your treasure my difficulties would soon be terminated in liver consumption, and then I should have been incurable. I have been lifting fast for the last few months previous to applying to you, although under medical treatment of three of the most skillful physicians in one of the cities of this state. Many persons are daily writing me to ask me to hear of your medicines sell, remarking that "Professor Hamilton must be possessed of more than ordinary skill to cure you." Some look at me with great amusement, after noticing the great change that has come over me, my condition and appearance in so short a time. I ride or walk every day, and can walk a mile.

Truly yours, MRS. D. C. HOWE.

HOW GRATEFUL THE RESTORED!

PARSIPPANY, HUNTERDON CO., N. J.,

OCT. 15, 1867.

DEAR SIR: The medicines I received from you I have taken as directed, and I can not express my gratitude for the great benefit derived from their use. My disease is entirely, and, I believe, permanently relieved. I have not taken a dose of medicine for you after all other means had failed. Depend on it, I shall do all in my power to direct poor, diseased mortals to a source of relief which, from experience, I know to be a true one. I thank you, my dear Doctor, for your faithful attention, and you shall always have my best wishes for your success in relieving the sufferings of your fellow-creatures.

Yours truly, MRS. CHARLES BRUSH.

WHY WILL THE AFFLICTED DOUBT WHEN SO MANY ARE SAVED?

MR. Edwin P. Arthur, of Lyons, N. Y., writes:

"I deem it my duty to write to you and let you know the success of your medicines in my wife's case. She had not rested, day or night, for three years, save of the last time I did not expect her to live through the night. When you wrote me that you could cure her, I must confess that I thought it my duty to use all means in my power to save her life, but I had little confidence in your remedies. The result is that she is now well, and doing the work of her own family. From such unbounded success, I have unbounded confidence in your ability to cure any chronic case, and now beg leave to lay my own case before you."

TO ALL THIS TRUE!

Mr. Samuel L. Farrow, of Kalamazoo, Mich., in a letter dated April 9, 1868, writes:

"I have read many of the testimonials that were in the New York Tribune, and sent them to the persons therein publishing their letters of testimony, and also about you, and every one stated that they were true, and recommending your remedies very highly: also giving a history of their cases, which was, indeed, truly distressing. Therefore, with a sick wife and three small children to support."

A VOICE FROM THE WEST—CATARRH AND CONSUMPTION CURED.

MR. Abigail Beeman, of Waukon, Allenakee County, Iowa, says, March 31, 1868:

"I have taken your medicines as directed, and cannot express my gratitude I have been able to do my work for eleven years, and during that time had consumption. I had used many patent medicines, and in the West, but was constantly growing worse, and was not able to do my work. Having seen your notices for your valuable medicines, I should have been in my grave, but for them. Now I feel well and hearty."

ANOTHER CASE OF EPILEPTIC FITS CURED.

MRS. Lavina Myers, of Toronto, Vermillion Co., Ind., writes:

"I have taken two thirds of the medicine you sent me, and have had no fits or spasms since I commenced to take it. I feel as if your medicine would cure me, wonderful. I feel to thank God that I have been relieved of such a horrifying disease. I will use my influence to prevent the possibility of a relapse, although I now feel perfectly safe."

LIVER DISEASE OF TEN YEARS' STANDING CURED.

MR. George W. Crocker, of South Valley, Otsego Co., N. Y., writes:

"I have used a portion of the medicines prepared for me, and am much gratified in informing you that I have gained twenty per cent in health. I am surprising to me, as I had not seen a well day for ten years previous to going to you. I consider your remedies truly wonderful."

A SAD CASE, SURELY!

The following testimonial comes from

NORTH EGREMONT, BERKSHIRE CO., MASS.,

Dr. Hamilton, December 1, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I was troubled for seven years with liver complaint and bilious colic, which at times was so severe that I thought I should die. I was sick last September I was taken down so low my friends thought there was no hope for me. I had a mind side. My suffering was more than I can tell. I employed one physician after another, without experiencing any permanent relief. At last, reading of your wonderful cures, before despaired, concluded to write to you, stating my case as correctly as possible, and received your answer that you could cure me, I therefore ordered the medicine (my friends still opposing). In about two weeks I found, after taking it two or three days, I began to gain, and now feel quite well, having regained all my trade (carpenter and joiner) for some weeks past. I confidently recommend all afflicted as I was to place implicit confidence in your treatment, for I am convinced you understand your business, and you can do me justice.

Yours truly, CHARLES POTTER.

IMPORTANT CASE OF EPILEPTIC FITS.

Read the following letter from a gentleman of business has done in a case of this disease, hitherto considered incurable.

Dr. Hamilton: BUCHANAN, ILL., October 13.

DEAR SIR: My wife was afflicted with epileptic fits with great spasm and nervous debility. She doctored a little several; but finding no relief, I wrote you. I had one of your circulars, and was so impressed with your power and ability to cure her case that I determined to try your remedies. As you know, we sent for your remedies which, by the blessing of God, have completely and permanently cured her. She has not had a fit since, nor been troubled with nervousness, and her strength have returned. As every attack she had was more severe than the preceding, I have reason to suppose she could not have lived long, but for the timely introduction of your wonderful aid. To God be the praise: for so speedily and miraculously have your remedies relieved her. I feel that I am now as an instrument of Divine power in rescuing my dear companion from a living death. To God and his benevolents express my gratitude and joy. I wish you to publish this, and direct any one to you. I deem it my solemn duty to all afflicted with this awful malady to do all in my power to make known to them the true physician; and if my doubt the authenticity of this let them write to you, and I will satisfy them it is all true. May God's blessing attend you in your efforts for humanity's good.

Yours truly, WILLIAM M. SLEAR.

RHEUMATISM—AN AWFUL CASE!!

William McNellis, Eagle Rock, Venango County, Pa., writes, April 15, 1868:

"I return my sincere thanks for having permanently relieved me of rheumatism and restored me to recovery for about seven years! When I had doctored with other doctors, and tried the patent medicines that I could get, with no avail, and was so bad that I could hardly get out of my house, and part of the time not able to get out of my bed, as I was afflicted so intensely every night, I would try you as a last resort. To my great joy, in less than three weeks time I was able to go out and work, and was active man in the place. In one month I was perfectly cured, and had gained in flesh considerably. I never felt better health in my life than I have enjoyed for the last six months. Your medicine and your miraculous remedies."

A NOBLE EXAMPLE.

ANNA HAY, of Hunt's Corners, Cortland County, N. Y., writes, April 20, 1868:

"Three years ago last spring I was in very poor health, and sent to Dr. Hamilton for one of his circulars. I used them according to your instructions, and, by the blessing of God, was restored to perfect health. I was truly thankful to my heavenly Father, I was restored, and have been very well most of the time since. Besides doing the work for and taking care of my family and an aged mother, I have woven over three hundred yards of cloth, and spun the material for a hundred yards of it, which I could never have accomplished were it not for the effects of your remedies, for which I feel under many obligations to you. I have so much faith in them that I recommend every sick person among my acquaintance to procure them, and shall continue to do so. I forgot to mention before that Mr. Hay was so badly afflicted with the rheumatism in his knees that he was obliged to go about with a cane, and sometimes with a crutch. I prevailed upon him to apply some of your External Specific, which I happened to have in the house. He used it only three times, and was entirely cured. For three years before his knees would pain him so badly that he could not sleep nights. After being cured he could lie or sleep as sound as a pig, and has had no more trouble with his knees since."

IN HIS MERCY HE SAVES THE AFFLICTED!

Mr. John Leisy, of Jeddersville, Washington Co., Pa., writes:

"The medicine you sent me last spring acted like a charm. It relieved me very soon of a deranged state of the liver, stomach, and bowels. The marked peculiarity of your remedies is, while they act directly and specifically on these deranged organs, they do not depress or debilitate the system, like other Liver Remedies I have taken. I consider you the greatest benefactor of the lesion, and, from your open, fair way of dealing with the afflicted, the most conscientious man, as well as accomplished physician."

READ, YE AFFLICTED.

Mr. Samuel A. Hinton, of Curwensville, Pa., writes, May 23, 1868:

"My daughter now enjoys better health than she has had before in many years. She seems to be perfectly well. I thank the Lord I can could her."

APPRECIATES IT FULLY!

Mr. Joseph Littel, of Thompson, Pa., writes, Sept. 5:

"I have received great benefit from the medicines from you. It is with much pleasure and thankfulness that I now state that my health is fully re-established. The asthma and bronchial difficulties are entirely removed, with the liver and digestive organs, before specified. I now feel as well as any one can expect to be at my age.—[Fifty-seven years."

CONCLUSION.

It would seem to us that, effect carefully looking over the evidence given above, all reasonable persons must be led to the conclusion that there can be no good reason for doubting the fact that DR. HAMILTON is just what he is represented to be—a very successful physician, and his remedies truly wonderful. It is useless to cry "humbug," for the above parties have volunteered to give the strongest evidence for the benefit of the suffering, and for no other purpose. All of these testimonials are genuine—are guaranteed to be so, in fact—and if any one wishes to do so, can get from their own pens the FACTS. Any of them will answer all inquiries of the curious.

Have no hesitancy in writing to the Doctor, and state to him your case in full, and he will deal honorably and correctly with you. All letters to him must be addressed thus:

R. LEONIDAS HAMILTON, M.D.,

P. O. Box 4922,

No. 44 BROADWAY,

New York City.

Cure of Dyspepsia for No. 4922, New York.

The number of the Post-office Box must be put on each letter to insure safety.

Campaign Sleeve-Buttons.

IMITATION IVORY.

Perfect Likenesses of Grant and Colfax

in relief. Red, White, Blue, Black, and Bronze.

$1 00 per pair. Sent free on receipt of price.

Address, THE TRIBUNE,

Wm. M. WELLING, Patentee, 571 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, a little material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, time saving much labor and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.

DAVID WATSON, Agt., Adams Press Co.,

No. 25 Ann Street, New York.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,

Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Public Buildings.

ASTONISHING. The genuine GRODIE GOLD WATCH, fine hunting case, marked 18 carats equal to the BEST GOLD, worth $100, imported and sold by us only, at $15. Sent by express on receipt of $1, the balance cash on delivery. Address

BENTON & CO., 146 Fulton St., New York.

$325 A MONTH, AND EXPENSES. 28 New Articles. J. B. SMALTZ, Alfred, Me.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an elegant PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent for 25 cents. Address, JOY & CO., Box 5, W. HEPBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

PATENT ERASER

Rubber, Pencil Sharpener, Paper Cutter, and Pen Holder combined. Sells at sight. Agents wanted. Can make $10 a day. Samples sent by mail for $1, or two styles for 50c. Address NORSE ERASER CO., 604 Library Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

CABARET MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT. 503 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the 3 lowest-priced reliable Family Machines of first-class styles, or send stamp for circular to Depot, 503 Broad'y

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.

N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

FOR CAMPAIGN MEDALS, FLAGS, BADGES RICHARDSON & MARKS, 27 Beekman St.

Prices from $3 to $10 per 100. We will send to any address, postpaid, One Sample, 25c., Three Samples, 50c., with PRICE-LIST.

All moneys sent by Post-Office Order at our risk. We guarantee full amount in goods, at lowest rates, for all money sent.

Science Advances.

As soon as an article purporting to be of utility has been tested, and its merits endorsed by public opinion, unprincipled parties endeavor to replenish their depleted pockets by counterfeiting and manufacturing a spurious for the genuine article. Some time since, mercury, in the disguise of pills, powders, etc., was given for all diseases of the stomach and liver, while quinine was freely administered for the chills. At length

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

made its advent, and an entire new system of holding was inaugurated. The beneficial effects of this invaluable preparation were at once acknowledged, and ailment anxious sufferers sought into that obscurity to which an enlightened age has consigned them. There have been many spurious Bitters palmed upon the community, which, after trial, have been found perfectly worthless, while HOSTETTER'S has proved a blessing to thousands, who owe to it their restoration to health and strength. For many years we have watched the steady progress of

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

in public estimation, and its beneficent effects as a cure for all complaints, arising from the stomach, or a morbid state of, and we are glad to say that it can be relied upon as a certain relief and remedy. Its proprietors have made the above preparation, after years of careful study and attention, and now reaping the reward claimed by this valuable specific, and which they so richly merit. It is the only preparation of the kind that is reliable in all cases, and it therefore demands the attention of the afflicted.

EMPLOYMENT. $15 00 to $30 00 a day guaranteed. Sole Right. Male and Female Agents wanted for three descriptive circulars free. Address JAMES C. RAND & CO., Bilderbel, Me.

Science Advances.

As soon as an article purporting to be of utility has been tested, and its merits endorsed by public opinion, unprincipled parties endeavor to replenish their depleted pockets by counterfeiting and manufacturing a spurious for the genuine article. Some time since, mercury, in the disguise of pills, powders, etc., was given for all diseases of the stomach and liver, while quinine was freely administered for the chills. At length

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

made its advent, and an entire new system of holding was inaugurated. The beneficial effects of this invaluable preparation were at once acknowledged, and ailment anxious sufferers sought into that obscurity to which an enlightened age has consigned them. There have been many spurious Bitters palmed upon the community, which, after trial, have been found perfectly worthless, while HOSTETTER'S has proved a blessing to thousands, who owe to it their restoration to health and strength. For many years we have watched the steady progress of in public estimation, and its beneficent effects as a cure for all complaints, arising from the stomach, or a morbid state of, and we are glad to say that it can be relied upon as a certain relief and remedy. Its proprietors have made the above preparation, after years of careful study and attention, and now reaping the reward claimed by this valuable specific, and which they so richly merit. It is the only preparation of the kind that is reliable in all cases, and it therefore demands the attention of the afflicted.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

THE
Old and Reliable Fall River and Newport Line BETWEEN
NEW YORK & BOSTON.

☞ Passengers by this route are assured of a comfortable night's rest on boats combining, with the best sea-going qualities, speed, elegant furnishings, and a table supplied with the best the market affords.

THE SPLENDID STEAMBOATS

NEWPORT, and OLD COLONY,

Capt. WM. BROWN. Capt. A. N. MILLER.

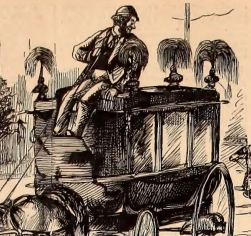
ALTERNATE DAILY (SUNDAYS EXCEPTED),

Leaving New York from Pier 28, North River, Foot of Murray Street, at 5 P.M.

Passengers can take Train on NEWPORT AND OLD COLONY RAILWAY from Newport, R.I., at 4.00 A.M., and arrive in Boston at 6.10, in time to connect with all Northern and Eastern Trains and Boats. Families can secure State-rooms, and breakfast on board at 7.00 A.M., and take 7.45 A.M. Train, and ARRIVE IN BOSTON AT EARLY BUSINESS HOURS. Returning Trains leave OLD COLONY RAILWAY DEPOT, corner of Kneeland and South Streets, at 4.30 and 5.30 P.M.



MEALS FURNISHED ON THE EUROPEAN PLAN.

This is the only DIRECT ROUTE for NEWPORT, FALL RIVER, TAUNTON, NEW BEDFORD, MARTHA'S VINEYARD, MIDDLEBORO', the BRIDGEWATERS, PLYMOUTH, and ALL TOWNS ON CAPE COD, and NANTUCKET. Fares always as Low as by any other Line.

FOR FURTHER PARTICULARS INQUIRE OF THE AGENTS.

E. LITTLEFIELD, 72 Broadway, New York.

W. H. BULLOCK, Supt. O. C. & N. R. R., Boston.

IN RATHER TOO MUCH HASTE TO GET HOME.

INEBRIATED INDIVIDUAL. "I say, ole fello', what'll you charge to take me to Twenty-ninth Street?"
HEARSE DRIVER. "Don't be in a hurry; I'll call for you soon enough, sir."

"The Pen is Mightier than the Sword."

MORTON'S GOLD PENS

DO NOT WEAR OUT.

A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

BY THEIR USE

THE LABOR OF WRITING IS REDUCED,

Greater Uniformity is Obtained.

Ease, Elegance and Beauty are acquired

ECONOMY, PLEASURE AND PROFIT CONSULTED.

The Best, Cheapest and most Durable Instruments for Writing ever used.

SENT BY MAIL SAFELY.

Prices, Fifty Cents and upward.

NO TRAVELING AGENTS EMPLOYED.

Call and you will find Pens exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing; or enclose stamp for circular

A. MORTON,

25 MAIDEN LANE,

NEW YORK.

The New American

CORNET and BAND INSTRUMENTS.

Louis Schreiber's Patent—with Water-Valves.

THE SWEETEST TONED, the MOST POWERFUL, the EASIEST BLOWN, the VERY BEST EVER MADE. THEY ARE NOVEL IN FORM, IN ACTION, AND IN THE MAKE OF THE VALVES.

Each part is made by machinery invented for the purpose.

Years of close study and experiment have enabled the talented LOUIS SCHREIBER to bring forth these beautiful instruments for the admiration and delight of all real lovers of BAND AND ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

Already they have made their mark, and won golden opinions from some of the highest MUSICAL AUTHORITIES.

They have taken the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the PARIS EXPOSITION, GRAND GOLD MEDAL AT THE FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE FOR 1867.

Such men as OLE BULL, C. S. GRAFULLA, 7th Reg't Band, CALM. BOSSE, Leader of the Great Western Band, Sandusky, Ohio, and a host of the best musical minds of the country unite in pronouncing them the most perfect instruments ever presented to the public, either in Europe or America.

We guarantee them to be as they are represented in every respect.

For Circulars, Price-Lists, and voluntary Testimonials of leading Musicians, apply to

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., SOLE AGENTS,
No. 21 MAIDEN LANE (up stairs), NEW YORK.

DRUNKENNESS CURED.

By EVERAL'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1 25 by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South 9th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

Forestall Summer Fevers and all the complaints generated by excessive heat, by keeping the blood cool and the bowels free with TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, at once a most refreshing draught and the best of all regulative medicines.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Extract from fashion article, Harper's Bazar, May 9: "The fire does the work of the laundress without necessitating any unusual labor," etc.

THE AUTOMATIC
CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER

Does the work in minutes, without labor. Fits any stove or range. Warranted to do the work. No. 8, Medium Size, $10 00. Sent, C. O. D. Send stamp for Circular.

State and County Rights for sale, except Conn., N. J., Pa., Del., Md., New York City and Vicinity. Agents wanted for this territory. Address

GENERAL AGENT AUTOMATIC CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER CO., No. 19 Courtlandt Street, New York.

WELLING'S
DYSPEPSIA TABLETS.

Pleasant to the Taste. Relieve and cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and all weaknesses of the stomach. Fifty Cents per box; sent, postage paid, for Sixty Cents. Sold by Druggists. S. G. WELLING, 571 Broadway.

TRY
B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,
MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.

Cures Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.

If your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY.

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington Street, and 45 and 44 West Street, New York.

GREAT NATIONAL FIREWORK CO. DEPOTS:

No. 33 Courtlandt St., and No. 294 Broadway, New York.
Unequalled in quality, brilliancy, and assortment for exhibition or retail trade.
LYON BROTHERS, Agents.

PLANCHETTE.

This new, wonderful, and amusing Automaton now ready. Send for Circular. Agents wanted.
HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., N.Y.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.

GOOD AGENTS wanted to introduce our new STAR SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE—Stitch alike on both sides. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. WE WILL CHARGE MACHINE to responsible parties, AND EMPLOY ENERGETIC AGENTS ON A SALARY. Full particulars and sample work sent free on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., Cleaveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

Sir Robert Ellyer's Celebrated English Life Bitters, cures Dyspepsia and preserves the general health.

PRINCE & CO'S
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thou sand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!

Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-Plated Ware, &c., &c.

CHINA AND GLASS WARE,

at greatly reduced prices.

PASSFORD'S,

Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!

Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in both MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us, with certainty and dispatch, by the aid of our NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Price-List sent by mail on application. TREEMAN & BURR, Clothing Warehouse, 124 Fulton St. and 99 Nassau St., N. Y.

A NEW TABLE KNIFE!

Something that will not Break. A Handle that will not Crack. Is not Offensive to the Smell, like Rubber. Is Beautiful in Design and Finish. Is the Best possible Article for FAMILIES, HOTELS, RESTAURANTS, and STEAMBOATS. This knife is forged from one bar of steel, handle and blade; is heavily plated with silver, and is the CHEAPEST SILVER-PLATED KNIFE OFFERED FOR SALE.

Made by

J. RUSSELL & CO.,
Green River Works, Greenfield, Mass.

Sold Wholesale and retail by

Davis Collamore & Co.,

IMPORTERS OF CHINA, GLASS, ETC.
479 Broadway (four doors below Broome Street).

P. S.—We will send by express, to any address, one dozen Table, $17; one dozen Dessert, $13.

AGENTS WANTED.

MONEY can be made very rapidly by selling our PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN CHART, giving excellent likenesses of GRANT and COLFAX, Portraits of the Presidents, the Platform, Letters of Acceptance, and Valuable Statistical Matter. 100 very valuable Maps and Charts.

Agents should address
B. H. LLOYD & CO., Publishers,
No. 21 John Street, New York.

New Spring Goods

FOR GENTLEMEN.

ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

POLLAK & SON, Manuf'rs of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 468 Broadway, next Broome St., & 21 John St., near Nassau. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5548.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. BABBITT'S LYE CORTEX." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a One Dollar Greenback. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.

B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. 1Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, very like gold in appearance, keeping the color of the finest gold, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own FACTORY, from the model of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in time and durability. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one is warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and time, to a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $3 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one EXTRA Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else can make Oroide watches, and any cheaper representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

A New Discovery.

The most profound and SECRET communications may now be sent either by LETTER or TELEGRAPH, without the possibility of their being read by any one except the person to whom they are addressed. FOWLER'S SELF-TEACHING SYSTEM OF KEY-WRITING accomplishes this end, and can be learned in five minutes by any one who can read or write. On receipt of $1 I will send two Self-Teaching Charts; or, for $5, Fifteen Charts to one address, postpaid. Competent Agents, either ladies or gentlemen, wanted in every city, town, and county in the United States and Canada. Send stamp for circular. Apply to or address G. B. FOWLER & CO., 37 Park Row, Room 23, New York.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,

AS IMPORTED FOR N. Y. UNION CLUB.

TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Presidential Campaign, 1868.

NOW is the TIME for AGENTS to make MONEY.

Sample lot of twelve different elegant styles of GRANT and COLFAX Medals, Badges, and Pins sent postpaid on receipt of $2 00. Also in preparation will be ready June 10th, the Grant and Colfax Campaign Songster, brimful of new and original Songs for the Campaign, adapted to popular airs. Price 25 Cents.

Also, People's Edition, Illustrated Campaign Life of Grant and Colfax, with Republican Platform and Campaign Matter specially prepared for the issue. Price 25 Cents. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. Agents wanted every where. Liberal inducements to dealers.

B. W. HITCHCOCK, 98 Spring St., N. Y.
Headquarters for all kinds of Campaign Goods.

Live in My Heart

AND PAY NO RENT. New Song . . . . . 30c.
THE EVE THAT BRIGHTENS WHEN I COME. . . . 30c.
PELLING HARD AGAINST THE STREAM . . . . . 30c.
SONG OF THE BALL—WALTZING—GOODWAY . . . 40c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 BROADWAY, 2d door above 25th St. Branch, 268 Bowery.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN

One Forward and two Backward Arches, ensuring great strength, well balanced elasticity, easiness of point, and smoothness of action. Sold by all Stationers. One gross in twelve contains a Scientific Gold Pen, the most perfect Pens (assorted points) and Patent Ink-retaining Penholder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 William St., N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, everywhere, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, Pa., or BOSTON, Mass.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties running off worthless cast-iron machines under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed free by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

Musical Boxes

Playing from 1 to 24 tunes, costing from $5 50 to $300 each. Also, the very best accompanying instruments; Voix Celestes (Celestial Voices), Organocleides, Organettes, Forte Pianos, Mandolines, Bells, Drums, Castinets, &c., &c. Musical Boxes are very durable. They are the cheapest for the Home Circle, as a pleasant companions for the invalid. Having given our attention to the trade for over 30 years, we are able to supply every want quicker and better than any house in this country.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers, No. 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), NEW YORK. Musical Boxes repaired.

GRANT & COLFAX.

CAMPAIGN EDITION.

The Lives of GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT and HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX, with a full and complete history of the lives and services of "GRANT AND COLFAX," from birth up to the present time, with life-like portraits of General U. S. Grant and Hon. Schuyler Colfax, and other illustrative engravings. Complete in one large duodecimo volume, of two hundred pages. Price, in Paper cover, 50 cts. Seventy-five Cents in Paper cover, Agents wanted in every village and county throughout the country. Sent to any address, postage paid, on receipt of the price. Address, J. R. PETERSON & BROTHERS, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 601.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

GROUNDS OF THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, ON A SATURDAY AFTERNOON IN JUNE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MUSIC AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

One of the attractions of Washington during the summer—and the "City of Magnificent Distances" has few attractive features during the heated term—is the Saturday afternoon promenade in the grounds of the White House to the music of the Marine Band of the Navy Yard. It is a repetition of the scene which is to be witnessed every pleasant Saturday afternoon on the Mall at Central Park, but on a diminished scale. In character the crowds are about the same: but at the White House is perhaps a little less democratic, and a few notabilities can be occasionally picked out of the crowd, which is of course largely made up of the Department clerks of both sexes. As our very beautiful engraving on the preceding page indicates, the Army and Navy are always represented; while as companions to the Chivalry of the service may be found Beauty gathered from all parts of the country. It has often been remarked by foreigners that there are few public promenades in the world where so many and such varied types of beauty belonging to the same race can be found as on the White House grounds. Representative beauties of all nations gather in the parks and on the great promenades of Paris and London and New York, and other capitals of the world; but at Washington, better than in any other city of the country, one can see the various styles of the American beauty.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1868.

☞ We are happy to announce that we shall shortly begin in HARPER'S BAZAR the publication of "THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD," a new Love Story, richly Illustrated, by the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "Aunt Margaret's Troubles," etc., which can not fail to interest and delight the reader.

THE TROUBLES OF TAMMANY.

ALTHOUGH the chief Democratic journal in the city of New York has stated that Mr. CHASE is by far too ingenious and far-sighted a politician to suppose that the Democratic party can have any serious thought of making him its candidate for President, and has added that the derisive, almost spurning emphasis with which a large wing of the Democratic party turn away from a candidate identified with the suffrage settled in the country, and proves that any further advocacy of Mr. CHASE'S claims is an idle waste of time, yet his candidacy is most strongly urged and pressed by Democrats, and generally discussed by the press. Mr. CHASE'S well-known insatiable longing for a nomination, which led to the famous intrigue against Mr. LINCOLN, at the end of 1863–64, while he was still a member of Mr. LINCOLN'S Cabinet, favors the general impression that he would advance to the very last moment short of concession to the Democracy to secure the approval of the Tammany Convention. But that approval must be the result of Eastern influences, of which the World is the organ, and if they abandon him before the contest fairly begins his disappointment is certain.

In spite of the candidacy some time since we suggested that it could be made practicable only by some compromise, and that the compromise must turn upon the vital point of the political contest—equal suffrage. The Tammany reasoning we suppose to be of this kind: Mr. CHASE is a well-known Republican, but circumstances have put him at open odds with his party. He has had great influence with the best men of the party, however, and many of them hoped he would be their candidate. The Republican party is divided upon the present policy of reconstruction, which in the Democratic view is a military usurpation. Mr. CHASE opposes the civil law against military hand. We can not reverse the Republican policy, and if, conceding that, we agree to nominate Mr. CHASE, who burns to be President, will he not accede in turn to the only candidate upon conditions practicable for us, namely—surrender of the negro to the Southern States, or, at least, silence upon the subject?

We presume this to have been the general view of those who sincerely wished for Mr. CHASE'S nomination. They were sure that he would be willing to pay a very high price for the Presidency. They hoped that he would consent to suppress, or, at least, in regard to the negro, But his letter of the 25th of June, which he says: "It would, however, gratify me exceedingly if the Democratic party would take ground which would assure to the party against all attempts to subvert the principle of universal suffrage established in eight, and to be established in the other Southern Constitutions," was a plain declaration that he wished the Democratic party in the Southern States to favor universal suffrage. The reception of this proposition by the organs of the party in those States, and the manner in which they spoke of the World and other papers which were inclined to this policy, was such as to reveal not only a reluctance, but a "spurning" scorn, which instantly changed the tone of the World, and drove it back to the good old traditional Democratic ground of injustice, betrayal of Southern Union men, and contemptuous disdain of equal rights.

Those who still press the nomination of Mr. CHASE as the sole hope of the Democratic party are not willing, however, not to make one more stand. They now say that, whatever his own views upon the subject, Mr. CHASE is willing to leave the question of suffrage to the States. But the difficulty with this view—which would be plausible except for the letter—is that in the letter, as we have seen in the extract quoted, he shows that he wishes the Democratic party in the States to favor negro suffrage. He removes himself the cloud of doubt, raised by the mere assertion that he would be willing to leave the decision to the States, by saying how he wishes the States to decide. The nomination of Mr. CHASE by the Democrats, therefore, would be not only an acceptance of negro suffrage as an accomplished fact, but a recommendation of it as a policy to the Democratic party in the Southern States. It would not be a negative acquiescence, it would be a positive approval.

It is very improbable, for this reason, that Mr. CHASE will receive the Democratic nomination. As we have always supposed, that party will follow the traditions it has created and suffer the doom it has prepared for itself. It has taught its followers to despise the negro, and to believe that a man's color is a proof of an inferiority which justifies his degradation of common political rights. The common-sense and conscience of the country have opposed this view, and have adopted a policy of equal rights, by which the Union is being rapidly restored with the full privileges of renewed national prosperity. The more sagacious Democratic leaders see, of course, that the country will not consent to reopen the long and angry debate now so happily closing. They would, therefore, acknowledge their defeat and try to form their line upon a new field. But how persuade the really ignorant portion of their party, which they have taught that a negro is a contemptible inferior, suddenly to agree that he is a political equal? This is a serious Presidential campaign in which every Democratic cry must be suppressed, and every Democratic tradition forgotten, and with a candidate who is politically illiterate and who is very desirous for of the party? It is simply impossible.

The party therefore, which at Chicago in 1864 could find no failure, and nominated its chief failure for President, must now declare the peace a failure, and nominate a candidate pledged to subvert its cardinal condition. That candidate will be not Mr. CHASE, because, for he represents nothing. He was merely a lieutenant of GRANT. He would only chill the peace men of the Democratic side, and he certainly would not win Republican votes from General GRANT. The positive element of the party would undoubtedly prefer Mr. PENDLETON; but the other party must insist that, if they are to surrender their whole policy and their man, there must be a compromise upon the candidate, and to secure the nomination of a person of no individual prejudice like Mr. PENDLETON, who would arouse no enthusiasm and poll merely the regular party vote. The Convention, under the circumstances, is sure to be a very amusing and a very instructive assembly.

"SCISSORS, IF I DIE FOR IT!"

THERE is a familiar anecdote illustrative of female tenacity, to the effect that a certain good woman, differing, as she had a perfect right to do, with her husband, was at length submerged by him in deep waters. As a means of enabling her to see the justice of his view, and which, her tongue being silenced, the zealous lady raised her fingers from the drowning flood, and, by the motion of her fingers, indicated her unconquerable adhesion to her opinion. The President of the United States is the latest illustration of this good lady. Since he has once more retorted upon Congress, "Veto, or die for it!" Returning the Arkansas Bill with his veto, he says that Arkansas is either in or out of the Union. If out, the bill does not admit her; if in, it is unnecessary and absurd. But he denies that the State could secede or has seceded; consequently she is in, with all the rights of all the other States that never tried to secede.

This is a logical consistency comes to the ground. For if Arkansas has now all the rights of any loyal State she had them during the war and when it ended; and if Congress has no right to meddle with her organization now, the President had no right to meddle with it in 1865. But he undoubtedly did meddle, even to prescribing an oath to be administered to the voters. When, therefore, he chides Congress for doing what he did first, the President, if he will allow the familiar phrase, is merely—and from his own point of view—the pot calling the kettle black.

We are very glad that just upon the eve of the assembling of the Democratic Convention the President—certainly the most clumsy of allies—reminds the country of the theory held by him and the Democratic party of the actual situation of the late rebel States. It is, that when active opposition to the National Government ceased in any one of them, the State was instantly restored to its old relations in the Union and could reorganize itself exactly as it chose, while Congress had no more to say upon the subject than it has to a change of the Constitution of New York. The Government might indeed proceed against the population of the State as traitors and hang them individually, provided it could convict. But the trial must take place in the State, and each offender be convicted by a jury of his fellow-offenders. Beyond this the country had no right whatever. If the Secretary of Slavery had been instrumental in suppressing the rebellion, it had also given the late rebels an additional representation in Congress, so that the result of the rebellion was to add to the loyal property on all sides, and an increase of political power to rebels. As for Slavery, it is a State institution, and if any State choose to establish it, Congress can not interfere; while an enforced acceptance of the emancipation amendment is consent under duress and therefore invalid.

This is the necessary logic of the President's theory in his veto messages, and of the Democratic hostility to the legislation of reconstruction. The ridiculous depth in which it leaves the loyal people of the United States is evident. Their common-sense has rejected it; and while the President solemnly reiterates it at every opportunity, the whole Democratic chivalry are slyly trying to hedge. But if the President holds fast, who knows but he may compel those chiefs to accept him as their necessary and logical and inevitable candidate?

ENGLISH POLITICS.

MR. DISRAELI intends to dissolve Parliament. He has attempted in vain to evade the issue, and his conduct shows that his excuse for hesitating was pretence. Why dissolve, he has hitherto said, when the new enlarged constituency is about coming to the polls? let us wait for them. But he now proposes to hold the election on the old law. This also shows, and that is perhaps the most significant point of the whole matter, that the Tory chief does not feel sure of the practical working of his new electoral reform bill. It will be remembered that he persuaded his party that it would not suffer by enlarging the number of voters; and the universal expectation and intention were to form an alliance between the aristocracy and the lowest part of the population. It was a policy of King and Lazarus, of Southern slave-holders and Northern immigrants. But his determination to have the election before the new voters are eligible reveals his distrust. He is evidently afraid that he could buy or control the mass of the new constituencies.

The difficulty we suppose to be the extreme liberal and even republican tendency and organization of an important part of the artisan class, which is probably more widely spread than is generally imagined. It is indeed not likely that the most cultivated and trained English minds should be constantly engaged in the consideration of every political question with a force and freedom that are almost unknown in that country; and the corresponding interest among those who are most directly affected by such intellectual activity. There is a party of Independents as well as Presbyterians in the present political world, and a party of the clubs as well as the Girondists.

The real extent of this party it would not be easy to state with accuracy. It is allied with the more intelligent Fenian leaders, and has a distinct policy in regard to all public questions. Its bold by tradition and sympathy must be very strong upon the Irish question, the vital clue of the English population, the agricultural laborers. It is also well organized. Indeed, if Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON'S estimate of the artisan class in his "Choir of Power" be not altogether incorrect, the Trades Union is the most powerful organization in England, and that is politically under the control of republican ideas. It is the consciousness of this enormous impending force in British politics that caused Mr. LOWE to cry out for instant and universal education, and it is the same consciousness that has already led to the vast enrollment and organization of volunteers. The English volunteers of to-day are the National Guard of the Bourgeoisie in LOUIS PHILIPPE'S time in France.

It doubtless, also, in surveying the field and calculating of an alliance, Mr. DISRAELI does not wish to trust his place to an election in which this new force is to be legally and officially felt for the first time. The Prime Minister knows that he does not deceive the English "people," as the artisan and agricultural classes of the population are called, any more than Democratic politicians deceive the freedmen among us. He is not their man. He counts, indeed, upon ignorance, like all Tory chiefs, as his slave masters did in this country, and as their successors, the Tammany managers, do. He hopes, undoubtedly, that the "No Popery" cry will be of signal service to him. As the Democratic or Tory papers in this country ten years ago used to call Mr. SEWARD'S statements of self-evident political and social propositions a "brutal and bloody programme" of dissolving the Union and subverting the Constitution, so the British Tory interest attacks Mr. GLADSTONE'S bill for the abolition of the Irish Church system as an assault upon the foundations of the Constitution itself. The key-note of the Tory campaign in the elections was struck by DISRAELI in his reply to the Protestant deputation from Ireland. He said that the interests of the whole kingdom were involved in the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The blow struck in Ireland would in due time be leveled against the institutions of Great Britain. It was only fear that the people [namely, the present voters] should decide whether the British Constitution should be subverted that the revolution accomplished. The Ministry had therefore resolved to dissolve Parliament. The deputation was satisfied, and the contest will now begin.

But the success or failure of DISRAELI as Prime Minister is an unimportant question compared with the clear and vital one, whether reform in England can move so rapidly and wisely as to avoid revolution. The political institutions of England are perilously far from embodying the political convictions of the people. The task of the statesman, therefore, is to bring them into proper and satisfactory relations. But this involves a bold and swift policy for which the conservative class of hereditary holders of power is hardly prepared. While the Queen lives there is likely to be no very serious disturbance of public order; but the best informed men in England doubtless know that the success of such a king as the Prince of Wales would be regarded as a powerful and organized class as a national disaster.

A WORD WITH THE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

WE trust that General FRANKLIN and the other soldiers who are to meet in convention to support the nominations made by the Tammany Convention will not forget to preface their attitude during the war of the party which they commend to the sympathy of the country. It is to reply to them that the war is over, and that brave soldiers do not fight when resistance ceases.

The question to be decided, and upon which the Cooper Institute Convention of soldiers and sailors will pronounce, is, which party is most likely to secure the results obtained by the war? No party will dare openly to speak as a section, although the Republican party is unwilling to trust the disaffected portion of the Southern population with exclusive political power, while the Democratic party declares that the friends and allies of the Union soldiers during the war shall now be entirely subordinated to their enemies. But the soldiers and sailors about to assemble really believe that the party of which VALLANDIGHAM, PENDLETON, and SEYMOUR are recognized leaders, and whose policy is represented by their leadership, is a party unfit of the sympathy of Union soldiers? Let us look back a little.

In the summer of 1864 the great final campaigns were prosecuted. GRANT in Virginia, and SHERMAN in Georgia and the Carolinas, were moving toward victory. But the hour of triumph was delayed. The public expectation, which had been very eager, was disappointed. Weeks and months passed, and still the contest continued. How stern and long the trouble was no one knew so well as the soldiers themselves. For three years it had lasted, and during the three years what had been the attitude of the party from which some soldiers and sailors now propose to support?

The great Democratic meeting in Philadelphia in January, 1861, denounced, in the name of the party, "Fratricidal War" against the "seceded." And a month later the Democratic State Convention of Pennsylvania resolved to oppose "any armed aggression upon the Southern States." This was the spirit of all the party papers and speakers, especially of HORATIO SEYMOUR at Tweddle Hall, until the fall of Sumter rendered for a time the loud expression of sympathy with rebellion.

But in April, 1864, when a motion was offered in your SR. HARRIS, of Maryland, from the House of Representatives in Albany, to pray upon the floor, expressed the hope that "God Almighty would never permit the Government to subdue the South," every member but one voted against it.

At the Chicago Democratic Convention of 1864 the resolution drawn by VALLANDIGHAM, the most conspicuous Copperhead in the country, asserting the war to be a failure, was made part of the party declaration of faith. As he said afterward, the Convention meant peace and it said so. The individual expressions of Democrats of every kind were in the same strain. One asked, "Isn't it time that this infernal war should stop?" Or, "Is there any reason DAVIS or ABRAHAM LINCOLN?" HORATIO SEYMOUR, then Governor of New York, scarcely veiled his threats against the enforcement of the draft, by writing to the President: "The temper of the people to-day you can readily learn." The NEW YORK Leader, which was called a "Union" Democratic journal, assessed the Government with resistance if it pressed its raising men by draft to serve with you, soldiers, in the army. Mr. SWACKHAMER said that the country was tired and sick of calls for more men. JAMES BROOKS cried, "No more fighting; fighting will never restore the Union." Judge DALY thought that there was "a possibility of peace and a preservation of the Union through a compromise." In a word, while you were in the field, and still victory was delayed, and the only hope of the country and of free popular government lay in the moral support of the country, in its unshrinking faith in the good cause, and in the men which it sent forward to you at the front, the Democratic party was carrying on a political campaign in your rear, for the success of which the rabid rebel journals openly prayed, and for the result of which, had it been successful, the rebel army and the Andersonville jailers would have sung "Te Deum."

Mayor GUNTHER, in the proud autumn of 1864, refused to rejoice over your victories. Do you suppose they were welcome to the patriotism of those who elected him? How does this party propose to secure those victories? By roaring about State rights, and delivering your allies of every color and kind to ex-rebels. How does it honor the war? By the foulest abuse of the General of the Armies. Have you changed, or the party whose organ called Hessians and bullwings? Which do you believe will more truly secure the prosperity of the Union—those who thought it worth a war, or those who, with HORATIO SEYMOUR, thought and said that the Union might fall rather than slavery?

THE NEW MINISTER TO ENGLAND.

THE President could hardly have expected the Senate to confirm the nomination of General M'CLELLAN as Minister to England. To nominate him was a very cheap way of propitiating the Democratic party. The action of the Senate, however, in the prompt confirmation of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON was an honorable tribute to the personal respect in which he is held, and an evidence of willingness not to insist upon a difference at every point with the Executive. Some months ago, in speaking of the retirement of Mr. ADAMS, we mentioned Mr. JOHNSON as the best of the several persons among whom the President was likely to choose. It is a very much better selection than we had a right to expect; but it is still to be doubted if a spirited than a different representative could not now be sent to England. Not certainly for any personal consideration. Mr. JOHNSON has the demeanor of a gentleman, of conceded ability, of ripe and various information, and of an habitual courtesy, which is the earnest of the most dignified official intercourse with the English Government. If the only points to be considered were personal fitness and intellectual accomplishment, the United States could have no better minister in England than Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON.

But a minister is not merely a diplomatic agent in these days that is only an ornamental minuportant of his functions. He is an influence, and he should therefore be a representative. But Mr. JOHNSON is not a representative of the conscience, the principles, and the sympathies which now control the United States Government. The real service of a minister is in the manner in which he affects the public opinion of the country in which he resides, and still more the private opinion which moulds its official foreign action. When the rebellion began Mr. JOHN SLIDELL was United States minister to England, and Mr. FAULKNER in France, and JEREMIAH BLACK was Secretary of State. Mr. DALLAS was an old political ally of the slaveholders and originators. His views of the situation were all necessarily influenced by that fact. Officially he remonstrated against the recognition of the Confederate belligerency. How heartily he must have done it it is not difficult to imagine. Mr. FAULKNER was a Virginian Democrat. His superior was JEREMIAH BLACK, who held that States had the right to secede, but that the United States had no right to prevent secession. Mr. FAULKNER's dispatch in reply to the order to prevent the recognition of the Confederacy, remarked that "coercion" was contrary to "the genius of our institutions." Naturally Mr. FAULKNER remained there representing the Government of the United States to rebel against it. Both these ministers were of the State-rights school. They believed implicitly in the divine right of slavery. They did not believe in the constitutionality of coercion. They undoubtedly supposed the result to be a foregone conclusion. Had Mr. ADAMS been in the place of Mr. DALLAS, and Mr. DAYTON in that of Mr. FAULKNER, the inner social opinion both of England and France would have been very different, and their action, out of which the Alabama and similar troubles sprang, would have been delayed. For both the new ministers represented the new and liberty-loving spirit which had at last come into power.

Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON holds very much the same relation to the really dominant sentiment of the country now that Messrs. DALLAS and FAULKNER held eight years ago. He was, indeed, a Union man; he even supported emancipation, and he acquiesced in the reconstruction policy without approving it. But for two years he has been steadily identified with the Democratic opposition, and has furnished it all the arguments it has had. He was bred in a Slave State among aristocratic traditions, and he has never shown that he was in the least touched or inspired by that generous faith in the expediency as well as justice of equal political and civil rights, which is the corner-stone of the new America. Consequently, therefore, his tone must be one of distrust. He can not inspire a confidence he does not feel. He must necessarily fail in the chief office of an American minister in England, which is to impress English opinion with the conviction that the settlement of our difficulties is the result of a purpose as earnest and as compelling as those which conquered the rebellion and destroyed slavery. How different the effect and how much more serviceable toward a true international intelligence was that like Mr. MOTLEY, for instance, were our Minister in England!

A LOCK, STOCK, AND BARREL WANTED.

THE condition of the Democratic party, in view of its approaching National Convention, ought to be enough to satisfy the country whether it can safely be intrusted with the government. When a great party, in a free country, questions the principles and opposes the policy of its opponent, maintains a vigorous criticism, and demands power in order to prove that its own principles and policy would more surely secure the public welfare, it occupies a position which is at least consistent, and in a moment of fatigue or doubt or disgust may succeed in supplanting its adversary. But when a party says that it does not exactly know whether it has any principles, and can not determine with its representatives in Congress whether that it had better acquiesce in the policy of its opponent as a settled result, and the next that it had better do no such thing, it offers a ludicrous and contemptible spectacle.

That is precisely the position of the Democratic party. It does not know whether to fight or retreat or surrender. It does not resolve whether a radical Republican or a peace Copperhead is its better candidate. It can not decide whether to declare the question of reconstruction closed, or to keep it open for quiet in our history, and the Democratic party can not make up its mind what to think about it. Lest autumn it triumphantly shouted that the great result of the election in October was whether the points shall be conceded against which it declared the reaction to be directed. Its Convention meets in a week, and it does not know whether its inspiration shall be relentless hostility to the war as a wicked outrage, or approval of it as a necessary exercise of legitimate authority.

Is this a party to be intrusted with the government of this country? With whatever candidate and whatever professions it may enter upon the election, it is clear that no wholly thoughtful and sensible men will give their support? Whatever a man's previous respect for the ability and character of Mr. CHASE, we wish to vote for him if Mr. CHASE were willing to receive the nomination of a convention which seriously entertained Mr. PENDLETON as the coming candidate? If Mr. CHASE, with the confident by hundreds of thousands of votes reluctantly cast for him, but which would have been joyfully thrown for HENDRICKS, or PORTER, or VALLANDIGHAM, or even PENDLETON is merely a substitute—could not be independent of those votes, nor of the policy and tendency which they represent, then there is no hope of a political tergiversation which is incredible, namely, a renunciation of his Republican views to obtain a Democratic nomination, and then a betrayal of the Democratic party, which, if it would, of course, be a party President, and dispense his patronage like other Presidents. Whoever voted for him would vote to place the administration of the government in the hands of Democratic politicians, and, of course, for the promotion of Democratic views and policies.

If that is a desirable result to the Democracy of the Democratic party, as the country knows it by most tragical experience, would tend to the speedy restoration of the Union upon enduring principles, then we can conceive why a Republican might think that he ought to vote for Mr. CHASE as a Democratic candidate. But if we asked honestly what reason that vote we began, whether a party that has not yet made up its mind whether Mr. CHASE or Mr. PENDLETON is its true representative, can safely be trusted with the government and with the final settlement of the Southern question, he would probably conclude that Mr. CHASE, as a Democratic President, would do precisely what Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR or ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS would do—namely, carry out the policy upon which his party might decide.

It seems to us that any candid man must admit that a party which has certain fixed and proved principles, and a policy of restoration already in successful operation that has killed all the evil anguries of its enemies in regard to it —a party which has nominated a candidate of the highest renown as a civil and soldier, under whose command the Un - citizens suppressed unconditionally a vast, cruel, and causeless rebellion, and as a man remarkable for sagacity, moderation, integrity, honesty, and fidelity—a party which did not hesitate to destroy slavery to win the victory, nor to establish equal suffrage to secure the fruits of victory, is a party which deserves the cordial support of every citizen who wishes that the scar of the war may rapidly disappear, and the future of the country be founded upon the only just, sensible, and American policy. While a party which, within a week of its Presidential nomination, has no common conviction, and no political policy, and is distracted among candidates who represent radically hostile and irreconcilable principles, is merely a body of conspirators, torn with doubt whether they can best secure possession of the church plate by piously kneeling, and as seeming worshipers waiting their opportunity of plunder, or by boldly bursting in and revealing their true character as desperate robbers.

WEAK INVENTIONS.

THE campaign against General GRANT has thus far been conducted by saying that he is no soldier, and that his name is HIRAM; that Galena is his home; that he is running on a very stupid falsehoods. Whether the General is guilty of the name of HIRAM is a point which may be safely left to his enemies to settle. Whether he is a soldier those enemies who have a right to an opinion, for instance, BUCKNER at Donelson, FEMBERTON at Vicksburg, BRAGG at Chattanooga, and Lee in Virginia, have probably made up their minds. If they have not, the rest of his countrymen have.

As for Mr. COLFAX's offenses, the first, namely, that he supported the soldiers, is charged by the organs of the party that denounced the war as wicked and the soldiers as hirelings, while the Speaker was always most conspicuous among the eminent supporters of the cause and friends of the army. It did not need his naturally indignant denial of so bald a slander to expose it at once. The other allegation is that he is hostile to foreigners. But the truth is, that Mr. COLFAX has shown himself more friendly to the Fenian movement than almost all of our public men, and so well known is his sympathy for the just rights of all men, of whatever land they may chance to be native, that he has always attracted the average vote of his party in parts of his State where the party election prevails. Those who know Mr. COLFAX will smile at this kind of feeble invention; for if his political opponents did not forbid any such feeling upon his part, his political sagacity would prevent the expression of it. The enemy must try again.

MR. CHASE AND THE SUFFRAGE.

Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR is reported to favor the nomination of Mr. CHASE, and to have said in a party caucus: "As to negro suffrage he is willing to leave the question entirely to the States, where we claim it belongs."

We have elsewhere shown that Mr. CHASE, in his letter of May 25 of this year, reiterates his devotion to the principle of equal suffrage, and hopes that the Democratic party will take care to secure it in the Southern States. But in a speech to a political people, delivered in Charleston, South Carolina, on the 12th of May, 1865, Mr. CHASE expressed his views in regard to the establishment of negro suffrage by the National Government.

He said: "If the Government of the United States, taking every thing into consideration, shall not think it proper to enroll all the colored men as citizens and voters, what is your duty? To fret and worry about it? I think not. If I were in your case, I would go to work, and show that the United States Government was mistaken in making the delay. If you show that the mistake will be corrected."

These are not the words of a man who doubts the right and power of the National Government to regulate suffrage in the disordered States. They show that he merely doubts whether Congress is quite as deeply convinced of the right and policy as he is, and they were spoken with a view to the Radical nomination for the Presidency. A Democratic paper in Georgia, the Brunswick Banner, reminding the colored people of the antecedents of Mr. CHASE, asks: "To whom at the North do the colored people owe more than to Mr. CHASE? To him mainly is due their emancipation and the suffrage they possess."

When Mr. SEYMOUR says, as reported, therefore, that Mr. CHASE is willing to leave the question entirely to the States, does he mean that he was opposed to Congressional enfranchisement? But Mr. CHASE's words and whole record show that he was not. Does Mr. SEYMOUR mean, then, that hereafter the Chief Justice is in favor of leaving the suffrage to the States? But the Republican platform takes no other ground. It says, with Mr. CHASE, that the public safety, as well as gratitude and justice, demanded that Congress should give the ballot to every loyal man in the unreconstructed States, while in all the loyal States the question properly belongs to the people.

So far as his views upon this subject are concerned, therefore, Mr. CHASE is no more a desirable candidate for the opponents of reconstruction upon equal rights than any other radical; and should he accept their nomination it must necessarily be at the expense of the public respect for his character.

"TRICKS UPON TRAVELERS."

We have received the following note, which we publish with pleasure, and without any desire to continue a controversy as to the comparative accuracy of memory of the buyer and seller of the ticket in question—a point upon which, of course, we have not changed our opinion. It is enough that, by the wise action of the Company, the chance of a similar difficulty is hereafter to be avoided.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, NEW YORK, June 20, 1868.

"To the Editor of "Harper's Weekly":

"The issue of your paper of June 13, 1868, contains an editorial article headed "Tricks upon Travelers," when does injustice to this office and the Company which I represent; and I respectfully request the publication of the following explanation of the case referred to. The difficulty we caused wholly by a misunderstanding between the ticket-seller and the purchaser as to what constituted a state-room. The question in dispute was of particular consequence, the interior subdivided into five compartments, represented by two state-rooms at the extreme ends, the sleeping berths and three compartments containing four seats; these rooms are about the same size, and the middle ones have more space between the berths. A certain is dropped in the centre of each compartment or state-room, with an entrance door common to both rooms. My agent sold to the gentleman one side of an end room, and claims that he so informed him. There was not the slightest wish on my part to deceive the purchaser, and no one regrets the circumstance more than we do. This is the first case that has occurred within my knowledge since these cars have been running where any dissatisfaction has been expressed by passengers. It was to furnish the best facilities possible for the comfort and convenience of the public, and think we have done as to the best.

"To avoid the recurrence in the future of any similar difficulty, only complete state-rooms or compartments will hereafter be sold. The cars will leave at 9½ Broadway; and the disposal of berths, or parts of rooms, will be left with the conductor of the car after the passengers have started. J. L. ELLIOTT,

"Agent Pennsylvania Railroad Company."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

THE Currency bill passed the Senate on June 17. It limits the circulation of the National Banks to $356,000,000, to be secured by deposits with the United States Treasurer of United States bonds to the extent of ninety per cent. of the circulation.

The Senate on June 19 refused to give American registry to the bark Golden Fleece, which adopted British colors during the war, and desired to fly under American again. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce stated that he would be the vote were taken the decision of the Senate in this case would be accepted as instructive to the Secretary with regard to foreign number of other vessels similarly situated. The bill was finally decided against, the vote being 26 to 20.

The Senate on June 20 passed over the President's veto the bill to admit to the Senate, on June 22, by a vote of 40 to 1, and 2 not voting. All the members of the Confederate delegation from the reconstructed State took their seats.

A. S. Welch is the Florida Senator elect for the term ending March 4, 1869. T. W. Osborn is the Senator elect for the term ending 1871.

Judge Ingraham, of the Supreme Court, has wisely denied the motion of several Fenian prisoners to put upon keepers for injunctions restraining the Superintendent of Police from placing officers in front of the premises to warn persons from entering them. It is hoped that the Court will continue to frown down all such acts of impudence.

Ex-Rebel Colonel M'Curtz, in an altercation at Russellville, Kentucky, shot and killed Major Lawrence, of the United States army, commanding at that post.

Governor Humphreys, of Mississippi, and his Attorney-General, Hooker, have been removed from office, and General ADELBERT AMES and Colonel Charles Caspar Myer, both army officers, have been appointed in their places.

Twenty-eight persons are in prison in Atlanta, Georgia, charged with complicity in the late case of murder.

The Canadian Zouaves who joined the Papal army are reported to be enduring great privations.

FOREIGN NEWS.

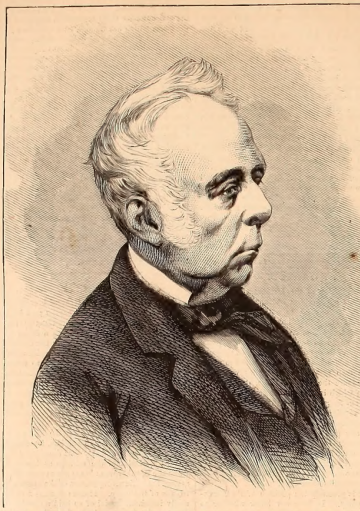
THE siege of Port au Prince, Hayti, continued on June 16. The revolutionists had possession of the suburbs of the town, and were waiting the arrival of reinforcements. Salnave, the President, commanded in the city.

Nova Scotia is dissatisfied with Confederation. A delegation from that province is to secede from it. The subject is now engaging the attention of the British Parliament.

The various churches—Catholics and Protestants—in the Turkish Empire, have engaged lately in writing and tendering thanks to the Sultan for the edict of toleration which has been issued, the substance of which we have published. Lately a delegation of the heads of the churches in Constantinople waited upon him, and in the course of a brief speech by each, declared that the principal object of their visit would be to express their gratitude and the prosperity of the civilization of his Empire and the prosperity of the people; that he made no distinction between his Mussulman and Christian subjects; that, by appointing functionaries to the new Council appertaining to different creeds, it was with the object of shielding the interests of all his subjects, and to make them participate equally in the administration of the country."

There is cholera at Mecca.

THE CHICAGO SAENGERFEST.



THE Convention of the German Saengerfest Societies of the country was held this year at Chicago, Illinois, commencing on June 17, and continuing until June 20. The concerts were given in the Wabash Avenue Skating Rink, the interior of which we illustrate on this page.

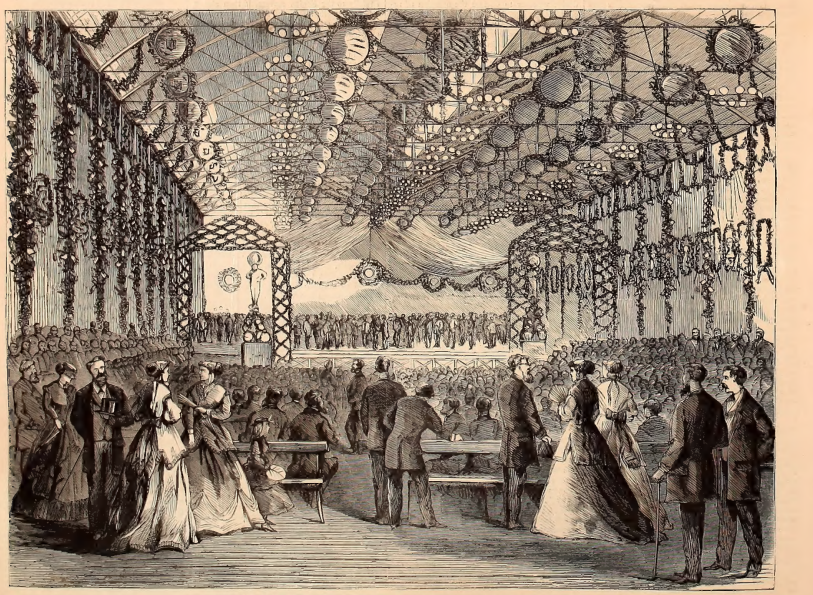
The performances of the four days embraced three grand concerts, in which an orchestra of 150 performers and a chorus of 500 voices engaged, a torch-light procession of several thousand persons, delegates and citizens, numerous Glee Club concerts at various halls in the city, two grand balls, and a picnic on the Sunday following the last day of the Convention.

HON. REVERDY JOHNSON.

SHORTLY after the resignation of MR. ADAMS as Minister to the Court of St. James, President JOHNSON nominated General GEORGE B. MCLELLAN for that position. The nomination was in such bad taste, and the nominee so evidently incapable of filling the office, at a time when such important arbitration as the settlement of the Alabama claims was pending between England and the United States, that the Senate promptly rejected the nomination. On JUNE 12, however, the President made the more judicious nomination of Hon. REVERDY JOHNSON, and the Senate unanimously confirmed the nomination without the usual form of reference to a committee. This was more out of respect to the high personal character and eminent abilities of Mr. JOHNSON than satisfaction with the political principles held and advocated by him. The President, had he been disposed, might have nominated a man more acceptable in this regard to the Senate and the country, but hardly one of greater ability or higher character than the gentleman who is now our Minister to England.

Mr. JOHNSON is a native of Annapolis, Maryland, and is now seventy-two years of age. He was educated in St. John's College, Annapolis, until seventeen years of age, when he began the study of law in his father's office. He entered national political life in 1845, when he was chosen a Senator from Maryland. He resigned in 1849 to accept the position of Attorney-General during the Taylor administration. He resigned on the accession of MR. FILLMORE, and resumed the practice of law. He was a delegate to the Peace Congress of 1861. When the Southern States seceded in the same year he remained a loyal man, and as such was re-elected to the Senate in 1863 for the term ending in 1869.

HON. REVERDY JOHNSON, OF MARYLAND.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON.]



Although elected as a Democrat, he voted on several important measures—such as the Emancipation Amendment of 1864 and the Reconstruction Act of 1866—with the Republicans. He has served for years on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and is intimately acquainted with that branch of the national service. He fully agrees with the views of the Government on the intricate questions with England, and will probably pursue, under the same policy and general instructions, the work so well conducted heretofore by MR. ADAMS.

NEW YORK YACHT CLUB.

THE annual regatta of the New York Yacht Club was to have taken place on June 16, but owing to the absence of all wind—an indispensable requisite on all such excursions—there was no regatta. The contesting yachts certainly made a very handsome start—which we illustrate on page 428—and went to sea, as also did a great many steamers, and tugs, and pleasure-boats filled with interested spectators; but the time made by the yachts was so slow that, by the rules of the Club, the contest was pronounced "no race." The White Wing in advance, and one or two other sloops some distance behind, turned the light-ship off Sandy Hook, but the majority of the vessels which entered and started gave up the contest early in the afternoon, and returned to the stake-boat to await orders and a fair breeze.

The race was resumed next day, but only a small number of boats entered, and the sport was not exciting.

Our illustrations on page 428 represent the start, showing the several yachts getting under way, and a view of the new Club-house of the Association. For some years past the New York Yacht Club has been occupying a Club-house at Hoboken, belonging to Commodore STEVENS. They have lately bought a property near Clifton, Staten Island, and in the course of the three weeks during which they have been in possession have altered and improved it into the shape and condition indicated in our engraving. It overlooks the Narrows, the favorite starting-point of the Club, and is one of the most picturesque spots on picturesque Staten Island. From the Club-house lawn the whole of the Upper Bay may be seen, the eye taking in the lower part of New York and Brooklyn. Our view, however, is taken from the New York side of the house, and looking out to sea. From this view the spectator has full sight of Forts Hamilton, Lafayette, Diamond, Richmond, and all the defenses of the Narrows, and the entrance to New

THE GERMAN SAENGERFEST SOCIETIES IN WABASH AVENUE RINK, CHICAGO.
[SKETCHED BY W. B. BAIRD.]

York harbor, with the full stretch of the Lower Bay and a distant view of Sandy Hook. No more appropriate or more beautiful site could have been selected for the Club-house. It is but a short distance from the Lower (or Vanderbilt) landing of the Staten Island ferry-boats, and therefore easy of access to privileged visitors. The grounds are open to members and invited guests.

(Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER IX.

THE doctor's pretty house-maid stood waiting for me, with the street-door open in her hand. Pouring brightly into the hall, the morning light fell full on the face of Mr. Candy's assistant when I turned and looked at him.

It was impossible to dispute Betteredge's assertion that the appearance of Ezra Jennings, speaking from the popular point of view, was against him. His gipsy-complexion, his fleshless cheeks, his gaunt facial bones, his dreamy eyes, his extraordinary parti-colored hair, the puzzling contradiction between his face and figure which made him look old and young both together—were all more or less calculated to produce an unfavorable impression of him on a stranger's mind. And yet—feeling this as I certainly did—it is not to be denied that Ezra Jennings made some inscrutable appeal to my sympathies, which I found it impossible to resist. While my knowledge of the world warned me to answer the question which he had put, by acknowledging that I did indeed find Mr. Candy sadly changed, and then to proceed on my way out of the house —my interest in Ezra Jennings held me rooted to the place, and gave him the opportunity of speaking to me in private about his employer, for which he had been evidently on the watch.

"Are you walking my way, Mr. Jennings?" I said, observing that he held his hat in his hand. "I am going to call on my aunt, Mrs. Ablewhite."

Ezra Jennings replied that he had a patient to see, and that he was walking my way.

We left the house together. I observed that the pretty servant girl—who was all smiles and amiability when I wished her good-morning on my way out—received a modest little message from Ezra Jennings, relating to the time at which he might be expected to return, with pursed-up lips and with eyes which ostentatiously looked any where rather than look in his face. The poor wretch was evidently a favorite in the house. Out of the house, I had Betteredge's word for it that he was unpopular every where. "What a life!" I thought to myself as we descended the doctor's door-steps.

Having already referred to Mr. Candy's illness on his visit, Ezra Jennings now appeared determined to leave it to me to resume the subject. His silence said, significantly, "It's your turn now." I, too, had my reasons for referring to the doctor's illness, and I readily accepted the responsibility of speaking first.

"Judging by the change I see in him," I began, "Mr. Candy's illness must have been far more serious than I had supposed?"

"It is almost a miracle," said Ezra Jennings, "that he lived through it."

"Is his memory never any better than I have found it to-day? He has been trying to speak to me—"

"Of something which happened before he was taken ill?" asked the assistant, observing that I hesitated.

"Yes."

"His memory of events at that past time is hopelessly enfeebled," said Ezra Jennings. "It is almost to be deplored, poor fellow, that even the wreck of it remains. While he remembers dimly plans that he formed—things, here and there, that he had to say or do before his illness —he is perfectly incapable of recalling what the plans were, or what the thing was that he had to say or do. He is painfully conscious of his own deficiency, and painfully anxious, as you must have seen, to hide it from observation. If he could only be persuaded in a compliant state, of oblivion as to the past, he would have been a happier man. Perhaps we should all be happier," he added, with a sad smile, "if we could but completely forget!"

"There are some events surely in all men's lives," I replied, "the memory of which they would be unwilling entirely to lose?"

"That is, I hope, to be said of most men, Mr. Blake. I am afraid it can not truly be said of all. Have you any reason to suppose that the lost remembrance which Mr. Candy tried to recover—while you were speaking to him just now —was a remembrance which it was important to you that he should recover?"

In saying those words he had touched, of his own accord, on the very point upon which I was anxious to consult him. The interest I felt in this strange man had impelled me, in the first instance, to give him the opportunity of speaking to me, reserving what I might have to say on my side in relation to his employer until I was first satisfied that he was a person in whose delicacy and discretion I could trust. The little that he had said thus far had been sufficient to convince me that I was speaking to a gentleman. He had what I may venture to describe as the watchful self-possession which is a sure sign of good-breeding, not in England only, but every where else in the civilized world. Whatever the object which he had in view in putting the question that he had just addressed to me, I felt no doubt that I was justified—so far—in answering him without reserve.

"I believe I have a strong interest," I said, "in tracing the lost remembrance which Mr. Candy was unable to recall. May I ask whether you can suggest to me any method by which I might assist his memory?"

Ezra Jennings looked at me, with a sudden flash of interest in his dreamy brown eyes.

"Mr. Candy's memory is beyond the reach of assistance," he said. "I have tried to help it often enough since his recovery to be able to speak positively on that point."

This disappointed me; and I owned it.

"I confess you led me to hope for a less discouraging answer than that," I said.

Ezra Jennings smiled. "It may not perhaps be a final answer, Mr. Blake. It may be possible to trace Mr. Candy's lost recollection without the necessity of appealing to Mr. Candy himself."

"Indeed? Is it an indiscretion on my part to ask—how?"

"By no means. My only difficulty in answering your question is the difficulty of explaining the story that it entails. He had suffered as few men suffer; and there was the mixture of some foreign race in his English blood.

"You have heard, I dare say, of the original cause of Mr. Candy's illness?" he resumed. "The night of Lady Verinder's dinner party was a night of many ruin. My employer drove home through it in his gig, and reached the house wetted to the skin. He found an urgent message from a patient waiting for him, and he most unfortunately went at once to visit the sick person without stopping to change his clothes. I was myself professionally detained that night by a case at some distance from Frizinghall. When I got back the next morning I found Mr. Candy's groom waiting in great alarm to take me to his master's room. By that time the mischief was done: the illness had set in."

"The illness has only been described to me, in general terms, as a fever," I said.

"I can add nothing which will make the description more accurate," answered Ezra Jennings. "From first to last the fever assumed no specific form. I sent at once to two of Mr. Candy's medical friends in the town, both physicians, to come and give me their opinion of the case. They agreed with me that it looked serious; but they both strongly dissented from the view I took of the treatment. We differed entirely in the conclusions which we drew from

"HAVE YOU EVER BEEN ACCUSTOMED TO THE USE OF OPIUM?"

myself. May I trust to your patience if I refer once more to Mr. Candy's illness; and if I speak of it this time without sparing you certain professional details?"

"Pray go on! You have interested me already in hearing the details."

My eagerness seemed to amuse—perhaps I might rather say, to please him. He smiled again. We had by this time left the last houses in the town behind us. Ezra Jennings stopped for a moment and picked some wild flowers from the hedge by the road-side. "How beautiful they are!" he said, simply, showing his little nosegay to me. "And how few people in England seem to admire them as they deserve!"

"You have not always been in England?" I said.

"No. I was born and partly brought up in one of the Asiatic dependencies of our English man, but my mother—We are straying my way from our subject, Mr. Blake; and it is my fault. The truth is, I have associated with those most-wet little hedge-side flowers—It doesn't matter; we were speaking of Mr. Candy. To Mr. Candy let us return."

Connecting the few words about himself which thus reluctantly escaped him with the melancholy view of life which led him to place the conditions of human happiness in complete oblivion of the past, I felt satisfied that the story which I had read in his face was, in two particulars at least, the patient's pulse. The two doctors, arguing from the rapidity of the beat, declared that a lowering treatment was the only treatment to be adopted. On my side, I admitted the rapidity of the pulse, but I also pointed to its alarming feebleness as indicating an exhausted condition of the system, and as showing a plain necessity for the administration of stimulants. The two doctors were for keeping him on gruel, lemonade, barley-water, and so on. I was for giving him Champagne or brandy, ammonia, and quinine. A serious difference of opinion, as you see! a difference between two physicians of established local repute, and a stranger who was only an assistant in the house. For the first few days I had no choice but to give way to my elders and betters; the patient steadily sinking all the time. I made a second attempt to appeal to the plain, undeniable plain, evidence of the pulse. He rapidly was wrecked, and its feebleness had increased. The two doctors took offense at my obstinacy. They said, Mr. Jennings, either we manage this case, or you manage it. Which is it to be? I said, 'Gentlemen, give me five minutes to consider, and that plain question shall have a plain reply.' When the time had expired I was ready with my answer. I said, 'You positively refuse to try the stimulant treatment?' They refused in so many words. 'I mean to try it at once, gentlemen.' —'Try it, Mr. Jennings, and we withdraw from the case.' I sent down to the cellar for a bottle of Champagne; and I administered half a tumblerful of it to the patient with my own hand. The two physicians took up their hats in silence, and left the house.

"You had assumed a serious responsibility," I said. "In your place, I am afraid I should have shrunk from it."

"In my place, Mr. Blake, you would have remembered that Mr. Candy had taken you into his employment, under circumstances which made you his debtor for life. In my place, you would have seen him sinking hour by hour; and you would have risked any thing rather than let the one man on earth who had befriended you die before your eyes. Don't suppose that I had no sense of the terrible position in which I had placed myself! There were moments when I felt all the worth of my friendlessness, all the peril of my dreadful responsibility. If I had been a happy man, if I had led a prosperous life, I believe I should have sunk under the task I had imposed on myself. But I had no future time to look back at, no past peace of mind to force itself into contrast with my present anxiety and suspense—and I held firm to my conviction through it all. I took an interval in the middle of the day, when my patient's condition was at its best, for the repose I needed. For the rest of the four-and-twenty hours, as long as his life was in danger, I never left his bedside. Toward sunset, as usual in such cases, the delirium incidental to the fever came on. It lasted more or less through the night, and then intervened at that terrible time in the early morning—from two o'clock to five—when the vital energies even of the healthiest of us are at their lowest. It is then that Death gathers in his human harvest most abundantly. It was then that Death and I fought our fight over the bed, which should have the man who lay on it. I never hesitated in pursuing the treatment on which I had staked every thing. When wine failed I tried brandy. When the other stimulants lost their influence I doubled the dose. After an interval of suspense —the like of which I hope to God I shall never feel again—there came a day when the rapidity of the pulse slightly, but appreciably, diminished; and, better still, there came also a change in the beat—an unmistakable change to steadiness and strength. Then I knew that I had saved him; and then I own I broke down. I laid the poor fellow's wasted hand back on the bed, and burst out crying. An hysterical relief, Mr. Blake—nothing more! Physiology says, and says truly, that some men are born with female constitutions—and I am one of them!"

He made that bitterly professional apology for his tears, speaking quietly and unaffectedly, as he had spoken throughout. His tone and manner, from beginning to end, showed him to be especially, almost morbidly, anxious not to set himself up as an object of interest to me.

"You may well ask why I have wearied you with all these details?" he went on. "It is the only way I can see, Mr. Blake, of properly introducing to you what I have to say next. Now you know exactly what my position was at the time of Mr. Candy's illness, you will the more readily understand the sore need I had of lightening the burden on my weak shoulders at intervals, some sort of relief. I have had the presumption to occupy my leisure, for some years past, in writing a book, addressed to the members of my profession—a book on the intricate and delicate subject of the brain and the nervous system. My work will probably never be finished; and it will certainly never be published. It has none the less been the friend of many lonely hours; and it helped me to while away the anxious time—the time of waiting, and nothing else—at Mr. Candy's bedside. I told you he was delirious, I think? And I mentioned the time at which his delirium came on?"

"Yes."

"Well, I had reached a section of my book at that time which touched on this same question of delirium. I won't trouble you at any length with my theory on the subject—I will confine myself to telling you only what it is your present interest to know. It has often occurred to me in the course of my medical practice to doubt whether we can justifiably infer—in cases of delirium—that the loss of the faculty of speaking connectedly implies of necessity the loss of the faculty of thinking connectedly as well. Poor Mr. Candy's illness gave me the opportunity of putting this doubt to the test. I understand the art of writing in short-hand; and I was able to take down his wanderings, word for word, exactly as they fell from his lips. Do you see, Mr. Blake, what I am coming to at last?"

I saw it clearly, and waited with breathless interest to hear more.

"At odds and ends of time," Ezra Jennings went on, "I transcribed the notes I had taken in the ordinary form of writing—leaving large spaces between the broken phrases, and even the single words, which I had failed to comprehend. from Mr. Candy's lips. I then treated the result thus obtained on something like the principle which governs the putting together a child's 'puzzle.' It is all confusion to begin with; but it may be all brought into order and shape, if you can only find the right way. Acting on this plan, I filled in the blank spaces on the paper with what the words or phrases on either side of it suggested to me as the speaker's meaning; altering over and over again, until my additions followed naturally on the broken sentences which came before them, and fitted naturally into the spoken words which came after them. The result was that I not only occupied in this way many vacant and anxious hours, but that I arrived at something which was (as it seemed to me) a confirmation of the theory that I held. In plainer words, after putting the broken sentences together, I found the superior faculty of thinking going on, more or less connectedly, in my patient's mind, while the inferior faculty of expression was in a state of almost complete incapacity and confusion.

"One word!" I interposed, eagerly. "Did my name occur in any of his wanderings?"

"You shall hear, Mr. Blake. Among my written proofs of the assertion which I have just advanced—or, I ought to say, among the written experiments, tending to put my assertion to the proof—there is one, in which your name occurs. For nearly the whole of one night Mr. Candy's mind was occupied with somewhat hesitating himself and you. I have got the broken words, as they dropped from his lips, on one sheet of paper. And I have got the date of my own discovering, which connect those words together, on another sheet of paper. The previous use to the arithmetician would say) is an intelligible statement—first, of something actually done in the past; secondly, of something which Mr. Candy contemplated doing in the future, if his illness had not got in the way and stopped him. The question is whether this does, or does not, represent the lost recollection which he vainly attempted to find when you called on him this morning?"

"Not a doubt of it!" I answered. "Let us go back directly, and look at the papers!"

"Quite impossible, Mr. Blake."

"Why?"

"Put yourself in my position for a moment," said Ezra Jennings. "Would any doctor in another person what had dropped unconsciously from the lips of your suffering patient and your helpless friend, without first knowing whether he was a necessity to justify you in opening your lips?"

I felt that he was unanswerable here; but I tried to argue the question, nevertheless.

"My conduct in such a delicate matter as you describe," I said, "would depend entirely on whether the disclosure was of a nature to compromise my friend or not."

"I have not at all necessity for considering that side of the question, long since," said Ezra Jennings. "Wherever my notes included any thing which Mr. Candy might have wished to keep secret, those notes have been destroyed. My manuscript experiments at my friend's bedside, including those now which he wants, I have hesitated to communicate to others, if he had recovered the use of his memory. In your case I have every reason to suppose that my communication something which he actually wished to say to you—"

"And yet, you hesitate?"

"And yet, I hesitate. Remember the circumstances under which I obtained the information which I possess! Harmless as it is, I can not prevail upon myself to give it up to you, unless you first satisfy me that there is a reason for doing so. He was so miserably ill, Mr. Blake! and he was so helplessly dependent upon Me! Is it too much to ask, if I request you only to hint to me what your interest is in the lost recollection—or what you believe that lost recollection to be?"

To have answered him with the frankness which his language and his manner both claimed from me, would have been to commit myself to openly acknowledging that I was suspected of the theft of the Diamond. Strongly as Ezra Jennings had interested me first and last in my inquiries which I had felt in him, he had not overcome my unconquerable reluctance to disclose the degrading position in which I stood. I took refuge once more in the explanatory phrases with which I had prepared myself to meet the curiosity of strangers.

This time I had no reason to complain of a want of attention on the part of the person to whom I addressed myself. Ezra Jennings listened patiently, even anxiously, until I had done.

I am sorry to have raised your expectations, Mr. Blake, only to disappoint them," he said. "Throughout the whole period of Mr. Candy's illness, from first to last, not one word about the Diamond escaped his lips. The matter with which I found him concern you name has, I can assure you, no favorable significance, whatever with the loss or the recovery of Miss Verinder's jewel."

We arrived, as he said those words, at a place where the highway along which we had been walking branched off into two roads. One led to Mr. Candy's house, and the other to the moorland village some two or three miles off. Ezra Jennings stopped at the road which led to the village.

"My way lies in this direction," he said. "I am really and truly sorry, Mr. Blake, that I can be of no use to you."

His voice told me that he spoke sincerely. His soft brown eyes rested on me for a moment with a look of unmistakable interest. He bowed, and went, without another word, on his way to the village.

For a minute or more I stood and watched him, walking farther and farther away from me, carrying farther and farther away with him what I now firmly believed to be the clew of which he was in search. He turned, after walking on a little way, and looked back. Seeing me still standing at the place where we had parted, he stopped, as if doubting whether I might not wish to speak to him again. There was no time for me to reason out my own situation—to remind myself that I was losing my opportunity, at what might be the most important of my life, and all to flatter nothing more important than my own self-esteem! There was only time to call him back first, and to think afterward. I suspect I am one of the rashest of existing men. I called him back—and then I said to myself, "Now there is no help for it. I must tell him the truth!"

He retraced his steps directly. I advanced along the road to meet him.

"Mr. Jennings," I said, "I have not treated you quite fairly. My interest in tracing Mr. Candy's lost recollection is not the interest of recovering the Moonstone. A serious personal matter is at the bottom of my visit to Yorkshire. I have but one excuse for not having dealt frankly with you in this matter. It is more painful to me than I can say, to mention to any body what my position really is."

Ezra Jennings looked at me with the first appearance of embarrassment which I had seen in him yet.

"I have no right, Mr. Blake, and no wish," he said, "to intrude myself into your private affairs. Allow me to ask your pardon, on my side, for having (most unexpectedly) put you to a painful test."

"You have a perfect right," I rejoined, "to fix the test myself. My interest in really revealing what you heard at Mr. Candy's bedside. I understand and respect the delicacy which induces you to make this stipulation. I am ready to be taken into your confidence if I decline to admit you into mine? You ought to know, and you shall know why I am interested in discovering what Mr. Candy wanted to say to me. If I turn out to be mistaken in my anticipations, and if you prove unable to help me when you are really aware of what I want, I shall trust to your honor to keep my secret—and something tells me that I shall not trust in vain."

"Stop, Mr. Blake. I have a word to say, which must be said before you go any farther."

I looked at him inquiringly. The grave and some terrible emotion seemed to have seized him, and shaken him to the soul. His gipsy complexion had altered to a livid yellow; and his brown his eyes had suddenly become wild and glittering; his voice had dropped to a tone—low, stern, and resolute—which I should have heard for the first time. The latent resources in the man for good or for evil—it was hard at that moment to say which—looked up in him from their hiding-places to me with the suddenness of a flash of light.

"Before you place any confidence in me," he said, "you must, in justice to yourself, know, under what circumstances I have been received into Mr. Candy's house. It won't take long. I don't profess, Sir, to tell my story for the phrase is) to any man. My story will die with me. All I ask is to be permitted to tell you what I have told Mr. Candy. You will be still in the mind, when you have heard that, to question me on your own behalf—and you will command my attention and command my belief. Shall we walk on?"

The supreme misery in his face silenced me. I answered his question in a sign. We walked on.

After advancing a few hundred yards Ezra Jennings stopped at a gap in the rough stone wall which shut off the moor from the road at this part of it.

"Do you mind resting a little, Mr. Blake?" he asked. "I am not what I was—and some things shake me."

I agreed of course. He led the way through the gap to a patch of turf on the heathy ground, screened by bushes and dwarf trees on the side nearest to the road. Immediately before the opposite direction a gradually desolate view over the broad lower wilderness of the moor. The clouds had gathered while we walked. The light—the light was dull; the distance was dim. The lovely face of the country had no, soft and still and colorless—met us without a smile.

We sat down in silence. Ezra Jennings laid aside his hat, and passed his hand wearily over his forehead, wearily through his long gray curls and black hair. He tossed his little nosegay of wild flowers from him, as if the remembrances which it recalled were not remembrances which hurt him now.

"Mr. Blake!" he said, suddenly, "you are in bad company. The cloud of a horrible accusation has rested on me for years. I tell you the plain truth—I am not sure whose life is a wreck, and whose character is gone."

I attempted to speak. He stopped me.

"No," he said, "I am not mad—I am not yet. Don't commit yourself to expressions of sympathy which you may afterward wish to recall. I have received sympathy from one person, and one person only, since I first set foot in this country, the vile slander to which I have referred struck me down at once and forever. I resigned all further interest in my profession—obscurity was the only hope left for me. I sought it—I found it—I have lived—how could I condemn her to share the horror? A medical assistant's place offered itself, in a remote corner of England. I got the place. It promised me peace: it promised me obscurity: it as I thought. I was wrong. Evil report, with time and chance to help it, bravely patiently, and travels far. The accusation from which I had fled followed me. I got warning of its approach. I was able to leave my situation voluntarily, with the testimonials that I had earned. They got me another situation, in another remote district. Time passed again; and again the slander that was death to my character found me out. On this occasion I had no warning. My employer said, "Mr. Jennings, I have no complaint to make against you; but you must set yourself right, or leave me." I had but one choice—I left him. It's useless to dwell on what I suffered after that. I am only forty years old now. Look at my face, and let it tell for me the story of some miserable years. It ended in my drifting to this place, and meeting with Mr. Candy. He wanted an assistant. I referred him, on the question of capacity, to my last employer. The question of character remained. I told him what I have told you—and more. I warned him that there were difficulties in the way, even if he believed me. "Here, as elsewhere," I said, 'I scorn the guilty evasion of living under an assumed name: I am my own safer at Frizinghall than at other places from the cloud that follows me, go where I may.' He answered, 'I don't do things by halves—I believe you, and I pity you. If you will risk what may happen, I will risk it too.' God Almighty bless him! He has given me shelter, he has given me employment, he has given me rest of mind—and I have the certain conviction that I shall die for some months past) that nothing will happen now to make him regret it."

"The slander has died out?" I said.

"The slander is as active as ever. But when it follows me here it will come too late."

"You will have left Yorkshire?"

"No, Mr. Blake—I shall be dead. For ten years past I have suffered from an incurable internal complaint. I have a disease in my heart, which I should have let the agony of pain to that I long since but for one last interest in life, which makes my existence of some importance to me still. I want to provide for a person—very dear to me—whom I shall never see again. My own health patronage is not sufficient to make me independent of the world. The hope, if I could only live long enough, of increasing it to a certain sum, has been the motive to resist the attacks by such palliative means as I could devise. The one effectual palliative in my case, is—opium. Yes, that slow poison is all-merciful drug! I am indebted for a respite of many years from my sentence of death. But even the virtues of opium have their limits. The constancy of the disease has gradually forced me from the use of opium to the abuse of it. I am feeling the penalty at last. My nervous system is breaking up; my sleepless nights of horror. The end is not far off now. Let it come—I have not lived and worked in vain. The little money is nearly made up; and I have the means of completing it, if my last reserves of life fill me sooner than I expect. hardly leave it behind me. I commend into selling you this. I don't think I am mean enough to appeal to your pity. Perhaps, I fancy you may be all the sensible of the horrors of the slander that what I have said to you I have said with the certain knowledge in me that I am a dying man. There is no disgrace, Mr. Blake, that I will not confess to me. I have attempted to make my poor friend's loss of memory the means of bettering my own position. Is that in no excuse for my intruding myself on you? Perhaps there is some excuse. A man who has lived as I have lived has little self-respect remaining to lose in any human destiny. You have youth, health, riches, a place in the world, a prospect before you—you, and such as you, are in the sunny side of human life, and reconcile me with the world that I am leaving, before I go. However this talk may seem as may seem, do not forget that you have done me a kindness in doing that. It rests with you, Sir, to say what you proposed saying, or to withhold it forever."

I had but one answer to make to that appeal. Without a moment's hesitation I told him the truth, as unreservedly as I have told it in these pages.

He started to his feet, and looked at me with breathless eagerness as I approached the leading incident of my story.

"A certain thing I went into the room," I said; "it is of no use to me. I took the Diamond. I can only meet those two plain facts by declaring that, do what I might, I did it without my own knowledge." "I say believe that I have spoken the truth—"

Ezra Jennings caught me excitedly by the arm.

"Stop!" he said. "You have suggested more to me than you suppose. Have you ever been accustomed to the use of opium?"

"I never tasted it in my life."

"Were your nerves out of order at this time last year? Were you unusually restless and irritable?"

"Yes."

"Did you sleep badly?"

"Wretchedly. Many nights I never slept at all."

"Was the birthday night an exception? Try and remember. Did you sleep well on that occasion?"

"I do remember! I slept soundly."

He dropped my arm as suddenly as he had taken it—and looked at me with the air of a man whose mind was relieved of the last doubt that rested on it.

"This is a marked day in your life and in mine," he said, quietly. "I am absolutely certain, Mr. Blake, of one thing—I have got what Mr. Candy wanted to say to you, this morning. I have notes that I took at my patient's bedside. Wait! that is not all. I am firmly persuaded that I can prove you to have been unconscious of what you were about when you entered the room and took the Diamond. Give me time to think, and time to question you. I believe the vindication of your innocence is in my hands!"

"Explain yourself, for God's sake! What do you mean?"

In the excitement of our colloquy we had walked on a few steps beyond the clump of dwarf trees which had hitherto screened us from view. Before Ezra Jennings could answer me he was hailed from the high-road by a man, in great agitation, who had been evidently on the look-out for him.

"I am coming," he called back; "I am coming as fast as I can!" He turned to me. "There is an urgent case waiting for me at the village yonder; I ought to have been there half an hour since. I must attend to it at once. Give me two hours from this time, and call at Mr. Candy's again—and I will engage to be ready for you."

"How am I to wait?" I exclaimed, impatiently. "Can't you quiet my mind by a word of explanation before you go?"

"This is far too serious a matter to be explained in a hurry, Mr. Blake. I am not willingly trifling with your patience—I am only trying to your suppose if I attempted to relieve it as things are now. At Frizinghall, Sir, in two hours' time!"

The man on the high-road hailed him again. He hurried away and left me.

A LAKE OF PITCH.

The great sight of the West Indies is the Pitch Lake of Trinidad. The reef that formerly inclosed the little harbor has been all exported, for pitch, by an enterprising foreigner; but the lake remains. It is a vast strip inland from a pitch wharf—pitch is stored on it—you see pitch every where—the air is full of pitch—the connection is all on the price of pitch. A more dreary looking place I have never seen, and as a residence it is even worse than it looks. The few European officials live here for a few days at a time frequently, suffer acutely from fever and ague, and the remainder of the population, the modern Flowers, although they seem to have wonderfully adapted their color, like trout in a stream, to the locality in which they live, yet are unable to acclimatize themselves to the fatal atmosphere.

Declining the honor of a seat in a country cart drawn by bullocks, which was going up to the lake, we started on foot, as we had not to walk more than a mile from the shore. The first part of the road had unfortunately not been "improved" by the Warden; that is, a ditch had been dug on either side—a desirable thing in itself—and the mud, lumps of pitch and turf, had all been thrown into the middle of the road. Luckily, the Warden's energy or his money had not enabled him to carry his improvements far, and we soon came to the track in its original state: a river bed full of natural asphalt, pleasant to walk on, hard and springy. Leaving behind us the few scattered hovels that constitute the village—embedded in thickets of sun-surrounded by beautiful flowers and splendid pineapples, for which La Brea is famous), we came out on a broad, desolate track, where the pitch enters so very largely into the composition of the soil, an accidental fire in the woods would soon become a lasting-bank of fire, and then the whole district into "Phlegraan Plains," but fortunately the pitch on the surface does not burn.

As the road gradually ascended it was curious to see how the overlapping layers of pitch assumed a curve, bulging down hill, reminding one somewhat of lava currents, or, perhaps, Dr. Scott's ingenious experiment for illustrating his theory of the semi-viscous nature of glaciers. Half a mile further brought us to the lake itself. At the first view the whole lie of it is exactly like that of any other small lake in a forest, and one would never think that it is dotted with islands of water. There are the swampy-looking tufts of rushes and rough grass on the margin, the forest ends in a clearly-marked line of wood, and several islands covered with trees and bushes are dotted over the surface of the lake. The peculiarity of illusion is quickly dispelled by the color and solid appearance of the flood. The pitch is throughout nearly the whole surface, hard enough to walk over with perfect safety. It has a peculiarly clean look, and my first impression was that the top had just been removed from the part we first walked over, and that then it had been swept with a very hard broom, or scraped when it was new. Being the same sort of nanks on it that are left by a broom broom on a very soft gravel path. The whole lake is intersected by cracks, or rather valleys, in which the exudations, apparently from different centres, have not quite met. These vary in depth and width, from a few inches to many feet, and at the time of my visit were full of water. In one of the larger I saw a very ugly bull-headed fish, weighing about a quarter of a pound—I presume a "warm-water fish;" but it is surprising that any fish could exist in water so warm and so impregnated with sulphur and other matters. We began to cross these cracks on the back of a very tall negro, but as this involved some delay as well as risk of disappointment, I left the negro under the water, should he make a false step, or slip at the critical moment, a long plank was substituted, by the help of which we reached the other side of the lake, tolerably dry, and struck into the forest by a sort of cowinroy road. Here are what are called "pitch volcanoes"—small mounds not more than two feet, usually, about the level in the centre a hole about eight inches in diameter. In some of the holes the pitch, which seemed perfectly liquid, was some few feet below the surface; in others it was near the brim, and in others it was oozing over. I could not ascertain that the volcanes ever showed any greater activity. The first part of the road lay through a grove of palm-trees of great beauty and variety—chiefly the fan-palm and Maximilian. insignia—these were succeeded by a dense forest of fine trees. A sharp turn in the path unexpectedly showed that we were again close to the sea, though some fifty feet above the shore, and disclosed one of the most charming views, on a small scale, that I ever saw: the rippling sea dotted with small rocky islets, each capped with foliage; steep red cliffs to the left, overhung with creepers; all around us the tropical forest with its wonderful forms, its marvelous flowers, its profusion of form, and the splendid butterflies that "waver, lightly settle, and sleepily sway."

There were drawbacks, however, to the enjoyment of such a scene. I was stepping into the wood to catch a glimpse of an unknown butterfly that had just settled, when the manager warned me that the place was notorious for its snakes, and showed me a specimen of a very venomous one killed that morning. This may be called a minimal drawback. Another artificial drawback was the fact that this most charming bay has been selected as a likely location for an oil well, and the result showed all the shrewdness of the manager's calculations, for the boring had "struck ile" in two places. Only those who have smelt it and smelled it can fully appreciate the filth and stench of an oil well. A few whiffs of the fetid fluid as it came up the pipe, and a very cursory inspection of the wells satisfied our curiosity about this tropical Petrolia; and, with one more look at the charming nook as we re-entered the forest path, out of sight and sound of the works, we returned to the lake, in the centre of which some men had been left to dig pitch from two feet at least below the water level. Hitherto the pitch that has been exported has proved a failure for gas purposes; but it had been suggested that this might not be the case if it were taken from some depth under the surface, where it had not been exposed to the action of air and weather. A spot was selected where the pitch seemed pure and clean. It was very hard, but, when above the surface, and though a large piece would have a certain amount of brittleness and elasticity, like partially hardened blue clay, yet a chipped and flew at every stroke at the pick. I noticed that, even on the hardest parts, the fervale of my umbrella gradually sank down, as I pressed upon; and I was assured that in forty-eight hours the large hole that had now been dug would be completely filled up again.

A few yards from where we stood the surface was quite soft—too soft to walk swiftly over—and I could not but shudder at the thought of the misfortune of being embalmed alive in pitch. This soft part was usually of a lighter brown color, nearly as fluid as treacle. Owing, I presume, to the quantity of water with it we took some up in our hands and were not "detefied," except by a slight smell remaining on the fingers. In another part there were constant small discharges of gas, fetid sight were emitted from the bubbling mass, with small squirts of water and blackened bubbles. This, it was the only part of the lake where any thing like action seemed to be going on.

The superintendent of the barrels of pitch (one of them soon went headlong, barrel and all, into one of the cracks) and carried them off to the end of the landing-place of the lake, we started on a shorter line for the bank; but we had not gone many steps before the thunder-storm which had long been threatening burst over us in a tropical fury. No one who has not experienced the power of a storm in the tropics, at the beginning of the rainy season, can fully appreciate our situation on the exposed surface of the lake. The immediate effect was to convert the whole of the lake, the cracks being already full of water, into a sea, with a hissing sea of bubbles; and they, with the splash of the huge rain-drops, made it impossible to see whether the water was deep or shallow. Our plank and our tall negro were not then at our disposition, and, being without even a stick, our only chance of getting the depth was by the booted legs of one of the party. As long as the water was not much above his knees we followed him; but the quarter of a mile, occupying a long half hour, was very tedious and unpleasant before we were once more on comparatively dry land. The effect of the deluge was converting it into a dirty, whirling torrent, carrying down on its surface a brown, dusty substance that seemed not to mix with the water, but to be bad enough, but it was pleasant walking compared to the "improvements" through which we eventually dragged ourselves to await the return of the steamer.

INVENTIVE INSECTS.

WIRE-WORKERS.

We might have got our illustration of wire-drawing from the wire-worm. "You may sometimes have seen," says the Abbé de la Pluche, "in the work-rooms of goldsmiths or gold-wire drawers, certain iron plates, pierced with holes of different calibres, through which they force gold and silver wire in order to render it finer. The silk-worker has under her mouth such a kind of instrument, perforated with a pair of holes (Lyonnet says these are united into one on the outside), through which she draws two drops of the gum that fills her two bags. These instruments are like a pair of distaffs for spinning the gum into a silken thread. She takes this double drop of gum that issues where she pleases, and then draws back her head, or lets herself fall, while the gum, continuing to flow, is drawn out and lengthened into a double stream. Upon being exposed to the air it immediately loses its fluidity, becomes dry, and acquires consistence and strength."

TAILORS.

Look at the insect tailors at their operations of cutting-out, sewing, and making coats of many colors. A sailor would find it no easy process to cut for himself a suit of clothes out of a sail, holding the while only by the portion that he was cutting. Yet this is an operation performed every day by the tent-making caterpillars. Their cleverness in cutting out it requires close observation to discover them, even with their habitations on their backs. The tents are from a quarter of an inch to an inch in length, and usually about the breadth of an oat-straw. They are composed of a piece of leaf, artfully separated from the upper layer, or what one might separate one of the leaves of paper from a sheet of pasteboard. The caterpillar, gnawing a hole through one of the two outer membranes of the leaf, eats away the pulp between the membranes, leaving the latter white and transparent. These, as Réaumur has remarked, are the parts of the insect like a piece of cloth in the hands of a tailor; and the caterpillar cuts out a shape with more neatness and dexterity than this latter workman does. As the caterpillar is furnished in its mandibles with an excellent pair of scissors, this may not appear to be a difficult matter; but, when we examine the matter more minutely, we find that the peculiar shape of the two extremities requires different curvatures, and this, of course, renders the operation no less complex than the shaping of the pieces of cloth for a coat. Réaumur one day surprised a caterpillar in the act of making its garment. It had thought to let the sharp-pointed edge of the membranous bone to one side of it; but the naturalist cut off the indentations of the leaf, and loosened the membranes along that line. Then the little tailor sewed the two edges together, and then proceeded to its subsequent operations. The clothes-moth caterpillar, like many others, has its waistcoat clothing, and its first care is to provide itself with a dandy-cloak. When it increases in length it takes care to add to the length of the piece it is working in fresh hairs at either end, and if it be divided into stuffs of different colors, it may be made to construct a parti-colored tissue like a Scotch plaid.

DRAPERS.

The inventor of blotting-paper is not known, they say, and history has likewise failed to reveal the name of the man who first made wire mouse-traps or fly-catchers, but the principle which the mice can squeeze themselves, but exit from a mouse-trap as possible. But though the principle had not been applied to wire-traps, it was in existence ages upon ages ago. Before human existence had been invented, and very probably long before the mammoth had been placed on our earth, the caterpillar of the emperor moth was making its dress cell, and thereby became a silent teacher to the entomologist in mankind how to make mouse-traps and lobster-pots. The cocoon is made by the emperor moth is in the form of a Florence flask, and strong enough to be thrown that it appears almost like damask or leather. It differs from most other cocoons in not being closed at the upper end, which is left open, sometimes in a narrow circular aperture formed by the convergence of little bundles of silk gummed together, and so arranged as to open inwards. In consequence of all these terminating in needle-shaped points, the entrance of depredators is guarded against. The whole plan of the trap is so perfect, can easily walk out of the cocoon. The elastic silk gives way upon being pushed from within, and, as the points cannot be bent in upon him, and, Archimedes-like, would exclaim "Eureka!" on the equivalent, "I have found my trap!" Reverse the position, make the converging threads to lead into instead of out of the trap, and you have a fly-trap. Let the moth make it of wire, put it on my shelf, and I catch more flies than I will make it of osier, sink it to the bottom of the sea, and I catch lobsters and crabs. I will lay it in a rapid, and I catch salmon; but that I will place it under the river-banks, and then I have eels.

The cocoon of the hawthorn saw-fly, exposed with its occupant all through the winter upon leafless hedges, is not alive to the material trash as leather, but much harder. When the caterpillar wishes to make its exit, it cuts a singular trap-door, never falling to find a weak moment to leave entire just such a portion as serves for an attachment and a hinge.

Réaumur found a large pupa of various species of insects in the exhausted receiver of an air-pump, and at every fresh stroke of the piston saw the bubbles of air issue from the cocoon constructed; because, as he inferred, the envelope is not pervious to the air contained in the body, and the spiracles do not allow of free passage with moisture rapidity to keep pace with the exhaustion of the receiver. Upon examining the structure of the spiracles he found that each of the openings was furnished with ciliary valves, which are shut when the pupa is plunged into water, but opened again when it is taken out. This circumstance accounts for the swelling of the body under the exhausted receiver. It may be supposed the animal would closely shut the valves when it felt the air forcibly extracted from its body.

PATTERN DESIGNERS.

Perforated patterns for lace vendilators and sale-shops are the suggestion of the apparatus constructed by the caddis-worm for protection during its state of inactivity and helplessness. Exciting its change apprehending, it weaves at the entrance of its gallery a grating of its singular indissoluble silk. De Geer describes one of these gratings as pierced all over with holes, disposed in concentric circles, separated by ridges running from the centre to the circumference, though not quite so regular as the spokes of a wheel. Other ridges, again, are made to traverse the concentric rays, following the course of the circles or holes, in such a manner as to form compartments, each having a hole in its centre. Réaumur found that these holes were for the purpose of breathing, by admitting a current of fresh water, effected, no doubt, by the spiracles of the pupa; and he actually saw the grating in alternate motion from convex to concave as the water passed out and in.

Some of these pupæ, like the insect eggs before referred to, would furnish the designer with shapes and patterns which he might apply to a great number of purposes. The pupa of the blow-fly, for instance, rounded and tapering toward both ends, with rings of equal distances, instead of one of the little jars used for tobacco or for anchovy paste.

LIGHTNING-PROOF BUILDERS.

All who have occasion to use a metal tea-pot know that pieces of ivory are introduced into the handle as non-conductors. The principle is of extensive application, and is taken advantage of in the use of blankets on our beds, thatch on cottage roofs, flannel next the skin, and the use of fur in cloaks and boots. There is a species of solitary bee (Anthidium manicatum) which forms the exterior walls of her nest of the wool of pubescent plants, such as rose-mosses, the guinea, cats'-ears, etc.; impervious to every change of temperature, apparently aware, long before Count de Lacépède's experiments, what materials conduct heat most slowly.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Low fares by boats and cars, and "excursion" tickets, and cheap trips, are very good things in their way, and in a certain sense popular competition is advantageous, and tends to bring prices to a proper level. But sometimes these things are carried to the point, for the safety, and a great deal too far for the comfort, of the traveling public. For a few weeks past the nominal fare to Boston and intermediate places by one of the Sound steamers, has been greatly reduced from former prices. As a natural result the boats have been excessively crowded. Apparently every body who has occasion to travel takes the "excursion ticket." That many of the Sound steamers are "splendid" boats for passenger travelling is a matter of notoriety, but the crowding becomes a penance rather than a pleasure to the most popular lines the price of staterooms was not increased, but none could be procured in advance until the day of sailing. Of course the consequence was discomfort, and, in a few cases, trusting to uncertainty, and chose another route, the result was disappointment, and a better determination to delay taking their "excursion" until the fare was raised a little.

A word of caution may not be amiss. On these crowded boats pickpockets and thieves flourish. They find a rich field for their rich harvests from many precious travelers. Even in ordinary times, when the boats are not crowded, strict precautions are needed, there is danger enough. Recently a lady from the country, on a visit to this city in general, and to individual friends in particular. One of New York's most accomplished critics criticised the cavalry drills in one or two respects, that seem worthy of attention. It states that, while the cadets are splendid riders, their horses are unnecessarily encumbered by the use of vicious horses; and several instances of serious accidents have been reported to us, caused at these drills. Certainly courage and skill may be exercised without needless recklessness in regard to life.

In Vermont butter has now fallen so low in price that children are sent from house with the surplus milk downward without causing a financial crisis in the family.

A colored woman was recently ejected from a car on the Nashville and Decatur Railroad, in Tennessee, although she had a first-class ticket. Conductor Bass, the conductor of the train acting under general orders from the company to exclude colored people, but because such persons are a source of annoyance to white passengers. The conductor was arrested on a charge of assault and battery, and has been convicted and fined.

It has been announced that the Binghamton Insane Asylum was overrun with applications for admission from the ranks of the army and professional men, and females generally. One of our daily papers states that the Superintendent of this Asylum has written a reply to the inquirers, in effect he says that such allegations are as far from the truth as any thing could be. There is not even a female patient committed to the Asylum. There have been fifteen or twenty applications for the admission of females during the past year, but most of these were applicants.

A gentleman traveling in Italy gives, in a private letter, many striking instances of what we style taking the liberty of quoting:

"Within a mile of a magnificent gallery or 'Posagge' has been built in Milan, leading through the block of buildings which separates the Cathedral and the great theatre La Scala. It exceeds anything of the kind I have seen. The form of the arcade in streets or passages being about sixty feet wide, with four carved figures, in white marble, at each corner, forming the entrance, and the roof is an arch of glass and iron. The centre, where the passages, or 'Posagges,' cross, is enlarged to form a rotunda of say the first diameter, surmounted by a dome. The passenger who is coming to the hotel this evening to take an ice at a fashionable café, and while we were sitting at one table, L—— spied a man perched up under the edge of the dome. He was engaged in painting, and was protected, watching the man; and at the signal of a whistle a light was let down to him and a little pot or engine started from him and traveled around the edge of the dome. The motion of the little engine was driven by the power of the engine, until the whole dome was illuminated with hundred lights. The crowd burst with satisfaction, and then gradually dispersed."

An exchange from Canada has the following: "Persons in the habit of using brown sugar will be interested, if they have not already heard it, that it has been ascertained to be the home of innumerable microscopic insects. They are destroyed by immersion in Canadian whisky."

No more noble act of youthful heroism has ever been recorded than the self-sacrifice of a little girl, aged nine, in the effort to save her brothers and sisters. Four children were playing on Sunday upon the rails of the Northeastern line near Newcastle. An engine and tender came up so swiftly to avoid running over the poor little things. The eldest had escaped, when, looking back, she saw the two youngest boys still reclining on the metals. She rushed back to their assistance, and managed to drag them underneath the engine and clear of the wheels just as the connecting-rod of the locomotive struck her down. When picked up a hideous wound on the head showed the brain protruding, and after some lingering agony she died. Her brother, who, like her, had made no effort to escape, was killed on the spot; but the two little ones for whom she had laid down her life were unhurt. In all the history of youthful martyrdom there is no more tearful narration than this.

These terse rules are worth remembering: Pay your debts as soon as you get money in your pocket. Do without what you don't need. Speak your mind when necessary, hold your tongue when prudent. Cover appearances, and keep up a good character. Beware sometimes, but not vice. Respect every body impolitely. Never speak ill of your neighbor unless you are able to pay for some one. Aim at comfort and prosperity, not fashion. Acknowledge your ignorance, and don't pretend to knowledge you haven't got. Attend to your friends, but never beyond your means.

Statistics of salmon fishery are now used in Paris to adorn the hale of ladies in the ball-room. These are rings dyed in all the evening by quills being filled with fresh water and sealed at both ends. When the three-stalks bathe their tips. Plaits of hair hide the mechanism, and sometimes false hair is rolled round the quill, which is secured by hair-pins afterward.

The returns of the Post-office of the leading manufacture of the city of New York, as reported by the present product of the refineries in New York and vicinity is estimated to be about 30,000,000 pounds. The employment of steam in refining sugar was successfully introduced by Messrs. Havemeyer & Sheet; and in their immense establishment, where steam is employed used in the process of refining, but in lifting, hoisting, and pumping, right and left, and every part of each, while requires 5000 tons of anthracite coal a year. About 250,000 barrels of water are daily used, this some being drawn from wells beneath the building, and some being taken from the Croton Water Department. The sugar is received in hogsheads, boxes, etc., on the floor of the store, and by steam to the upper story where it is emptied. The process of cleansing commences by dissolving it in steam and hot water, the color being extracted by means of chemical and mechanical agents. There it is passed to vacuum pans heated by steam coils, and subjected to the evaporation processes by which it is crystallized and refined.

The Sioux Indians understand how to manage fairs so as to bring in the money. For example, at a fair held in Berlin not long ago, a young lady, by her waltz and pigeon wing, drew a crowd that bought a great deal of goods at enormous prices, and quite fascinated an old gentleman, who asked her,

"Tell me if you sell kisses too?"

"Of course, sir," replied the young lady.

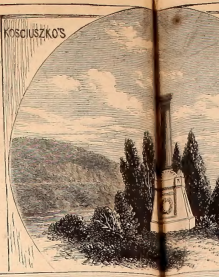
"What is the price of your kisses?"

"A hundred silver sqieces, cash in advance."

"Here are the hundred dollars; I will be need adorer of the lady."

The old gentleman of like he expected, he saw, to his dismay, that the young lady kissed her little white pocket-handkerchief, and, presenting him with the kind cheers of the by-standers, and then took the hundred dollars as coolly as if she had sold something at a very low price.

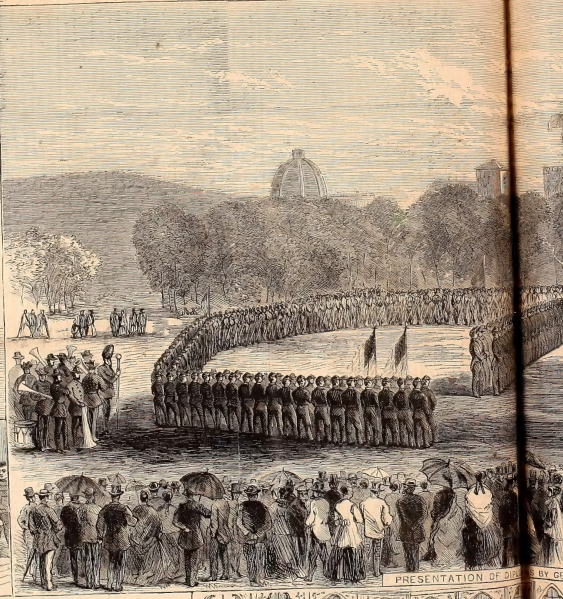
Muslins for collecting all kinds of odd things rage in Paris at present. Infinite variety is given, but must seem to be confined to Paris by any means. One fashionable muslin is made of alternate nearly a thousand varieties of steel or metallic pens, arranged in the form of stars of all ages; another, knives and forks. A beautiful knife and fork, in imitation of the 14th century, was recently purchased by him at a Paris fashionable muslin. Another muslin is that having monograms from letters. There is also the rage for muslins with mottoes, such as "Do not beat, for keep, causing a great rummaging in the shops for muslins in all sizes and locksmiths.



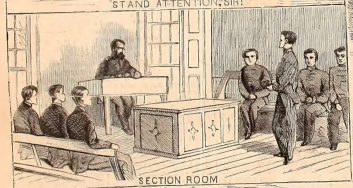
Very few persons understand the art of conversation: It is easy enough to gossip about one's neighbors, to tell a story, to dispute, and yet avoid all causes of offense, to a gift which few possess. To converse one must express his thoughts naturally, with openness and simplicity. Reproaches should be repressed as far as possible, for it is only very generous natures that can endure about any personalities. Greek or Latin quotations are seldom in good taste; nor is it at all necessary to use French terms when English ones convey the meaning equally well. An affectation of learning is also a disgusting, not to say a stupid manner. Some persons never seem to be able to differ from another without putting themselves immediately in a position of attitude, and finishing at once into a wordy assault. If they can not find some one to oppose themselves, they will contradict the opposition, and carry on the contest without any other help than a liberal use of the words "I would be ready used; and the good old rule, "Speak evil of no one," is as true as ever. In general it is much safer, in a mixed company especially, to keep silence than of persons. It is never in good taste to monopolize the conversation. Indeed, it is almost a mortality of an art to be a good listener as to be a good talker.

The "Spectator" has a rather hard time of it nowadays. She is attacked on all sides. Men are exerting their talents and pouring their bruins to find out some objection to set about her ears. One man declares that "nothing is too extraordinary for her related tales." He says she is a mere parrot-like of that myth of past ages, 'love in a cottage.'" C. Dutcher he is called "a mere fabrication of fact, spoiled in the making." D. dubs her "a creature at Saturday mornings and nights whirled away in hot rooms." Mr. Jones is a little more polite and complimentary to report. There are precious few in the whole alphabet who are so ignorant, and both, and so stupid as to say, as one has: "We have so much faith in the natural virtues and appetites of the human species, that notwithstanding all the nonsense they (the men) are writing, we feel confident they will always occupy the first place in his affections, whether she is a spectator, or whether she wears a tag of lace and a rose-bud for a bonnet-ornament. Be true to be beautiful."

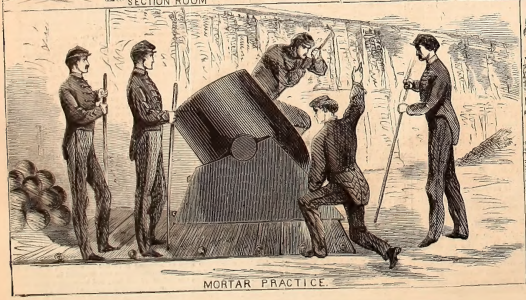
It makes one marvel to hear about the "big trees" of California. The valley between Mariposa and the Falls of the Yosemite is "full of them," and, to one of which—so it is said—measures less than 30 feet in circumference at its base, measures 100 feet at the ground, and 80 feet at a short space above the ground, and rises to the height of 300 feet high. It is supposed these California giants are of the same genus as the ancient extinct trees, whose fossil and the eccentric rings deposited by the sap it has been calculated that some of these trees are three or four thousand years old. These ago an hurricane of wind was removed in order to the height of 116 feet, and so marked that it could be put up in precisely the same position that it occupied on the tree. After being exhibited in this country this specimen was carried to London, and remained on exhibition in the Crystal Palace, until it was destroyed by fire in 1866. On the western flanks of the Sierra Nevada mountains report a tree which measures 106 feet in circumference four feet above the ground.



CAVALRY CHARGE ON THE PLAIN.



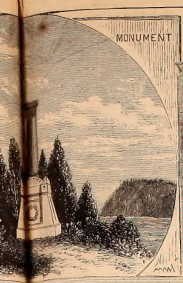
REPORTING TO THE ADJUTANT.

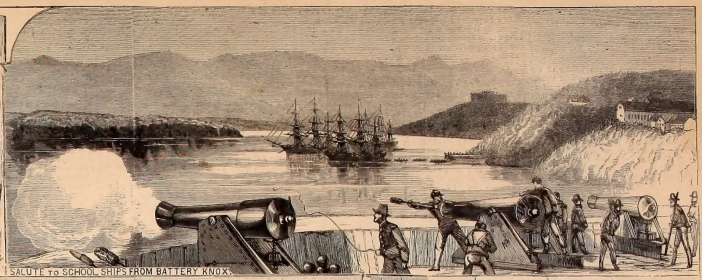


PRESENTATION OF DIP

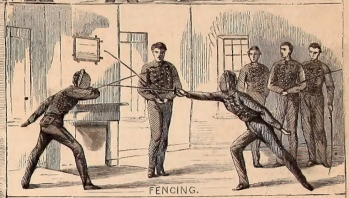
"STAND ATTENTION, SIR!"

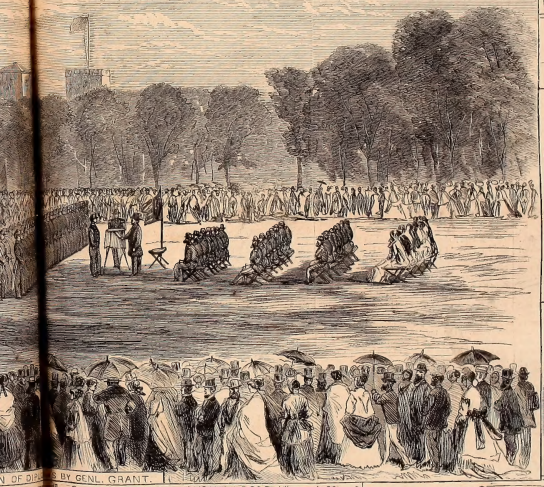
SECTION ROOM.





MORTAR PRACTICE.





EXAMINATION BEFO

CADET LIFE AT WEST POINT.—SKET

SALUTE to SCHOOL SHIPS FROM BATTERY KNOX.

FENCING.

N OF DIP[illegible] BY GENL. GRANT.

TELEGRAPHING.

CADET LIMITS.

ON BE[illegible] OF VISITORS.

PRACTICAL MILITARY ENGINEERING.

INT.—Sket[illegible] Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 426.]

CADET LIFE AT WEST POINT.

THE late war in this country, more than any conflict of modern times, served to explode the fallacy of "Heaven-born generals," so common with the democratic people of this "country without a standing army." The fallacy had been disproved often enough in the history of the world, but never before for our especial benefit and to our satisfaction. It was disproved to Washington's satisfaction by the time he had finished the Revolution with an army in which there was not an officer, except the foreign soldiers who entered the service, "who knew the difference betwixt a chevaux de frise and a cabbage garden;" and he put that conviction on record in his last message to Congress, in these words: "Whatever arguments may be drawn from particular examples, superficially viewed, a thorough examination of the subject will evince that the Art of War is both comprehensive and complicated; that it demands much previous study, and that the possession of it, in its most improved and perfect state, is always of great moment to the safety of a nation." But these words and all past experience was forgotten by succeeding generations, and the present race of Americans fell into the same error, and really came very near discontinuing its only national military school. The idea prevailed that to be a good soldier required only that the man should be a good marksman; that some men were generals intuitively, and no distinction was drawn between natural and valued ones; and even leaders of battalions and cool, deliberate, and enlightened directors of grand armies. But the late war has taught us, and it is to be hoped forever, disguised that error. It has been clearly seen that while numbers of uneducated soldiers, like Lockwood, Custer, Terry, Sickles, and others, have rose to distinction, it is only the educated West Pointers, like Grant, Sherman, Thomas, McClellan, and others, who have risen to eminence. The consequence is, that an increased interest in the West Point institution since the close of the war; and it has been remarked that this interest was more fully demonstrated at the late examination of the class of '68 than at any other time.

We have given on pages 424 and 425, as of interest in this connection, a series of engravings partly illustrative of the career of a cadet at the West Point Academy, partly illustrative of some of the branches of the service, and at the same time representations of the actual scenes witnessed at the last examination. On one corner is "Cavalry Exercise on the Plains" illustrating the highest branch of the service: on another the artillery service is pictured in the sketch of the cadet practicing at the Artillery School of School ships from Battery Knox; below, on the left, is a cut showing the cadets engaged in "Mortar Practice," while on the right "Civil Engineering" is being taught a practical knowledge of military engineering by the construction of Gabions, Fascines, Sap Rollers, &c. In the centre above is the monument "to the memory of Thaddeus Kosciusko," the author of the original defenses of the Hudson erected at West Point. The rest of the engravings represent the career of the cadet, some particulars of which may not be uninteresting.

By the laws of the United States each Congressional and Territorial District, the District of Columbia, and the President of the United States, are entitled to representation in West Point. Each district is entitled to one cadet. Each candidate for admission, who must apply by letter to the Secretary of War, must be over 17 and under 21 years of age, unless he has served honorably in the army during the rebellion, in which case the age is extended to 24, must be five feet in height, free from any deformity, disease, or infirmity, which would unfit him for active military duty; must be able to read with facility; must be familiar with the tables of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, vulgar and decimal fractions, simple and compound proportion, English grammar, descriptive geography, and the history of his own country. When he shall have obtained this appointment and commission he appears at the appointed time to West Point, and reports for duty to the Adjutant, which he is seen doing in the engraving on the left of the large picture. He is sent to his quarters, and here his troubles begin. The older cadets of the great hands at the practical joke, and the raw cadet at once finds himself "among the Philistines." He enters the apartment assigned to him only to be subjected to a sudden halt by the command to "Stand attention, sir!" The fresh boy room-mates put him through a course of examination involving the most curious answers to the most comical questions. This ordeal at the hands of his class-mates is not more embarrassing than that which he is subsequently called upon to endure in the section-room at the hands of the professors. On the right of the engraving he is seen under instruction in fencing and in field telegraphing, two important branches of a military education. Below, in the centre, he is seen at the "black-board" on his final examination, which comes to him in June of the fourth year of his cadet life. This is a most serious and important occasion with him, as it fixes his grade in the class and army, or excludes him from both. Some of them are frequently sent back to undergo a fifth year of study, while others are left entirely "out in the cold." In the foreground of this picture will be found an engraving showing General Grant distributing the diplomas to the graduating class of 1868.

During his academic career the cadet is not entirely deprived of all social intercourse, but he sees his sweet-heart only by permission of the Commandant, and only within police limits. The "police limits" in the pathway from the Academy to Hore's Hotel is marked by the orange hedge around the latter building, and beyond this not even Love can lure the cadet. Here he parts with his fair companion, but he generally lingers a while to see her ascend the steps of the hotel, and disappear in its spacious and hospitable doors. This statement may serve to explain the picture on the right.

SYLVIE'S VOW.

BY JULIA KAVANAGH.

AS at a quiet, shy old house, which I travel alone; but I protest that I have never failed to be rewarded for my journey by some aspect of scenery or some trait of character I should not, I believe, have found at home. I make it a rule never to visit the same place twice, if I can help doing so; the consequence is that not wishing to go for last year, and yet requiring sea air, I was rather puzzled whither to bend my steps, as the poets say. In this emergency I thought of Mrs. Berry. She looked at me and shook her head, and sighed, and seemed doubtful.

"Can you keep a secret?" she said.

"Can I?" was my injured reply.

"Well, then, if you will solemnly promise never to reveal the name or place I shall mention to you—never, especially to those vagrant English, who are the pest of one's life, and to no rich shutter-spot they visit, I will tell you of a quiet village on the French coast where you can spend a few weeks in the deepest peace."

I promised readily enough. I was very particular I wanted, and as Mrs. Berry is decidedly a clever woman, though a sharp-tempered one, the information was clear, precise, and to the purpose.

"Mind you go to Ste Cheval Blanc," she said, by way of conclusion, "and tell the landlady I sent you. Deluded woman! she wept when I left; she wept with joy, thinking I was going to let her have a shilling's English next season, and she will consider your advent as the herald of her coming prosperity. I am sure you will be of her coming prosperity. I am sure you will be of service to all parties, and if she has looked at the sea since I was there last."

"Looked at the sea, sir! Did you not say the sea stood on a rock, just above the sea?"

"Of course I did say it; but still put that question, if you please, and bring me the answer."

Now I have a touch of inquisitiveness in my disposition, and Mrs. Berry, who knows it, only spoke thus to provoke me.

"There you are in a previous fidget," she said, triumphantly; "come, I will be merry on you, and tell you what I know of Sylvie."

"I like the name, Mrs. Berry."

"That's another reason," replied Mrs. Berry, in her supercilious way; "Sylvie is a red-cheeked, stonily girl, and the cook at the Cheval Blanc—no more. Nevertheless, I take an interest in her, as you can learn, if you will but listen. I don't know what took me to the Cheval Blanc; a whim, I suppose, or a passion for the English society. There was certainly no fear of my meeting any there. I arrived late one evening. The night was dark and stormy, the wind came northwesterly wind was blowing. I took it for granted that the village was delightfully picturesque, for I got a peep of the sea, and that I saw nothing of it. All I saw was the mass of cliffs looming above me. I heard a great roaring of waves dashing on the beach, and I knew though the heavy gloom I perceived a bright spot, like a fiery eye. It proceeded from the kitchen hearth of the inn. The landlady came out to receive me. She was a plain, middle-aged woman, in a white cap with long flaps to it, and with gold ear-rings, and a cross shining on her brown neck. She looked amazed enough when I alighted from the car. I learned very soon that I was the first woman whom the Cheval Blanc had ever seen. And yet the poor fellow dangling about the kitchen, who proved to be a sea-weed, had seen some company in his day. I crossed the kitchen, and did not much mind a man and woman in it. The landlady called up the man to prepare a room for me, and, in the mean while, made me sit in a sort of pantry behind the kitchen. She could not, however, help a peep, being a lady, also be unsociable and prefer solitude. I did not much like that pantry, with a dusty candle for its only light, and the sea roaring sullenly without. Besides, I have gregarious propensities. I like to associate with my fellow-creatures and landladies—a very good deal of talking went on in the kitchen between the couple I had seen there, and I was afraid of it. Presently the woman of the house began to bustle about, and to exclaim:

"'This is a stormy night!' said the woman's voice—and a very scornful voice it was; 'not it.' There will be a gale before the morning,' replied the other.

"This speaker had rather heavy and sullen tones. The woman answered back in a shrill, excited laugh, and I thought when her voice itself; then a great sound of something frying on the fire prevented me from hearing the rest, if the fire prevented me from hearing the rest, if something else was, indeed, spoken between these two. I could not resist the temptation of peeping at them. I saw them very well, though they were too much intent on looking at each other to see me.

"The kitchen was an old-fashioned one, with a deep stone chimney, as large as many a modern room. The man sat in one corner of this recess. He was a tall, fine fellow, dressed with a woolen cap and jacket, and a pair of huge boots, which told me his calling: this was a fisherman.

The woman stood holding the handle of a frying-pan. She was Sylvie, a strong-built girl, with red cheeks, harsh features, and a defiant look and carriage that struck me. She tossed up her omelet in the pan with a scornful air; then, when it was done—and, my dear sir, it looked delicious—by brown—she went and put it on a dish, which she placed before the fisherman with the look and attitude of a Medea handing the poisoned bowl to Theseus.

"'Not that you need be in such a hurry, she said; 'there is a gale, and you will not go out to-night.'

"The young man put down his knife and fork, and looked at her. His brow was tanned with exposure, but I was struck with the mild reproach of his blue eye; and dark as many a wintry gale and many a summer sun had made his cheek I could see it reddening with something that seemed more like pain than resentment at the taunt. Hardly-favored though she was this Sylvie was a woman. She could not resist that look. She walked round his chair, put her arm around his neck and softly kissed his cheek. I am not sure that he returned the caress. He did not, indeed, reject it, but he leaned his elbow on the table, rested his cheek on his hand, like one in pain, and all the while—so foolish are lovers—seemed to be getting cold.

"Sylvie, indeed, was the first to remember the fact. She kissed him again. I saw her sin had been a deep one, then pushed the plate nearer to him, and uttered an imperative 'Manges donc.'

"Mr. Grant, a friend of mine, once assured me that man was made to obey woman; and the kindly added, that when he did not comply with that law of his nature every thing was at sixes and sevens. I will not follow his conjecture in the far, but sure am I that Jean—so was the fisherman called—fulfilled the first part of Mr. Grant's proposition to the letter.

"He put by his dejected looks, took up his knife and fork, and went through that delicious omelet, and a fish, and bread, and a pint of cider with the heartiest good-will. Sylvie, though still busy about the kitchen, kept him in conversation. Her tones were very peculiar.

"'Do listen to it—how it roars!' she said. It was plain she meant the sea by that scornful 'it.'

"'One would think it was going to eat us all up—cliffs, village, church, and all!'

"This ironical speech was followed by another little shrill laugh, which seemed like a note of defiance to the Atlantic without.

"Jean took the part of the sea.

"'It gets on a fish,' he said, 'and fish gives us money, and—'

"Sylvie stamped her foot at the shock her clenched hands, I saw, met at him.

"'I hate it,' she stammered; 'I hate it.'

"'This is a very extraordinary woman,' I thought; 'she evidently has a quarrel with the sea.'

"And still the placid Jean took the poor persecuted ocean's part.

"'God made it,' he said, 'and—'

"Sylvie would not let him go on.

"'He made me, too,' she interrupted; 'and I hate the devil, and I hate the sea.'

"She looked sullen and really angry now; but Jean was evidently not afraid.

"'I know you were afraid of it once, and—'

"No speech of his was to be completed this evening.

"'Afraid!' she screamed, at the pitch of her shrill voice. 'I afraid of the sea! If I were a man, I would go out in it, I would whip it,' she added, working herself up to a sort of rage, and unconscious in her wrath, poor girl, that she was but a plaything in the hands of the King.

"I can not tell you how this girl began to interest me. I would not have lost a word of her quarrel with Jean. Whether, however, I am not going to repeat all that passed between Sylvie and her lover. The meaning and substance of it was that Jean, fisherman and gentleman, evidently only waiting the turning of the tide to go off, stood in that calm, and yet with a sense of the storm that was in the very bravest of his class; and that Sylvie, in her insolent defiance of the mighty element, had set upon such a height of pride in her that you will—as a sort of corollary, which she scorned. This feeling of hers she wanted Jean to share, and she became—I am sorry to say—endeavors to coax him out of his own belief into her own. She praised him, she laughed at his fears, she called and caressed, and she scolded her not. Jean smoked his pipe placidly, and heard her out, and when he had done, got up and—left the house, Sylvie.

"'Au revoir,' she answered, shortly; but she soon repented her unkindness. She followed him to the threshold, and there a while to look after him, then came back and sat in his vacant chair, looking as dreamily at the embers on the hearth as any lover could.

"Presently the landlady of the White Horse came down, and informed me that my room was ready. She was a mistress Sylvie had not started up from her dream and busied herself about the kitchen. She was stooping over the fire as I passed to the top stairs. Her fine face looked flushed; and it seemed to me that this harsh, defiant scorner of the sea had been weeping.

"You have a very strange girl,' I said to the landlady, as I got up to my room.

"Strange, indeed. There is no one strange about the Cheval Blanc, thank Heaven!

"Oh!' I do not mean unpleasantly strange! that she does not help the sea.

"It would be strange if she did not, considering that the sea took from her father, brother, and betrothed in one night. So Jean was not a first love, poor fellow! That was why she snubbed him so.

"I thought,' said I, 'that fine young fellow down stairs was Sylvie's sweet-heart.'

"So he is; but his elder brother was her betrothed. Jean had always liked Sylvie, however; and after the misfortune had happened, two years ago, he gradually persuaded her to listen to him, and they are to be married next winter.'

"Father, brother, and betrothed lost in one night! Here were blows enough to crush a woman; but this red-cheeked, stout-hearted Sylvie had not been conquered, not she! She had the spirit of a heroine, had that cook in a village inn. I admired her, and I said so. My landlady looked grave.

"Sylvie was a first-rate cook. No one could equal her in an omelet aux fines herbes, and her onion-soup was like none other; but the owner of the Cheval Blanc thought this open hatred of the sea a mere defiance of Providence. She did not admire it, not a bit.

"What was more, she was not very willing to talk about it. Perhaps she had some superstitious dread lest the chastisement due to Sylvie's iniquity should be visited on the whole household; and though this apprehension was not sufficient to counterbalance the merits of Sylvie's omelet and onion-soup, it was strong enough, maybe, to render her silent.

"The ignorant, unless they happen to be gifted with naturally strong and observant minds, care little for the peculiarities of character which do not affect daily life. Another girl, a sort of chamber-maid, who came up when my mistress had departed, proved equally impenetrable. Sylvie was a good girl, she said, and she must have had her own way. It must certainly be so; a father, brother, and lover in one night—but then, Jean was so good, and so forth. Beyond this I could not learn, and yet some glimmerings of Sylvie's past life I gathered from her. Jean's imputation had been a true one; Sylvie had been afraid of the sea, afraid and fond of it before her great calamity. She had loved its grandeur and beauty, but she had never ventured near those once angry waves. Kindness had been her excuse; her fear, said Josephine, had been her real reason. And now fear and love had united to do their part.

"My bed was a good one—as good a one as I ever slept on, but my eyes did not close once the whole of that night. The storm broke in with a wild, desolate moan, and the sea bent at the foot of the cliff with a deafening voice—such a voice as I have never since seen from the Atlantic in its fury. Toward morning the great din gradually lessened, and I fell into a slight doze. When I woke, Sylvie stood before me with a jug of warm water, which I had ordered the evening before for that hour.

"'What a night we have had!' I said.

"'Yes,' she replied, carelessly; 'a rough night-and-strong wind.'

"But it was the sea which made that terrible noise.'

"Sylvie did not answer. I was a stranger, and not to be made one jot more familiar with her wrongs and of her hatred. I longed to question her, but dared not. That girl had suffered much; and I knew it, or could be by a grand from all intrusive questioning. I dressed myself and went out. The village lay in a narrow cleft of the rock behind the inn. On the right, over the shingly beach, a long stretch of gray sea, with deep sharp ridges of white foam, a cloudy, tempestuous sky, and high up on the left, in my left a little church and church-yard. The tide was out. I wandered away among the briny weeds, and saw the long sea-cave to which Jean took by the angry waves; dead crabs and sea anemones floated in the shallow pools of sea-water; and here and there a stiffened form the night's tempest. I thought of the young fisherman, and wondered how he had fared. I had expressed some unanimous feeling on account before I left the inn, but my landlady had replied, hurriedly, that there was no fear; that Jean and his companion had put out of the reach of the storm long before it began. As Sylvie, whom I had not perceived when I spoke, then emerged from a dark corner of the kitchen, I did not know whether the reply was dictated by truth or by kindness.

"I never did like suspense in narrative. Of course, you know what is coming, because if it were not coming I should not have had this story to tell. As I was wandering among the rocks, thinking rather anxiously of the poor fellow, a cheerful, stout voice, which I had heard before, hailed me by my name, was heard over the whole beach. I felt struck with horror. At first I saw nothing, for a sharp point of rock hid the speaker from me and the sea that cry had proceeded. I hurried on, I saw a group, I joined it. There lay Jean himself, and beside him stood Sylvie, her face white, and after uttering that wild cry, silent as death. The men in woolen caps and jackets around me spoke in hushed tones that have been caught almost by the first wave when he went out, and at once dashed to pieces. Not a board, not a stem of the boat had been saved away by the waves; but, as if the angry sea wanted to answer Sylvie's defiance with another defiance more deadly than any she could hurl at it, it had, after ruthlessly playing with the corpse of her lover, like a tiger with its prey, cast it back on a ledge of rock that lay within sight and the reach of the surge; a memorial both of its power and of its vengeance.

"I looked at the poor girl. How could she survive such a moment as this? But she did survive it, and, what is more, that new agony did not conquer her. She looked up from her lover's dead body. At once the talking around her ceased; save for the distant moaning of the waves there was a dead silence—the cry of a seagull over our heads—all was still. Sylvie clenched her hands; she fastened her burning eyes on the sea—on that sea which was receding from us, and in a low voice she uttered the following words, or if you like to call them, imprecations:

"'Oh! you cruel, greedy, devouring sea! Never—never, till I die, shall my eyes rest upon you again! Never—never!'

"She rose and walked away. This was Sylvie's vengeance. She had been conquered by the enemy, she knew; and yet she could not confess it; but that her foe might not be forever taunting her with her defeat; that in storm it might not remind her of this night's cruel work; that in sunshine and fair weather it might not seem so very! Such I could have been for you, and such I would not be! Service vowed never to gaze on it again till she died."

"You do not mean to say she kept that vow?" I here remarked.

"I mean to say," replied Mrs. Berry, "that while I staid at the Cheval Blanc she kept that vow. She followed her lover in his grave in the little church-yard up on the hill, wherein his son is visible on every side, and she never once raised her eyes from the ground. She came home, consumed her duties in the kitchen after a day or two, and still she would not look at her enemy. The partition of the Cheval Blanc required constant vigilance, but that vigilance Sylvie exercised. I watched her very keenly and very closely for observation's sake, but to no one ever found Sylvie in fault. She had her enemies, and I know that some of them were cruel enough to come to the inn to steam her into breaking her vow, but Sylvie foiled them all. Nay, more, I believe this girl never once mentioned the word 'sin' after her great woe. Night and day she heard it moan around her dwelling; from morning till night, she had but to raise her eyes in order to see it; but Sylvie was dumb as well as blind, so far as the sea was concerned. She ignored it utterly. There lay a great and deep grief buried under that silence, I have no doubt. As the ocean waves pass calmly over many a lost mariner, so Sylvie's quiet bearing only served to conceal how a dead hope within her breast was over for her now. She had loved twice, and her last venture had not fared better than the first. Sylvie was not the woman to have a third love. That vow of hers was the seal—the grave-stone, if you like—of her youth. I do not mean to say that she grieved for Alain Le Mat, he'd, she cared very little for him; but, perhaps, because she loved him less, she felt a remorse from which the first love unreturned had been free. She had urged him on to his destruction. He might have sailed that night even if she had not spoken; but she had shed a wave to decoy him, he would have staid. Every one in the village said so, and to no Sylvie seemed to be ever beaconing the memorial remembrance of a great sin. Thus her vow was half atonement and half revenge."

I like eloquence. It is a remnant of the uncivilized times, which vanishes daily, and gets as rare and precious as an old coin. Mrs. Berry's account of this story, however woman and man, few interested me; and I do believe that, if I had not already been determined to go to the Cheval Blanc, Sylvie would have taken me there. The incidents of my journey were few and uninteresting, and I reached France, the poor one, and finally, the little sea-side fishing-town, or village, where the Cheval Blanc and Sylvie were to be found, in safety. When I saw this wild place, buried in the crags—a sort of hiding-city, with the sullen Atlantic forever beating against the rude cliffs under which it is built—it seemed to me that Sylvie's case, and her hatred of her enemy, lost their strangeness. This was the proper place for a haughty heart to rebel against those stern and pitiless powers of nature which are ever crushing us with ruin, we might, scorning our sorrows and our woes as things of no worth. But how did Sylvie manage not to look at the sea? That puzzled me strangely. I was fresh from every phase, it seemed to me, and when I reached the Cheval Blanc I doubted if one of the windows of that dwelling could be an exception from a sea-scene. Wherever I turned I saw a broad blue line meeting a paler blue sky.

The landlady came out to receive me. Great were her transports when I said that Mrs. Berry had sent me. Here, alas! or rather, here luckily, was no heroine-woman of character, but a plain, candid love of beere. How she expatiated on the merits of the place! How sure she was that in course of time, and of course, with such due patronage, all the upstart, worthless, cheating places along the coast! None of them, she solemnly assured me, could compare with this.

"And Sylvie," I said, at length thrusting in a word, "has she looked at the sea?"

I spoke too fast, though a pale, sickly woman stood in the kitchen, and I thought that this was not Sylvie. I did not wish to be overheard. The landlady looked a little confused, and wished two or three times very rapidly, while the woman, raising her downcast eyes, stared at me. That stern, sad look, full of reproach, and not without a sort of angry dignity, told me that this pale, worn creature, who looked fifty if she looked a day, was Mrs. Berry's red-cheeked, stoutly-made servant-girl. I felt ashamed and vexed, and I left the room without saying another word. The landlady followed me out, and was quite voluble and communicative.

"Yes, that is poor Sylvie," she said, with a sigh: "that is dying, says the doctors—heart-complaint, but nothing will make her give in—nothing. She will go on working."

"And she has never looked at the sea?"

"Oh! never. She would die rather than look at it. She is not right there, you know," and madame tapped her forehead. "Any thing it is unless you are like your neighbor, "you are not right there. Why, I have been told that I am not right there! I say it is my neighbor who is wrong in that important part, and who shall prove that it is I?

With feelings rather provoked with that foolish landlady, I dismissed her a little shortly, after ordering a dinner, which the fated hands of Sylvie herself were to prepare.

Up it came ere long: onion-soup such as I shall never taste, an omelet such as I had not imagined in my dreams, were among the items. Sylvie was an admirable cook. Yes: this woman, wholly to be the daughter of the Ariège, so far as the mere power of hating went, understood cookery in all its niceties. She was a born genius in an art where proficiency is many and geniuses are rare. If she had brought up the meal herself, I should have proposed to her to leave the Cheval Blanc and come to my inland home. No danger of the sea there; but I dare say that even if, forgetting her complaint, I had been so foolish as to make this proposal, Sylvie would have declined it. Of course she would. She did not want to forget the sea, not she: she wanted to be near it, to remember it constantly, and to hate it on.

I saw very little of her during the first week of my stay. My indiscreet questions had put Sylvie on her guard, and whenever I came near the kitchen door she was there, as deepest and darkest recess. Every afternoon I went out. As I passed by the kitchen one day, I saw that Sylvie was not there. In her stead Josephine attended to the cooking. I asked if Sylvie was ill.

"Very ill," she replied, emphatically, "but she would go all the same."

"Go where?" I naturally inquired.

"On the church-yard hill. She is having Jean taken up from his grave to put him beside his brother and her father. Her brother was never buried."

Here, then, was an opportunity of seeing Sylvie. I climbed up the hill to the church-yard, a poor little place, among rocky hillocks, a few black wooden crosses, and not one stone slab. The sky was dark and threatening, the fir sea was black as ink, and the wind moaned with a lone and gray; very mournful was the aspect of every thing around me. The ceremony, it ceremony there was to be, was over, when I arrived. Four men, wearing scapulars, and belonging to a brotherhood that binds itself to such duties, had taken up the coffin, and were carrying it to another grave at the end of the church-yard. A woman in a black cloak, with the hood drawn over her head, and a veil, was in a kneeling posture—followed them slowly. Suddenly one of the dark clouds over us broke, and it began to rain heavily. The woman rose, wrapped her cloak, and, with a strange look of tenderness in her sunken eyes, she flung it over the bare coffin, and it taken up by the men, and so it was. But if you had not been loved in life, you surely were loved in death! The men hastened on. The coffin was lowered in the grave, the grave, the earth shoveled in, and Sylvie stood by till she was drenched. I took shelter under the church-porch. When all was over, she came to me with her wet cloak on her arm, and her eyes bent on the earth. I heard her say to one of the brethren:

"You are sure there is room for another coffin?"

"Yes, yes, a plenty of room," he answered, a little roughly; he was a fisherman, I believe, and not much used to gentle speech. "There is so much of you now," he added, kindly.

Poor Sylvie! There was not much of her, indeed, nor did that little last long.

The brethren left the church-yard to hasten her inevitable end. Three days after this Josephine burst into tears as she laid the meal before me. Sylvie, she said, had taken to fit and been taken to her room, and the doctor had said that she was dying. I could believe it. I had caught a glimpse of Sylvie in the morning, and if ever death were written on a human face, it was written upon hers. The girl left me, but I let my dinner get cold. Through the open window I saw a smiling blue sea. "Poor Sylvie," I thought, "your enemy, as you call it, was too much for you, after all. I broke your heart, and what does it care for your poor human remains? Would you have looked at Sylvie, and blessed the Hand that chastened in its mercy, than have hated the poor unconscious instrument of your woe."

When I went out for my walk on the beach, after dinner, I asked how Sylvie was. The landlady shook her head: "Sylvie was very bad indeed."

What was this girl to me that her fate should make me think? And yet I did. We all, if the truth were known, have played and lost in the great game of life. Some lose love, and some lose health, and some—not a few—lose their innocence. So, whatever our loss may be, we are sure to be akin if we will but look back on the past. In my youth I was fond of chess, and very different from this Sylvie's, but still a sad story enough, and I too had ventured and lost. So my heart yearned, and yearned, for this poor fellow-sufferer of mine. Wherever I turned I still thought of her. On that ledge of rock Jean Le Mat must have sat. His grave lay by there on the hill; I had seen it this very morning, with a faded wreath of garden flowers placed upon it by the hand that would soon be useless and still; and, as there is no interest like the human interest, I looked carelessly at the glorious sunset I had seen a score of times, the golden path on which the sun rode like a conqueror, waves of molten gold or liquid emerald, all the splendor and pageantry of nature would show to me this nothing so much as the mystery of a stern, though obscure, woman's heart. Would Sylvie look at the sea, or not, and she would when she was dying? Above all, would she forgive it, or would she die with the stain of that unchristian wrath on her soul?

When I went back to the inn I found Josephine crying in the kitchen.

"Is Sylvie dead?" I asked, struck with the solemn silence of the house.

"No," she sobbed, "but they are going to undo the shutters."

This requires explanation. When Sylvie took her vow she caused the shutters in her room to be nailed up, for as her window faced the sea she would not trust any of the usual fastenings. A gust of wind might open them and betray her. And now Sylvie, knowing that her hour was at hand, had asked for her shutters to be undone, that she might see her enemy before she died, I suppose. I know where her room was. Often had that sternly-closed window, when I saw it outside, told me the story of a mind darkened by affliction with the blackness of a voluntary night. I stole up stairs very softly; Sylvie's door was open, a group stood around the chair in which she sat propped up by pillows. How ghastly pale she looked in the gray light! No sun spoke, but a sun on a ladder outside was already hammering and wrenching out the nails which fastened the shutters. Every blow of his hammer sounded to me like a knell. How sure Sylvie must be that she was dying! Presently the last fastening gave way, the two shutters were slowly flung back, and the open window framed a divine picture: a beetling crag, a vastness of blue sky, a glowing horizon, and the intense expanse of a deep azure on breaking softly on a quiet shore. Sylvie started up; her pale cheeks flushed; she clasped her hands: she gave the sea she had loved, so feared, so hated a long, passionate look, then, without uttering one word, she sank back and died.

"Well, Josephine," I said to the girl, the next morning, "did Sylvie forgive the sea, do you think?"

"Sylvie died like a Christian, monsieur," rather tartly answered the girl, "and Christians must forgive their enemies."

"Very true; but did Sylvie forgive that enemy?"

"I do not know, monsieur; it was her business, not mine, 'dryly retorted Josephine; "besides," she hurriedly added, "if she did hate the sea, poor thing, it was as we hate, or ought to hate, the Evil One, you know."

Was it so? Was Sylvie's a moral hate, if I may so speak, misplaced and mistaken in its object, but not unjustifiable in its source? To say the truth, readers, this is a point I fear these very dark depths in that woman's soul, depths which she herself had never sounded. I fear that hers was not the forgiveness of love, but the rebellion of a stern pride against pitiless strength. I fear it, but, remembering the deep religious faith of her race, I shall not be expected of her sin, and that Heaven has had mercy on one who suffered much and died of her grief.

Years afterward I was once more at Dieppe. There she sleeps, with the waves ever breaking and roaring at the foot of the cliff on which stands the little church with its dead around it.

WANDERING WILLIE.

WILLIE went out one morning
The first of the sun to see;
He heard a rivulet laughing,
And all the world was free.

The river had run for a thousand years,
Willie had lived for three.

Down by the singing river
He threw off the traces of their bed;
"Tis me to be king of the castle,"
Said Will, with a haughty head.
He shouldered a stick for a sentry's gun,
Pacing with martial tread.

Oh! mother sheep was feeding—
"What brings him, that boy, this way?"
She slowly raised her head.
The warrior edged away;
The one that was dumb was in earnest then,
Bleating a deeper note.

"This is the giant," said Willie,
"And I am the valiant knight;
If only he would not come quite so close,
I'd run him through at sight."
The sheep followed closer, and closer yet,
Willie grew white with fright.

Over the hedge went Willie,
Over the ditch as well;
The ground it was soft, and no limb was earned,
Save only one dimpled knee.
"This is the end of romance,
And I am the slain," said he.

"Carry me home, ye maidens,"
As nurse with a frown appears.
"I am a wounded knight,
Lost for a hundred years."
"Moments," said nurse, serenely;
"Time to wash your private fears."
"Nobody missed me!" cried Willie,
The hero dissolved in tears.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY should an order for the bottoming of a pair of chairs be treated with reverence?—Because it's a sole 'em affair.

ON a recent occasion one of our friends was coming down from Albany, and it appeared—as luck would have it—that there sat opposite to him, in the cars, a gentleman with remarkably long legs, which he was in the very particular habit of doubling up into set-friend's knees. As the afternoon of the train drew along he, the long-legged man observed, in his customary, lofty manner, that he was afraid his legs were going to be a source of annoyance to his fellow-passengers. "Not at all," said our friend, "for I am quite sure they are too long by half already."

"My friend," said a seedy person to an acquaintance at the ferry, "I wish you would loan me two quarters to cross the ferry. I think I got a dollar in the world." "Well, I would like to know," was the reply, "what difference it makes to a man who hasn't got a dollar in the world which side of the river he is on?"

NOTICE OF MOTION—The railway whistle.

THE RITUALISTIC SHIRT.
A Sweet Thing for the Laity.

A VERY SMALL BOY'S COMPOSITION—SUBJECT, "GIRLS."

I don't like girls. Girls is different from what boys is. Girls don't play marbles, and when don't you boys cry. I played hookey once, and got whipped for it. Girls sometimes gets whipped, but not so much as boys; their clothes ain't so well suited for it: that is the reason, I suppose. I never sees girls play base ball, but they say they do in Boston. There is plenty of girls in Boston and big organs. Last year, when I was young, the teacher made me set with the girls because I was naughty. I cried. Big boys like girls better than little boys. I went on a sleigh-ride one night with my sister Nancy and Tom Styles. He's now going to New Hartford, and when we got up by Peter's swamp, Tom asked me to look in the bottom of the sleigh for his whip; while I was looking he fired off a torpedo. I asked him if he had any more torpedoes, and he said no, but he tired of another when I wasn't looking. Girls don't like to have men kiss them, they always say "don't." If they wasn't fools they would turn their heads the other way, but they never do that. I saw Tom kiss Nancy once, and I went and told my mother. Then my mother put me to bed. When a girl takes out her handkerchief in the street you bet her nose the young man who runs their living by standing in front of the Pine block always wipe their noses at the same time if they see her. Girls get married sometimes, but not always. Those that don't get married don't want to. When they get married they have a wedding-cake. I like wedding-cake, but I do not see any fun in getting married, especially to a girl.

A STAMP ACT—Treading upon people's toes.

AN advertisement of cheap shoes in a country paper has the following note bene: "After washing these cheap shoes will do well to call soon, as they won't last long."

RAILWAY BONES—Coupling irons.

SPECIAL REPORTERS—Signal-guns.

TO A LADY WHO KISSED HER HAND TO ME.

Such favors have no charm for me
They leave me cold as any stone:
Kisses are fruit which must be shook
Unless we pluck them from the tree.

AN eloquent orator proposes to "grasp a ray of light from the portals of day, spin it into a thread of gold, and with them weave a shroud in which to wrap the whirlwind which dies upon the bosom of our Western prairies." We fear the machinery will break before the fabric is through the loom.

VALUABLE RECIPES.

To remove freckles, cut them out with a razor and throw them away. They will never return.

To bring out a healthy blush, tie it to a strong cord, twenty feet long, to the other end of which attach a heavy weight, and throw, and there the ladies obtain a fourth story window.

To produce a fair complexion, go to sea in a crazy old boat, and the first gale you get into your face will become white.

To get rid of red hair, hold your head for a few minutes in a strong blaze of gas.

To preserve your eyes, put them in a bottle filled with alcohol.

To avoid corpulence, quit eating.

To conceal bad teeth, keep your mouth shut.

To keep out of debt, acquire the reputation of a rascal—no one will trust you.

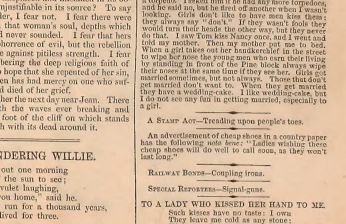
To become a complete book-keeper, borrow all the books you can and never return them.

To keep your doors from being broken open by burglars, have no doors to them.

To keep out of a fight, stay by yourself.

To gain true wisdom, go to sea.

To keep from stuttering, don't talk.



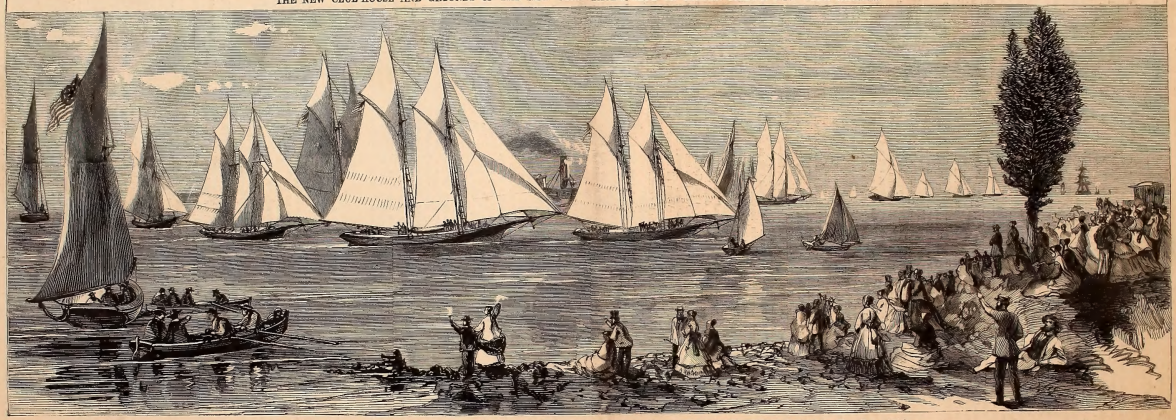
MRS. HEAVYSIDE, getting into an omnibus the other day, found that the only vacant seat in the door was the grumbling remark: "Omnibuses were not made for elephants." To which she replied: "Omnibuses are like Noah's ark, intended to carry all sorts of beasties."

A clergyman, in the course of a sermon, recently remarked: "You need not clasp your hands so fervently in prayer that you can't get them open when the contribution-box comes round."

The following squib, which appeared in the London Measure for 1777, does not come very wide of the mark at the present day:

Give Chloe a mushel of horse-hair and wool,
Of paste and pomatum a pound:
Two yards of gay ribbon to deck her sweet skull,
And gauze to encompass it round."

"Well, what is it that causes the saltness of the water of the ocean?" answered a teacher of a little boy. "The cod-fish," replied the little original.



A RECRUITING SERGEANT.

"The Pope has sent a Recruiting Officer to the United States to enlist Troops for the Papal Guard. Garibaldi has protested."—Ocean Telegram.

THE NEW CLUB-HOUSE AND GROUNDS OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB ON STATEN ISLAND, NEW YORK HARBOR.

NEW YORK YACHT CLUB REGATTA, JUNE 18, 1868—THE START FROM THE STAKE-BOAT IN THE NARROWS.—[SEE PAGE 420.]

FIRE-ENGINE EXPLOSION.

FOR the second time in the history of steam fire-engines—now twelve or fifteen years old—an explosion has occurred. The first took place in Cincinnati several years ago, and was attended with severe loss of life. The second occurred in New York, with equally disastrous effect. We give on this page an illustration of the latter casualty.

At nine o'clock on the evening of June 18 a fire was discovered in the top floor of No. 53 Bowery, nearly opposite the Old Bowery Theatre; and among the several steam-engines which hurried to the spot was that of Company No. 1, the first steam-engine built for New York. The fire was soon extinguished, and the Company was under orders "to take up" the hose, preparatory to returning to the engine-house, when a most terrible explosion occurred. At the same moment an act of the performance at the Old Bowery Theatre had just concluded, and a crowd of men and boys poured out of the theatre upon the side-walk and very near to the engine. The explosion was frightful in its effect. The huge machine was lifted as by a giant hand clear from the street, poised an instant in mid-air, then sent with terrible force, crushing and crushed, upon the sidewalk. Masses of iron, grate-bars, and pieces of rods were torn from the frame-work and hurled through the crowd of human beings, being thrown in some instances a distance of one hundred feet. The steam from the rent boiler seethed and scalded its way through the dense mass of humanity at the same moment, and with both the scalding steam and the mangling iron came the terrible noise of the explosion, as it shook the neighboring houses, and with it that still more awful sound, the shrieks of human agony. Our engraving represents the scene at this moment.

EXPLOSION OF A STEAM FIRE-ENGINE IN THE BOWERY, NEW YORK, JUNE 18, 1868.

The disaster resulted in the instantaneous death of four persons, and the wounding of twenty-three others, one of whom died soon after reaching the hospital, and others are supposed to be fatally injured.

DISRAELI AND GLADSTONE.

THE photograph frequently lies; it is never absolutely true. Every artist knows that only flat surfaces can be represented by the photograph with perfect fidelity, and that every protuberance is exaggerated in size. In a portrait, therefore, the nose must appear larger than it ought, and all other prominences will be proportionally exaggerated. Apart from this exaggeration, there is a still more important falsehood. The expression of the face is true only for that moment which is fixed upon for its representation, and is consequently false to every other moment of that face's infinitely varied symbolism. Hence portrait-painting has, notwithstanding its greater expense, survived photography. Hence, too, it frequently happens that character-sketches give a far truer representation of the countenance than the best photographs. Even the caricatures in Punch of the portraits of British statesmen give us more faithful pictures than the sun can make, for their exaggeration is not artificial, but gives prominence to characteristic features. Pictorial, like dramatic representation, demands this exaggeration in order to fidelity, because it is only representation, and needs this help to make it as effective as the reality.

The accompanying portraits of DISRAELI and GLADSTONE are character-sketches, and illustrate what we have just said. They are not so much exaggerated as the portraits in Punch, and yet sufficiently so to bring before us the living men. The dress, the pose, and the cast of the countenances, all tend to this one effect, and the semblance to reality so strongly affects us that we forget that it is only a semblance after all.

There are in Great Britain no other two men whose portraits, thus produced, would interest our readers equally with these. They are the leading antagonists, not simply in the struggle of two great parties for power, but in one of the mightiest conflicts which ever agitated the minds and hearts of Englishmen.

These men are as different as the artist has in these portraits represented them. They belong to different races; while GLADSTONE was at Oxford, DISRAELI was a wandering Jew in Syria, without wealth or position. Their education and experience have been alike diverse. In GLADSTONE we remark at once the ease of the polished scholar, and the practical, far-seeing sagacity of the earnest and accomplished statesman. To this man, we feel, success came readily; wealth and influence were for him secure at the outset, and to win the highest honors he needed only to be industrious, patient, and faithful, on the one hand, to his conservative instincts, and on the other, to his liberal reason and mature convictions. He might have to wait, but he need not strive.

THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

THE RIGHT HON. BENJAMIN DISRAELI.

How different has it been with DISRAELI? Greater in genius than GLADSTONE, and with a consciousness of his greatness, his victories have all been won against tremendous odds, wrested from the hands of reluctant fate. In his "Contingly" he pictured his own destiny: "The greatness of this city destroys my misery," said Coningsby, 'and my genius shall conquer its greatness." This conviction of power in the midst of despair was a revelation of intrinsic strength. It is indeed the test of a creative spirit. From that moment all petty feuds for an ordinary fame quitted him. He felt that he must be prepared for great sacrifices, for infinite sufferings; that there must devolve on him bitter mistakes of obscurity, envy, and hatred, vulgar prejudice, base criticism, petty hostilities; but the dawn would break and the hour arrive when the welcome morning hymn of his success and his fame would sound and be re-echoed." DISRAELI had mighty aspirations, and he has at length gained the summit of the hard hill up which he had been climbing for more than a score of years. How long he will remain there rests upon the decision of the people in the approaching election.

With all his unquestioned inspirations DISRAELI scarcely ever loses his temper, and is not excelled in courtesy and urbanity—certainly not by his great rival, who, from the very consciousness of his feeling, is sometimes hot-headed and rash. GLADSTONE rests all his chances for success upon the sincerity of his convictions, DISRAELI upon his conscious power. The former, in the face of defeat, retires; the latter, not so scrupulous in his use of instrumentalities, gains the field "only after he has wielded every available weapon and thoroughly searched every quiver and every armor of his foe." To-day DISRAELI will predict revolution as the result of the policy of his antagonists, and to-morrow he will employ revolution for the accomplishment of his own ends. GLADSTONE thinks of England, DISRAELI only of himself. And it is a curious illustration of the present conflict between these two men—between the strongest party leader and the greatest statesman of England—that their bearing in relation to the Church Establishment have been exactly reversed. GLADSTONE, hitherto the ablest champion of Church and State, now stands with one blow to destroy that establishment in Ireland, while DISRAELI, who formerly denounced the Irish Church as an injustice to Ireland, has now become its strongest champion. This fact is significant. DISRAELI, on partisan grounds, attacks the perpetuation of that which he knows to be an outrage upon Ireland, while GLADSTONE would have justice done in spite of any immediate effect which might ensue to the alliance between the Church and State of which he has always been an advocate. GLADSTONE obliterates his own prejudices when justice demands and opportunity favors reform, while DISRAELI stands ready to use any prejudice—even one which he has never adopted as his own—for the advancement of his selfish designs.

In the window of WHEELER & WILSON, No. 625 Broadway, may be seen their Paris Gold Medal, an illustration of the Exposition at Paris; their No. 1 and No. 300,000 Sewing Machine (the former having been in constant use fifteen years); their new Button-hole Attachment, for families and manufacturers, making one thousand buttonholes a day; their new and unique Hemmer, and a miniature working model, fac similie of WHEELER & WILSON'S Machine, complete in every part, with case of elaborately carved tortoise-shell, which was one of the handsomest gems at the Paris Exposition.—[Mail.]

KALLISTON.—To the beautifying influence of BURNETT'S KALLISTON thousands of ladies owe the preservation of their complexions during the season. Apply it in the evening, and it will undo all the mischief the wind and sun may have done to the skin during the day. Tan, freckles, headache, redness, prickly heat, blotches, etc., vanish under its cooling, purifying operation, like mists wafted away by the breeze.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN. The only reliable Remedy for those Brown Discolorations on the face is PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. $2 Sold every where.

For BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the FACE, use PERRY'S COMEDONE AND PIMPLE REMEDY. Order from Druggist, or DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y.

$15 GET THE BEST. $15

ORODIDE GOLD WATCH CO.,
IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS,
78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

Orolide is a new composition resembling Gold, retains its color and brilliancy. The ORODIDE GOLD WATCHES are in hunting cases (Ladies' and Gentlemen's), manufactured at our factory, and selected from the best materials, of the most approved styles, jeweled, and beautifully finished; are guaranteed reliable TIME-KEEPERS. As to appearance, durability, etc., have never been surpassed, very seldom equaled, by watches of the most rare and costly description. Warranted one year. Price $15, payable to Express on receipt of the Watch.

In order to prevent the public from imposition, have concluded to retail our celebrated watches.

SECRET ART OF CATCHING FISH in any water at set first can put them into practice, containing, sent for 30c. by JULIUS RISING, Southwick, Mass.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN,
MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN,
and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by
PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."
Renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION
SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.
Aids is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been established 20 years.
For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance.
For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.
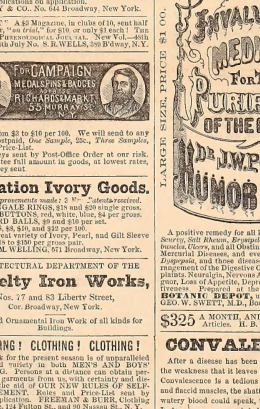
PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"
for the bath, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR
THE HANDKERCHIEF
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PHALON & SON, 37 Broadway, N.Y.

S. T. 1860.—X.



SIX P's—Poets—Painters—Preachers—Players—Printers—and Politicians—all suffer from Dyspepsia, Nervousness, Loss of Appetite, Liver Complaints, and the diseases which they may cure or prevent by the use of PLANTATION BITTERS. If those sufferers took these Bitters, the Poetry would be purer, the Paintings grander, the Sermons livelier, the Acting truer, the Printing better, and the Politics honester. This splendid tonic invigorates the system, and enables the brain to work healthily.

Perhaps no article was ever so well endorsed by all who have used it.

MAGNOLIA WATER—A delightful toilet article —superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

BOOSEY'S
CHEAP MUSIC.
Parlor Piano-Forte Music. In Books, Fifty Cents Each.
Brinley Richards's and G. A. Osborne's Twelve Favorite Pieces . . . . . 50c.
Schumann's Twenty-two Pieces . . . . . 50c.
Leybach's Six Popular Pieces . . . . . 50c.
Kuhe's Eight Fantasias . . . . . 50c.
Strauss's Twelve Waltzes, etc. . . . . 50c.
Mendelssohn's Music to Midsummer Night's Dream, complete . . . . . 50c.
Mailed on receipt of price. Catalogues of cheap musical publications on application.
BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, New York.

"TRY IT." A $5 Magazine, in clubs of 10, sent half a year, "on trial," for $1.00, or only $1 and 20 PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. New Vol.—48th —begins with July No. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

Prices from $2 to $10 per 100. We will send to any address, postpaid, One Dozen of these Stencils, 50c., with Price-List.
An answer sent by Post-Office Order at our risk. We guarantee full amount in goods, at lowest rates, for all money sent.

Imitation Ivory Goods.
Great Improvements made; 2 ½" "checks received.
MARTINGALE RINGS, $18 and $20 single gross.
SHEET BUTTONS, 4-hole, 16 line, long & per gross.
BILLIARD BALLS, $9 and $10 per set.
CHESS MEN, $2 per box.
Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $18 to $30 per gross.
WM. M. WELLING, 571 Broadway, New York.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE
Novelty Iron Works,
Nos. 17 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.
Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!
Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in GENT'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect fits guaranteed by sending for rules and Price-List, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Price-List sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & BURR, Clothing Warehouse, 154 Fulton Street, Astor Place, N. Y.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 569 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the best improved reliable Machines. Examine Machine, styles, or send stamp for circular to Depot, 569 Broadly.

A NIP OF A MUSQUITO IS NOTHING,
For if I have a painful sty,
I call for Cuticura,
And sop and soak my swollen eye—
It cures in every case.

Why, a sty on the eye-lid is a hundred times worse than all the bites of gnats or mosquitoes. Don't you know that Wolcott's Pain Paint will cure a sty in less than one day, and I have awful eye. Still more, I cure boils with it, and they never break at all, for the Pain Paint evaporates out the inflammation and cures through the pores, instead of having it rot out in corruption, as they used to. And don't you forget it is to the surface! I tell you what, Pain Paint is trump. It won't ever scorch; it don't stain, and it don't stink. Know more about it, try it, free of cost, at Dr. WOLCOTT'S office, No. 444 Broadway, New York, as hundreds are doing every day, and you will swear that it is the very best thing for pain and fever ever invented.

QUARTER OF A MILLION PIANISTS
are indebted to Richardson's New Method for their ability to play well.
This book continues to be the Standard Method of Piano Instruction from Beginner to Artist. Price $4.
Sent postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 451 Broadway, New York; CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

THE COUPONS
OF THE
First Mortgage Bonds
OF
THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY
DUE JULY 1st, 1868.
Will be paid on and after that date,
IN GOLD COIN, Free of Government Tax,
At the Company's Office,
No. 20 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.
Schedules with twenty or more Coupons will now be received for examination, and Gold Checks for the same will be delivered June 30th.
JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer.

New Spring Goods
FOR GENTLEMEN.
ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.
UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

LOVE OR MARRIAGE? A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and genuinely inspiring.—London Review.
The composition of a cultivated mind; it is full of thought, of fanciful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatical remarks, and it is eloquent in suggestiveness.—London Leader.
The tale is simple enough, but well told, and in that lies its chief charm.—Athenæum.
This novel is one of great power. . . It is certainly the production of an imagination—we may almost say of a genius—which we should conceive fully capable of work of art that might live.—Spectator.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Scarce! Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

A positive remedy for all kinds of Humor, Scrofula, Scrofula Humor, Erysipelas, Nettle Rash, Boils, Carbuncles, Ulcers, and all Obstinate Affections of the Skin; Mercurial Diseases, and every Taint of the System; Dyspepsia, and those diseases originating in the Derangement of the Digestive Organs. Dr. J. Bilious Complaints. Neuralgia, Nervous Affections, Headache, Lumbago, Loss of Appetite, Depression of Spirits, and Costiveness. Prepared at the NEW ENGLAND BOTANIC DEPOT, under the supervision of GEO. W. SWETT, M.D., Boston, Mass.

$325 A MONTH, AND EXPENSES. 28 New Articles. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

CONVALESCENCE.
After a disease has been conquered, there is still the weakness that it leaves behind it to be removed. Convalescence is a critical state. If the enfeebled and flaccid muscles, the shattered nerves, the thin and watery blood could speak, they would cry for help. In too many cases such help as is given them is not of the right kind. The fiery stimulants of commerce do harm. They kindle a temporary flame, which is a mockery. Their effect passes, and the last state of him who uses them is worse than the first. Not such is the effect of

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

There is no drawback to its toning properties. It has been found

The Great Medicine of the Age

for sustaining and bracing up the enfeebled constitution—no matter how much debilitated—as it not only bestows strength, but soothes the nervous system and allays all excitement in the frame. While this exceptional preparation possesses such effective properties, it is perfectly safe and is agreeable to the taste.

Attempts have been made to rival it. They have failed. Can it be necessary to say why they have failed? Ask the recovered dyspeptic, bilious sufferer, victims of fever and ague, and nervous subjects who have experienced its effects, what they think of it. Ask them, and be guided by what they say.

As a household medicine it is available at all times in cases of indigestion, bilious and other fevers, and all diseases arising from an impure condition of the stomach or liver.

640 MILES
OF THE
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD

Are now finished and in operation. More than twenty thousand men are employed, and it is not impossible that the entire track, from Omaha to Sacramento, will be finished in 1869 instead of 1870.

The UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY receive:

I.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of the right of way, and all necessary timber and other materials found along the line of its operations.

II.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of 12,800 acres of land to the mile, taken in alternate sections on each side of its road. This is an absolute donation, and will be a source of large revenue in the future.

III.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of United States Thirty-year Bonds, amounting to from $16,000 to $48,000 per mile, according to the difficulties to be surmounted on the various sections to be built. The government takes a second mortgage as security, and it is expected that not only the interest, but the principal amount may be paid in services rendered by the company in transporting troops, mails, &c.

IV.—A GOVERNMENT GRANT of the right to issue its own FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS, to aid in building the road, to the same amount as the U. S. Bonds issued for the same purpose, and no more. The Government has appointed Trustees for the First Mortgage Bondholders to deliver the Bonds to the company only as the road is completed, and also it has been examined by United States Commissioners and pronounced to be in all respects a first-class railroad.

V.—A CAPITAL STOCK SUBSCRIPTION from the stockholders, of when over Eight Million Dollars have been paid in upon the work already done, and which will be increased as the wants of the company require.

VI.—NET CASH EARNINGS on its Way Business, that already exceed the whole year's interest on the First Mortgage Bonds. These earnings are no indication of the vast through traffic that must follow the opening of the line to the Pacific, but they do prove that upon such a property, costing nearly three times their amount,

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

Are Secure beyond any Contingency.

The Union Pacific Bonds run thirty years, are for $1000 each, and have coupons attached. They bear annual interest, payable on the first days of January and July at the Company's Office in the City of New York, at the rate of six per cent. in gold. The principal is payable in gold at maturity. The price is 102, and at the present rate of gold they pay a liberal income on their cost.

The company believe that at the present price their Bonds are the cheapest security in the market, and reserve the right to advance the price at any time. Subscriptions will be received in New York

AT THE COMPANY'S OFFICE,
No. 20 NASSAU STREET,
And by JOHN J. CISCO & SON,
No. 59 WALL STREET,
And by Leading Bankers generally throughout the United States.

Remittances should be made in drafts or other funds par in New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local agents, will look to them for their safe delivery.

A PAMPHLET and MAP FOR 1868 has just been published by the Company, giving fuller information than is possible in an advertisement, respecting the Progress of the Work, the Resources of the Country traversed by the Road, the Means for Construction, and the Value of the Bonds, which will be sent free on application at the Company's offices or to any of the advertised agents.

JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer,
JUNE 19, 1868. New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Have just Published:

I.
HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST. The Spanish Conquest in America, and its Relation to the History of Mankind. By ARTHUR HELPS. Complete in Four Volumes. Vol. III. just ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50 per vol.

II.
BELLOWS'S OLD WORLD. The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. Vol. I. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75.

III.
LOOMIS'S METEOROLOGY. A Treatise on Meteorology. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and Author of a "Course of Mathematics." 8vo, Sheep extra, $3 00.

IV.
RUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Scripture History and the Book of Psalms. By FREDERICK WILLIAM RUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite." Edited, translated under the express Sanction of the Author by MARY E. BAKER, M.A. With a Letter from Dr. Rummacher to the American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 75c., 85c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 75c., 85c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 85c., 90c., $1, $1 10.; best, $1 30 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 85c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 10; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars may have to pay a little more for Tea or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but large orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Heretofore we have sent a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club; but our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Tea-Houses store-rooms and warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction; if they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees to about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as successors of our establishment, or over our name either wholly or in part, as they are Bogus on Imitation.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

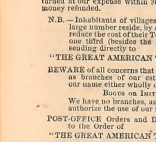
GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

TO THE LADIES.

We are Agents for over ONE HUNDRED Foreign and Domestic Manufactories, and are prepared to furnish the whole country with DRY and FANCY GOODS, SILKS, SHAWLS, JEWELRY, SILVER-WARE, FURNITURE, SEWING MACHINES, PIANOS, &c., &c., at the smallest price of

ONE DOLLAR FOR EACH ARTICLE.

Send your clubs of ten and upward for descriptive checks, showing what article can be obtained for One Dollar, with fac-simile for each check.



CIRCULARS SENT FREE.

Presents worth from $2 to $400 sent free of charge to agents sending clubs.

AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN.

CUSHMAN & CO.,
10 Arch Street, Boston.

SOMETHING NEW.—Agents wanted to sell the LEMAIRE SPINNING FISH-HOOK, the best in the market. Send 25 cents for Sample and particulars. Address LENHART & CO., Box No. 849, New Brunswick, N. J.

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, cased in Swedish silver. The Improved Aluminum Bronze is a metal undiffering entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them to excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $18. Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of Chains, also Aluminum Bronze Cases, for William Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

Address CHARLES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $18. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will only state positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the New York Independent.

Our readers have probably observed in our paper advertisements of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to have good time-keeping qualities, and in a case which is ornamental and durable, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in all classes of society who would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time. The Oroide Watch appears to suit their cases exactly.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

WEST BOYLSTON, Worcester Co., Mass., December 9, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I have received the watch you sent per the Adams Express, and like it very well. It keeps good time; is of a handsome appearance. I shall recommend it to my friends, and may call upon you to send me one of the same kind. I may be able to get some other orders for you ere long. When you send it, direct it to Dover de Glaize, Md., as that is the nearest point for me to get it. Trusting to hear from you soon, I remain, yours, &c.,

V. D. BARCOCK.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

YORK, PA., December 16, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—I received the Watch to-day, and I am very much pleased with it. It is in reality better than you advertise. There are five persons who will send for the same watch in a few days. Yours respectfully,

JOHN ARKANIAN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

STEVENS' MERCHANTS' UNION EXPRESS, SUPERIOR, DEC. 4, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—Please send me a half dozen Oroide Watches, gents' and ladies' and large sizes. Which you send by the 20th of November is all around, and worth four times its cost. I will send a great many watches. Please send me samples of your chains. I am going to keep two or three men traveling all the time. Very truly yours, R. H. RICHMOND.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GREENWOOD, Nov. 25, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—Myself and three others wish you to send four of your Imitation Gold Watches, at $18 each, gentlemen's size, and receive our acceptance. Send by express. Marquette County, Lake Superior, Michigan, by express to Negaune, for Michael Lynch, Michael Connal, John Sheehen, and Henry Young —all of Greenwood. Your watch keeps time here. Yours, &c., MICHAEL LYNCH.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

FORT HARKER, KANSAS, Nov. 27, 1867.

SIRS,—I wish you to send me a watch. I made quite a spec. on the last watch. I want this watch well finished, for they will sell well. Several of my friends have received watches from me, and they like them very well. Send by the U. S. Express. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P.S.—Forward to Ellsworth City, Kas. H. C. COLLINS, Lieut. U. S. Army.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SALEM, OREGON, December 12, 1867.

GENTS,—I did not receive this place as soon as I expected when I wrote you from Dallas, but was gone when I arrived yesterday to find that my order was filled, and the watches in the express office. I like the watches well, especially the large one. My brother will start for New York in a few days, and will call on you. Thanking you for your promptness, I remain yours, JOHN T. CROMWELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

LA GRANGE, ORNE, January 15, 1868.

SIRS,—I am glad to say that the watch for my friend gave entire satisfaction; and, as he deals in the article, you may expect further orders; and, as I am not confidence in you, we will forward the money. I am really having it registered, to save $1 paying expenses back on the money. Hoping you will deal promptly with me, we remain yours, &c., by the U. S. Express. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P.S.—Forward to Ellsworth City, Kas. WEST NEWTON, January 15, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SALEM, OREGON, December 12, 1867.

GENTS,—I did not receive this place as soon as I expected when I wrote you from Dallas, but was gone when I arrived yesterday to find that my order was filled, and the watches in the express office. I like the watches well, especially the large one. My brother will start for New York in a few days, and will call on you. Thanking you for your promptness, I remain yours, JOHN T. CROMWELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

LA GRANGE, ORNE, January 15, 1868.

SIRS,—I am glad to say that the watch for my friend gave entire satisfaction; and, as he deals in the article, you may expect further orders; and, as I am not confidence in you, we will forward the money. I am really having it registered, to save $1 paying expenses back on the money. Hoping you will deal promptly with us, we remain yours, &c., by the U. S. Express. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P.S.—Forward to Ellsworth City, Kas. WEST NEWTON, January 15, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTS,—Please send me, C. O. D., two of your Oroide Watches, gents' watch: want one of them most as plain a case as you have, the other one carved. Also send me a few of your chains. Send to Lima, Allen Co., Ohio, by M. U. Express. Respectfully yours, C. M. COWEN.

P.S.—The Ladies' Watch you sent me was all that I could ask for the money. It keeps good time, and is a beautiful article. C. M. COWEN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

PORT HENRY, N. Y., January 15, 1868.

Please send me per express two watches, gents' size; and if they prove to be as good as the one you sent me, I think I will want more. D. A. WARNER.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

GRANT & COLFAX.
A NEW AND AUTHENTIC LIFE OF GRANT, by Hon. J. T. Headley. Now ready. $2 50. An authentic LIFE OF COLFAX, with a splendid Portrait, in prose. Price 25 cts., which we give to our subscribers to the Life of Grant. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.

THE LITTLE JOKER.—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address for 25 cts. Address B. W. HITCHCOCK, 16 Spring St., New York Inquire (with Cent. St. Nicholas Hotel.

Campaign Sleeve-Buttons.

IMITATION IVORY.

Perfect Likenesses of Grant and Colfax,
in relief. Red, White, Blue, Black, and Brown.
$1 00 per pair. Sent free on receipt of price.
LARGE Discount to the Trade.
WM. M. WELLER, Patentee, 871 Broadway, N. Y.
AGENTS WANTED.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circular containing full information about these presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

BEAUTIFUL WOMEN.—National types: English, French, German, American, Turkish, Spanish, Grecian, Swiss, Polish, Chinese, Swedish, Dutch, Japanese, etc., etc., in our New Illustrated Photographic JOURNAL, 36 cts., or $3 a year; clubs of 10, six months for one dollar. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

CAMPAIGN BADGES, Medals, Pins, Flags, and every thing to the trade. Liberal terms to Clubs and Agents. Send to Headquarters. 39 assorted samples sent postpaid for $1. Address B. W. HITCHCOCK, 16 Spring St., New York (under St. Nicholas Hotel).

THE

Old and Reliable Fall River and Newport Line

BETWEEN

NEW YORK & BOSTON.

☞ Passengers by this route are assured of a comfortable night's rest on boats combining, with the best sea-going qualities, speed, elegant furnishings, and a table supplied with the best the market affords.

THE SPLENDID STEAMBOATS

NEWPORT, AND OLD COLONY,
Capt. WM. BROWN, Capt. A. N. MILLER,

ALTERNATE DAILY (SUNDAYS EXCEPTED),

Leaving New York from Pier 28, North River, Foot of Murray Street, at 5 P.M.

Passengers can take Train on NEWPORT AND OLD COLONY RAILWAY from Newport, R.I., at 4.00 A.M., and arrive in Boston at 6.10, in time to connect with all Northern and Eastern Trains and Boats. Families can rest undisturbed. Breakfast on board. Or can take 7.45 A.M. Train, and ARRIVE IN BOSTON AT EARLY BUSINESS HOURS. Returning Trains leave OLD COLONY RAILWAY DEPOT, corner of Kneeland and South Streets, at 4.30 and 5.30 P.M.

MEALS FURNISHED ON THE EUROPEAN PLAN.

This is the only DIRECT ROUTE for NEWPORT, FALL RIVER, TAUNTON, NEW BEDFORD, MARTHA'S VINEYARD, MIDDLEBORO', the BRIDGEWATERS, PLYMOUTH, and ALL TOWNS ON CAPE COD, and NANTUCKET. Fares always as Low as by any other Line.

FOR FURTHER PARTICULARS INQUIRE OF THE AGENTS,

E. LITTLEFIELD, 72 Broadway, New York.
W. H. BULLOCK, Supt. O. C. & N. R. R., Boston.

New York, June 20, 1868.

ALL FOR $5.

One Piece Bleached Sheeting,
OR
One Piece Brown Sheeting,

and Descriptive Slips of SIXTY ARTICLES for sale at ONE DOLLAR each, will be sent to any person that will send us FIVE DOLLARS.

This includes a

REVOLUTIONS IN TRADE

ever heard of in the world!

WE ARE COMING
TO OFFER BETTER BARGAINS
Than any other Dollar Concern in the Country!

We send DESCRIPTIVE SLIPS and a PRINTED SCHEDULE of Goods we have for sale at ONE DOLLAR EACH,

FREE OF ALL CHARGES!

We do not require any one to send us ten cents in advance for gilt edges, and then send a printed slip stating that the person can receive for one dollar a Toy Elate valued at $5, but really worth but ten cents, or a Perfumed Cake Box worth but twenty-five cents.

We use no such trash in OUR DOLLAR SALE. Our Circulars state fare and square the articles which will be sent for the money received.

Send us $5 and give us a trial, or be sure and send for a Circular before ordering elsewhere.

PARNHAM & CO,
No. 24 Friend Street, Boston, Mass.

Indelible Pencils.

FOR MARKING CLOTHING, &c.: Single, 50 cts.; 3 for $1; per doz. $3 50.

FOR WRITING ON WOOD: Single, 50 cts.; two for $1; per doz. $4.

Send, freight prepaid, on receipt of price,

A Most convenient Book for Invalids.—Boston Journal.

"Invaluable for marking linen."—Chicago Tribune.

MANUFACTURED and for sale only by the INDELIBLE PENCIL CO., NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

☞ Liberal discounts to dealers every where.

TO CONSUMPTIVES. A Preacher of the Gospel, having cured his son of Consumption in its worst stages, after the doctors had given him up to die, and effected physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, which proved effectual in his own case, to such afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption; and he will send the RECIPE, free of charge, by mail. Please send it and will forward their address. Address DR. UNCAS MORSE, Box 1,000, Jersey City, New York.

ELMIRA FEMALE COLLEGE. This fully chartered College offers superior advantages for the most extensive and thorough education of young ladies, who may enter either the Collegiate, Eclectic, Preparatory, Ornamental, Musical, or Elocutionary course. Send for a Circular to REV. A. W. COWLES, D.D., President, Elmira, N. Y.

THE DOLLAR WATCH. The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, handsome case, glass crystal, white dial, and reliable movement. It is a good order; will denote correct time. Warranted for two years. Satisfaction guaranteed, and sent for $1; 3 for $2; or by express, C.O.D., on receipt of order. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Agents Wanted Every where.
THE BEST REAPER KNIFE GRINDER.

Made of FINE EMERY and VULCANIZED RUBBER, firm as steel, and ALWAYS TRUE. Cuts five times as fast as the common stone, and requires no water. Weighs but 20 pounds, is clamped to the machine, a plank, or table, runs easily by hand power, and is simple in the best and cheapest. Sent before you buy. For Circulars and BEST TERMS to Agents, address

E. G. STORKE, Auburn, N. Y.

INVENTORS wanting Patents, send for Circulars, to DODGE & KINNAN, 237 F St., Washington, D.C.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR ROWLAND'S

GRANT

AS A SOLDIER AND A STATESMAN.

An accurate history of his Military and Civil Career. In one large octavo volume, handsomely illustrated. Agents will find this the book to sell at the present time. For terms and specimen pages, address Newspaper and General Agents, and offer extra inducements to canvassers. Agents will see the advantages of dealing directly with the publishers. For descriptive circulars and terms address J. B. BURR & CO., Hartford, Ct.

MOWING MACHINE SECTIONS. — SWEET, BARNES, & CO., SYRACUSE, N. Y., will furnish Sections, either straight or cocked, to repair Blade of any Mowing Machine. In ordering sections, send to us by mail a figure of the Knife Head, which is easily made by marking around an old one and through the rivet-holes with a pencil. Upon receipt of this we will guarantee the Sections we send to fit on the bar, and we can, if requested, send Rivets for putting the Sections on. State the number of Sections wanted, and we can usually ship them on receipt of order. Our prices, to collect on delivery. We have one uniform price for Sections and Rivets, varying according to size, viz.: Sections, 12 to 15 cts. each; Rivets, 25 cts. per pound, or for less quantity, five Rivets for 1 cent. Address as above. SWEET, BARNES, & CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

$10 to $20 a Day, Sure,

And no money required in advance. Agents wanted every where, male or female, to introduce the Celebrated Wheeler Wire Clothes Lines. Address AMERICAN WIRE CO., 75 William St., N. Y., or 16 Dearborn St., Chicago.

GOLD! GOLD!—My GOLDEN COMPOUND will force the Beard to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days. Satisfaction given or money refunded. Sent free for 30 cents a package. Address FREDERICKS & CO., 45 Nassau St., Chicago, Illinois.

A RT of BURNISHED GILDING and ENGRAVING A. ON GLASS. For instructions, send stamp to FREDERICKS & CO., 45 Nassau St., Chicago, Ill.

8000 AGENTS wanted to sell 16 NEW INVENTIONS, of great value to families: all pay great profits to agents. Send 4 stamps and get two books and sample, gratis, postpaid. BENJAMIN BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Fever and Ague Cured in 24 Hours.

CARTER'S SPECIFIC, the great Southern remedy, for sale by druggists generally, and by my address upon receipt of One Dollar and Fifty Cents.

J. R. CARTER, M.D.,
144 North Howard Street, Baltimore, Md.

A WILD-GOOSE CHASE.

POLITICAL POSITION OF CHIEF-JUSTICE CHASE.

"WASHINGTON, May 28, 1868.

"MY DEAR SIR,—YOU are right in believing that I shall never abandon the great principles for the success of which I have given my entire life. I adhere to my 'old creed of equal rights,' without one jot or tittle of abatement. I shall be glad if the new professors of that creed adhere to it as faithfully. * * * It would, however, gratify me exceedingly, if the Democratic Party would take ground which would assure the party against all attempts to subvert the principle of universal suffrage established in eight, and to be established in all, of the Southern constitutions. Then, I think, the future of the great cause—for which I have labored so long—would be secure, and I should not regret my absence from political labors. SALMON P. CHASE."

GENTLEMAN (whose wife is engaged, assisted by the servant, with Planchette). "Well, Mrs. TOMKINS, are you not going to retire at all to-night?"

SERVANT. "Och! it's meself that's nearly dead for want of sleep."

TRY THE PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue. Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat box. Price 10 and 20 cts. Sold by all Grocers and by Plymouth Color Co. (C. T. Raymond & Co.,) 16 & 18 Fulton St., New York.

TAXIDERMISTS' MANUAL,

GIVING full instruction in Skinning, Mounting and Preserving Birds, Animals, Reptiles, Fishes, Insects, Eggs, Skeletons, &c. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of $1.00.

ADDRESS S. H. SYLVESTER, TAXIDERMIST, Middleboro', Mass.

REMEMBER, if you are out of employment, or wish to change your occupation, that the STENCIL BUSINESS can be profitably carried on in every city and town in the country, and that it requires but very little capital and skill. Tools and stock of the best quality and all necessary information furnished by M. J. METCALF & SON, 101 Union Street, Boston, Mass.

Live in My Heart

ASH PAT NO RENT. New Song - - - - - 30c.
THE EVE THAT BRIGHTENS WHEN I COME. - - - 30c.
TUSCANY HARD AGAINST THE SERBIAN - - - - 30c.
DREAM OF THE BALL—WALTZES—GODFREY - - 30c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 10c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1135 BROADWAY, 2d door above 25th St. Branch, 595 Bowery.

TRY
B. T. BABBITT'S TOILET SOAPS,

MADE FROM PURE VEGETABLE OILS.

CURES Chapped Hands, and in cleansing and healing the Flesh excels all other Soaps.

If your grocer does not keep this Toilet Soap, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the FACTORY,
64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

One Forward and two Backward Arches, insuring great strength, well balanced elasticity, evenness of point, and smoothness of execution, unsurpassed by any fourteen. One gross in twelve contains a Scientific Gold Pen. One Dozen Steel Pens (assorted points) and Patent Ink-containing Penholder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 and 113 William St., N.Y.

DRUNKENNESS CURED

BY UPHAM'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1.25 by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

To People who Reason:—It is because TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT reduces the heat of the blood by certain perspirative, and well as through its peculiar operation, that good cures and marvelous cures in hours of disease. SOLD by all druggists.

LAWN, SWISS, LINEN, and CAMBRIC

IN FOUR (QUADRUPLE),
FIVE (QUINTUPLE), and
EIGHT (OCTUPLE) ROWS,

TRADE-MARK.

For making and trimming
Ladies' and Children's Wear.

WARRANTED TO WASH and retain its original BEAUTY AND FULLNESS.

PATENT.

For Sale by the Fancy and Dry Goods Houses throughout the country.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, and Dissolving View Apparatus, with the improved Calcium Light, and several thousand artistically-colored Photographic Views on Glass, illustrating Art, Science, History, Travels, &c., &c. Priced and illustrated Catalogue free on application. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, No. 49 Nassau Street, New York.

GREAT NATIONAL FIREWORK CO. DEPOTS:
No. 33 Courtlandt St., and No. 294 Broadway, New York.
Unequaled in quality, brilliancy, and assortment for exhibition or private use.
LYON BROTHERS, Agents.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.

GOOD AGENTS wanted to introduce our new SIX SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE—Stitch alike on both sides. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. WE WILL CUSSOM MACHINES to responsible parties, AND OFFER EXTRAORDIC AGENTS ON A SALARY. Full particulars and sample work furnished on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in the B. BABBITT'S LOW LAUNCH. This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

Prof. S. BERENDSON, 86 Fulton St., New York City.
CELEBRATED BIRD-LIME
FOR CATCHING BIRDS.
On receipt of 50 cts. sent postpaid to any part of U. S.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,

AS IMPORTED FOR N. Y. UNION CLUB.

TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

ASTONISHING. The genuine ORIOLDE GOLD A WATCH; open hunting case, marked 18 carats equal to the BEST GOLD; worth $80, imported and sold by us only, at $15. Sent by express on receipt of $1, the balance paid on delivery. Address
BENTON & CO., 148 Fulton St., New York.

WANTED—AGENTS. $170 per month to sell the NATIONAL FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This machine is equal to the standard machines in every respect, and is sold at the low price of $30. Address NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Musical Boxes

Playing from 1 to 24 tunes, costing from $5 50 to $300 00. Every variety of the newest accompaniments: Voix Celestes (Celestial Voices), Organoclavier, Mandolines, Expressives, Piccolos, Bells, Drums, Castinets, &c., &c. Musical Boxes are very durable. They are fine ornaments for the Parlor, as well as pleasing companions for the invalid. Having given our special attention to that trade for over 20 years, we are able to supply every want quicker and better than any house in this country.
M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers, No. 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired.

PRINCE & COS
AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.
Forty thou sand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

"A MER. SCHOOL INST.," FOUNDED 1855, is a reliable Educational Bureau.
To aid all who seek well-qualified Teachers:
To represent Teachers who seek positions:
To give parents information of good schools:
To sell, rent, and exchange school properties.
Thirteen years' trial has proved the AMER. SCHOOL INSTITUTE a useful and effective auxiliary in securing "The Right Teacher for the Right Place."

Those who want Teachers should have the "Teachers' Bulletin," published in the AMERICAN EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY.
Those who want positions should have the "Application Form."
Circulars explaining plan, and giving Testimony from first-class educational and business men, sent when asked for.
J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,
14 Bond St., New York.
Branch Offices in San Francisco, Chicago, and Boston.

BRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed FREE by BRANG & CO., Boston.

WELLING'S
DYSPEPSIA TABLETS.

Pleasant to the Taste. Relieve and cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and all forms of the stomach trouble. Fifty Cents per box; sent, free of postage, for Sixty Cents. Sold by Druggists. S. B. WELLING, 371 Broadway.

MOORE'S LIFE
OF
Hon. Schuyler Colfax.

Authorized, Complete, and Correct Edition.

LIFE OF HON.
SCHUYLER COLFAX,
By REV. A. Y. MOORE,
OF SOUTH BEND, INDIANA.

WITH A STEEL PORTRAIT.

Complete in one large Duodecimo Volume.
PRICE $1 50 IN CLOTH.
And sent free of postage on receipt of price.

THE LIFE OF HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX. By Rev. A. Y. Moore, of South Bend, Indiana, who was for twelve years, as pastor and friend, in the entire confidence of Mr. Colfax, and had access to the files of the paper published by Mr. Colfax for twenty years, and to the Congressional Globe; knows all his past history and all who have known him from boyhood. He began this biography two or three years ago, so that it is not one of the hurried and ephemeral publications so common in election years. Mr. Moore is a gentleman of fine talent and culture, and there is no doubt but that his biography of Mr. Colfax will be worthy of its distinguished subject.

The following letter from Mr. Colfax to Rev. A. Y. Moore will explain itself:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 30, 1868.

"MY DEAR MR. MOORE:

As your prediction of a year ago has been realized, I have no further objection to your publishing my sketch, more or less full, of my life you may have prepared. As you were for a dozen years a fellow-townman of mine, and a valued friend, I suppose you know as much about my history as the public would care about knowing; and although my engrossing duties here leave me no time to revise the manuscript, I have no fear that your work will not be a faithful one.

Yours, very truly, SCHUYLER COLFAX.

"Rev. A. Y. MOORE, South Bend, Indiana."

It will be published on Wednesday next, July 1st, in a large duodecimo volume of several hundred pages, printed from large type and on the finest and best of white paper, with a portrait, on steel, of Mr. Colfax, executed by Illman Brothers, the well-known engravers, which has been pronounced by members of Congress and the personal friends of Mr. Colfax, who have seen a proof of it, to be the most perfect likeness ever taken of him, as well as a pretty bad, in print, on the market, from the photographic takes of Mr. Colfax within the last month—the whole bound in cloth in the most substantial manner. Price $1 50 a copy. Single copies of it will be sent to any one, at once, postpaid, on receipt of the retail price of it by the Publishers.

AGENTS & CANVASSERS WANTED.

Agents and Canvassers are wanted in every county, town, and village in the United States to engage in getting up lists of subscribers to "MOORE'S LIFE OF SCHUYLER COLFAX," which is going to have a very large and unprecedented sale. Large wages can be made.

WHOLESALE PRICES TO AGENTS.

☞ Booksellers, News Agents, Canvassers, and all others, are solicited to order at once what they may want of the above book, so that their orders may be filled out of the first edition, who will be supplied at the following low rates, for cash, or eight days' credit with order, viz.: 12 copies or one third off, or $12 00; 25 copies, or over, at Ninety-five Cents each; 50 copies, or over, at Ninety Cents each. Circulars, subscription lists, and show-cards gratis. Address all orders, for any quantity you may wish of it, large or small, to the Publishers,

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,
306 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

And they will send a copy of the above work, and if sending you per free express or mail after your order is received.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 602.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1868.

We are happy to announce that we shall shortly begin in HARPER'S BAZAR the publication of "THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD," a new Love Story, richly Illustrated, by the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "Aunt Margaret's Troubles," etc., which can not fail to interest and delight the reader.

MR. SEYMOUR AND TAXATION.

MR. SEYMOUR'S late speech in New York was constructed as a probable manifesto of the Democratic policy in the campaign, and inferentially as a designation of the candidate. It proved to be a complaint of high taxes, without proposing a remedy; a restatement of the old Copperhead theory of reconstruction, and a careful silence as to candidates. Probably most important readers of the speech felt that the author of the two letters declining the candidacy had decided to be a candidate.

Mr. SEYMOUR depicts the situation of the country as financially distressing and alarming. He dilates upon the depreciation of the currency. He professes a profound sympathy with the laboring class, oppressed by this horrible condition. The laboring class will, therefore, look eagerly to see what policy of redress this statesman proposes; and it will hear him say, with all the sagacity of the leader and sagacity of Patriarch in "Little Dorrit," that we must "make our money good by an honest and wise course." The orator says that "the cause of our troubles is, that our credit is tainted." His remedy is exquisitely simple: "Remove the taint." It is the advice of the statesmanlike spectator to the small boy in the fight, "My lad, go in and win!"

Since, then, our debt is our sorrow, and since the true policy is to appreciate the currency by an honest and wise course, to whom are we to look for honesty and wisdom? Naturally, says Mr. SEYMOUR—but in other words—to the political descendants and allies of SWARTOUT, and FLOYD, and HOWELL COBB; to the Democratic writers who display their economy, and honesty, and wisdom in the municipal government of New York; and to look for honesty to the party whose positive wing favors repudiation, and for wisdom to those who propose to undo reconstruction, and give political power in the Southern States exclusively to the ex-rebels.

Now there are many of the laborers and farmers and mechanics whom Mr. SEYMOUR, in this speech, as in all his speeches, endeavors to exasperate against their richer fellow-citizens, who are readers of this paper; and we ask them to look at a few facts which Mr. SEYMOUR has omitted. In the year 1860 his party was in full possession of the Government. The avowed policy of that party was to plant slavery by national authority in the Western Territories, which would have involved every laborer, farmer, and mechanic of the free States, who went West to settle, in direct rivalry with slaves and slave prices. The enormous and ruinous policy was repudiated by those laborers, farmers, and mechanics, and Mr. SEYMOUR'S party, which supported it, was thrown from power. Defeated in a fair election, in which they took part, the Southern Democratic leaders rebelled in arms. For four years the tremendous struggle lasted. The expenses were necessarily enormous. The taxation was necessarily great. The Government and the country were to be saved or lost. To prolong the war was vastly to increase that taxation and to pile the burden more heavily upon the laborer, farmer, and mechanic. But nothing could prolong it so much as want of unity and cordial co-operation in the free States.

This unity was every means conceivable, short of open war, was prevented by the Democratic party. HORATIO SEYMOUR palliated and justified the rebellion. He said that he would let the Union go rather than slavery. His attitude and that of his party encouraged and stimulated the rebels, perplexed and thwarted the Government, and unquestionably prolonged the war and the necessary taxation. But the courage and the resolution of the laborer, farmer, and mechanic, did not fail. They ended the war triumphantly. The rebellion of the Southern Democratic leaders, with its natural associations, was unconditionally suppressed. But the heavy burden of taxation remains, and the party whose policy occasioned the war and prolonged it is responsible for the debt. It is no wonder that with this damning party record the Albany Argus, Mr. SEYMOUR'S especial organ, said, upon the day after this last speech, "We demand that over this whole revolutionary past the veil of oblivion shall be cast." This party has not changed, it has not repented; but the offender "demands" that his crime of yesterday be forgotten, that he may commit to-day's crime with more impunity.

Mr. SEYMOUR instructs us to look for honesty and wisdom to escape the pressure of taxation to the party which produced it. Now relief can will be lightened when the production of the country is increased, and that production will increase when confidence is restored and not before, for distrust paralyzes industry. But nothing can restore confidence except the conviction that the settlement of our difficulties by reconstruction is permanent; and no settlement can be permanent which is not based upon equal rights. That, however, is a settlement which Mr. SEYMOUR and his party reject. They are, therefore, not only responsible for the debt and for the taxation, but for its continued pressure. The Republican policy, by bringing in the Southern States upon the only sound principle, has made the most important step toward that pacification which is the beginning of relief from taxation. To reopen the whole question, to sow still further dissension, to exasperate fellow-citizens, and consequently to prolong the unsettled condition of those States, and to postpone financial relief, this is the policy of HORATIO SEYMOUR and the party which increases the debt, the laborer, farmer, and mechanic that they are frightfully taxed, and that the only true safety for flies is to step into the spider's parlor.

THE ORNAMENTS OF TAMMANY HALL.

WE have been so fortunate as to procure what purports to be a copy of the Report of the Committee upon the Decorations of Tammany Hall, which was probably made at an early meeting of the Committee, and the results of which will undoubtedly be apparent in the superb ornamentation of the hall when the Convention assembles.

"The hall," begins this interesting document, "should, of course, be hung with portraits of eminent Democrats; and for the space over the President's chair we suggest a decoration consisting of the flags of the United States and the Confederate States fraternally intertwined, and the motto, as a beautiful symbol of Christian feeling, 'Let us have peace.' And true, but for the present unfortunate Democratic leader, JEFFERSON DAVIS, with the neat legend from one of his latest speeches:

"'I would rather fraternize with hyenas than Yankees.'

"The portrait of our BEAUREGARD naturally suggests itself. He may be with us in the flesh, but he will be present in spirit, and he has expressed his sympathy with the party. The portrait under his honored physiognomy should obviously be that which General FRANKLIN and SLOCUM, and their fellow 'Lincoln hirelings,' will readily recall. Our BEAUREGARD, in speaking of the late nefarious attempt of the United States Government to protect the negro and his Southern Democratic friends from freeing their 'country,' says:

"'All rules of civilized warfare are abandoned, and they (Generals FRANKLIN and SLOCUM and their friends) proclaim by their acts, if not on their banners, that their war-cry is "Booty and Beauty."'

"The Democratic head of the illustrious FORREST will be gratefully hailed. He is himself a portrait-painter, and will have no other inscription than: 'Our honored colleague as he appeared at Fort Pillow.'

"Should there be other delegates who took an equally active part in the late Democratic protest against BEAUREGARD'S 'reckless and unprincipled tyrant, LINCOLN, let their portraits be generally grouped, and a representation of the Andersonville prison pen be suspended, labeled, 'The Palladium of Southern Democratic liberties.'

"Of the splendid Northern statesmen of the party there must be, of course, a portrait of the favorite son of New York, HORATIO SEYMOUR, and one of ourselves by his celebrated sentence:

"'If it is true that slavery was established to save this Union, then the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw themselves from that Government which can not give them the protection guaranteed by its terms.'

"Or his other prophetic sentence, that to attempt to restore the Union by war would

"'Prove ruinous to the North, and develop the resources of the South.'

"Nor should a portrait of that stanch Democrat JOHN A. GREENE, of Syracuse, be wanting. What could be fitter for its motto than that outburst of sound Democratic doctrine upon the subject of the draft: 'I am for General FRANKLIN and General SLOCUM will remember.'

"Ye devils incarnate (the Government of the United States), who with hearts of adamant and tearless eye drag hundreds of thousands to your slaughter-pens, and demand the extermination of millions more of the very brothers of your blood—tremble!

"Shall we repudiate our PENDLETON—our Gentleman George, if we may seem familiar with that august name? Never. Beneath his canvas inscribe his immortal words:

"'If your differences are so great that you can not, or will not compromise them, then, gentlemen, let the seceding States depart in peace!'

"Let us have also the countenance—a mere mariner's bearing of the flag and Democrat; PARKE Reed, a blown Reed—of the family biographer of JAMES BUCHANAN; and surrounding the portrait, like a halo, Mr. REED'S inspiring words:

"'I deny, as I have ever done, . . . that the Federal

"We recommend with ardor a speaking portrait of our illustrious cavalry chief WADE HAMPTON—which our beloved brothers Generals FRANKLIN and SLOCUM will so gladly recognize. And for the motto what can be so appropriate as his very last public words, spoken less than a month ago, and which will be prophetic if we can only succeed at the polls:

"'The cause for which JACKSON [STONEWALL] and STUART fell can not be in vain; but, in some form, will yet triumph.'

"Then, BENJAMIN MAGOFFIN. Beneath the inspiring lineaments of this brave old Kentucky war-horse, who, we are glad to know, will be in the city, let the noble reply be displayed which as Governor he returned to the despot LINCOLN'S call for hirelings and Hessians—as General FRANKLIN and SLOCUM and their brethren will not forget to remember:

"'I say emphatically that Kentucky will furnish no troops for the wicked purpose of subduing her sister Southern States.'

"Nor must we forget the head of the Giant of the Nutmeg State, the sage THOMAS H. SEYMOUR, predecessor of the great and good ENGLISH, who, in the midst of the late lamentable and unconstitutional attempt at coercion directed against the patriotic and Democratic BEAUREGARD, FORREST, HAMPTON, and other brethren, wrote those words which form the most fitting of mottoes:

"'Depend upon it, Heaven will frown upon such a cause as this: it can not and will not come to good.'

"And the patriotic PIKE, speaking for the Democrats of New Jersey when the late Protest began:

"'I say emphatically they would go with the South from every quarter, peaceably, and patriotic reasons.'

"Then, as Arabian mosques are covered with Inscriptions from the Koran, let the great hall of Tammany be illuminated with sentences of the Democratic newspaper leaders, printed legibly in gold letters.

"Thus the denunciation by the Albany Argus of the outlay of $7,000 men by President LINCOLN as 'usurpation;' that blessed morsel of the Argus, on the morning after the attack on Sumter, that we had become 'two peoples;' and its Unionizing sentiment:

"'They (Generals FRANKLIN, SLOCUM, and their friends) made an idol of the idea of national unity, and, after sacrificing blood and souls to it, have ended by the sacrifice of thousands of bleeding bodies.'

"We suggest, also, these truly Democratic words from the Milwaukee News, to be printed in large capitals:

"'If GRANT wins a battle it is in part a triumph over the fundamental law of the Government. If SHERMAN conquers Atlanta the essential portion of the Constitution is thereby dead.'

"Add to these those memorable utterances of our own World, in denouncing the draft as 'the last odious resort of worse than Austrian despotism,' and in saying of President LINCOLN:

"'It has impelled most to that law to denounce as an oath breaker a man who has manifestly done his official utmost to pervert the war for the Union into a war for liberty. It has made abandonment of his office a crime no warrant in the Constitution than he can find no more warrant in the Constitution than he can find for abandonment of office by himself, thousand men mean wherewith to set up a monarchy with himself at its head. No terms on the low against hindering enlistments be evoked to silence denunciation of the crime of the perjurer than the crime of the tyrant.'

"Turn which way we may we find the same consoling and lofty sense. Cover the walls, then, with such portraits and such sentences. And if these things, and hundreds of thousands more like them, the words of our papers and orators, the resolutions of our State and National Conventions, the cheers and sympathy and hope of all the distinguished Southern Democrats when they were prisoners and in the field, do not show to our friends, the soldiers and sailors, that the Democratic party was the real war party, and to a candid country that it is the party of liberty, freedom, and the Constitution, what, in the name of truth and history, can?

"We pause, as we have been pausing ever since the Protest began, for a reply. All of which is respectfully submitted by the Committee on Decorations."

FRAUDS IN NATURALIZATION.

THE attention of members of Congress has been directed to this subject by those who wish to preserve the purity of the franchise; but we learn that some Western members legislate about urging appropriate legislation, on the ground that, being on the eve of a great election, some apprehension might be entertained by our foreign population that it was in truth aimed against any naturalization instead of against fraudulent naturalization merely.

The number fraudulently naturalized in this city alone is very large—some estimate it as high as ten thousand annually—and although fewer foreigners are arriving at this moment than usual, it is not to be doubted that there will be a sufficient number of immigrants to put the result in doubt, in some peril; and many of these will be admitted to citizenship by the opportunity for the combination of these frauds is allowed to continue.

An examination of the act of Congress to authorize naturalization shows that it requires person applying to be admitted, in order to accomplish the fraud, for the act contemplated that he should be considered a most solemn proceeding.

The third section provides "that the Court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the State or Territory where such Court is at the time held, one year at least; and it shall further appear to their satisfaction that during that time he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same."

All other countries impose guards over admission to citizenship, and such was the manifest intention of the act of Congress, but the mode of performing it was delicate and impossible but there shows that there is absolutely no real check.

As an important election approaches active preparation is always made at Tammany Hall to recruit its ranks from fresh importations, and although its original aim was to secure only the favor of the Democracy, it soon attempted to control the result in the State, and now aspires to affect the Presidential contest—no other limit being imposed upon its means than the present paucity of arrivals. Blank certificates of naturalization are prepared and kept by the clerks of courts, some printed plainly, others with colored letters, and a few on parchment. When the certificate is about to be issued, the deputy for the time being suggests that the new citizen might deem it desirable to have some regard to the language or durability with which perhaps to its being framed, and in that case the person admitted and agreeing to the suggestion pays the difference in expense between an ordinary blank and the more ornamental one; but with the exception of this perquisite, which amounts to a large sum, all other expense, when the candidate is an emigrant, is borne by Tammany Hall, to which establishment the charge is made for the usual expense of admission. A few years ago it owed to one of the clerks a balance of about two thousand dollars, which remained unpaid for some time, but whether ultimately paid or reported with a view to its being so, we could, would of course be decided by the Grand Sachem.

A regular Naturalization Committee has for years been in operation at Tammany Hall, whose services are called into requisition for a few weeks immediately preceding an election. Ordinary blanks are obtained by the Committee from one of the clerks—the Superior or Common Pleas—and are usually prepared for—and the requisite papers are prepared by clerks of the Committee, to which is annexed a printed card containing a request, "Please naturalize" —the name of the applicant for admission appearing in writing. The applicants and witnesses go over in squads together, and such is the manner which crowds the court-room that a dozen citizens are sworn in together, the hand of one being upon the book, and that of others placed over it; when the Clerk utters the solemn oath with a rapidity suited to the emergency.

The witnesses are passed in review before the Judge, who makes inquiry into the circumstances; but Tammany Hall is now in the ascendant, the request "I want naturalized" will doubtless be deemed sufficient by judges who are elected through its instrumentality, and those witnesses shall arrive who are in requisite for numerous simultaneous applications. A story is told at the City Hall, intended no doubt as a humorous satire upon these proceedings: "Is he a man of good moral character?" inquired the Judge. "What is that, your Honor?" "I mean, is he a good man?" "That he is, your Honor, I've been him in forty fights, and he always came out best."

We learn that these proceedings are not recorded in the engrossed minutes of the Court, but that only a mere index is kept of those admitted to citizenship. The dignity-clerk who acts in this service, doubtless a nominee of Tammany Hall, affixes the seal of the Court and signs the Clerk's name to the certificate of naturalization. But if the proceedings were entered in regularly engrossed minutes the enemy would control the result over such admissions to citizenship as might be made without the instrumentality of the Court. The ticket issued by the Committee—"Please naturalize" —is presented to the Clerk as his warrant for the charge of half a dollar made against the Grand Sachem, to be collected subsequently to the election (if he may be) the party is successful in the canvass.

The Judge who presides at this short season of activity—it might perhaps be called the season of business at Tammany Hall—allows no other judicial business to interfere with the admission of citizens. The haste with which the act is done is inconsistent with accuracy; and the question will doubtless arise, which is usually the tribunal that decides upon citizenship—the Committee of Tammany Hall or the Court?

Citizens may be admitted by the Supreme, Superior, District or Circuit Court of any State or county, or the Territorial Districts of the United States, or by a Circuit or District Court of the United States, or any Court of Record tary" to be considered a District State Court within the meaning of the Act.

In 1813 an act was passed subjecting to fine or imprisonment any person who shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, any certificate or evidence of citizenship, or shall pass, utter, or use as true any false, forged, or counterfeited certificate, or shall make sale or dispose of any certificate to any person other than the person for whom it was originally issued, and to whom it may of right belong. It was contended that this section applied only to seamen, but it has been held to be general in its character.

The act of 1798 required a registry of aliens desiring to be admitted citizens; but this was repealed, as proposed to be, by the act of 1802. In lieu of such registry, notice of the intended application, of the place of nativity of the applicant, of the vessel in which he arrived, of his age and residence up to the time of application, and of the name and residence of his witness, might be required; and any person might be allowed a standing in court on account of the application or see to its regularity, or commissioners of the United States might be named in lieu of State tribunals, and the names of persons admitted might be reported to the Secretary of State. But something effectual should be immediately done by Congress to prevent the frauds which are supposed to occur so largely as to affect the result in closely contested States.

BEAUTIFUL COINCIDENCE.

WHEN the Democratic Convention of 1864 met at Chicago, those patriotic friends of the Union and the Constitution, MR. CLEMENT C. CLAY, MR. JACOB THOMPSON, and MR. GEORGE N. SANDERS, had established themselves in Canada within convenient distance for communication; and just as the Convention of 1868 assembles we observe that "General HARDEE, late Chief Justice of the Confederate States army," has arrived in Toronto from Texas. The newspapers also report the presence of Generals BEAUREGARD and WADE HAMPTON, of the same army, in this city. General FOREST, of the same service, is a member of the Convention. General QUARTERMASTER is not yet announced; indeed we are not sure that that estimable patriot is living. MR. SURRATT, late of the Confederate States civil service, is unavoidably detained. How grateful we ought to be to these generous gentlemen, who, after their late exhausting labors, are now willing and anxious to undertake the control of the Government of the United States!

WASHINGTON'S PRINCIPLES AT WASHINGTON COLLEGE.

SOME time since we called attention to a public meeting in this city, under the auspices of the Governor and many of the most conspicuous Republican citizens, for the relief of Washington College in Virginia, of which General LEE is President. We said, "There is no subject more important, there is nothing more absolutely essential to peaceful reconstruction than general education in those States," and we treated "that those who wish to aid in what they can to heal all national wounds will give the subject a candid and thoughtful attention." It was represented by the circular that the principles of WASHINGTON were to be inculcated in the college that bears his name, and nothing seemed to us more desirable for the youth of the Southern States.

We are now sorry to have to record that the circular did not tell the truth. The late Commencement festival at Washington College was made in part the occasion of a kind of memorial service to the "lost cause," which was, of course, wholly a matter of taste so far as the participants were concerned. But when an alumni supper during the Commencement week, at which the fourth toast was: "The fallen heroes of the war! Noble men. The story of their devotion adds to the glory of the motto too often sneered at, Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori." To this classic toast General WADE HAMPTON responded. He said that he did not believe they had fallen in vain—the cause for which JACKSON and STUART fell can not be in vain, but in some form would yet triumph. The Attorney-General, who had also delivered the address before the Literary Societies, evidently had his eye upon the New York Convention of the 4th of July. In closing, he proposed as a toast "The lost cause." The reporter says: "This was drank silently and solemnly by all; and in looking around we observed that nearly all present were Confederate soldiers."

The eighth toast at this cheerful supper was, "The true men of the South! Having courage without rashness, prudence without cowardice, they neither quail before the frown of power nor fawn upon the hands that have manacled the liberties of their country." To this toast "The man who had led the Stonewall Brigade" was summoned to respond; and that worthy, WALKER by name, said that during the war he had sought the true interests of Virginia, and that "since the surrender he had never bowed the knee to Baal." He never meant to acknowledge higher allegiance than he owed his State. After General LEE had retired, the health of "Old Marse ROBERT," as he was called, was drunk, "and three vociferous cheers given for the loved old hero."

These gentlemen who prefer to cell a section their country, and who choose to herald the total failure of the most causeless and cruel rebellion as a lost cause to be honored, will undoubtedly follow their fancies. But as we, persuaded by the circular and by the names of the gentlemen who called the meeting, spoke of it as one worthy the serious attention of thoughtful men, it becomes now our duty to say that the political principles of WASHINGTON are evidently despised at the College that bears his name, and that a college whose Commencement is devoted by its alumni to a memorial supper and its supper is a mere hot-bed of disaffection to the Union and to the principles of the American Government. Moreover, every humane and charitable effort in behalf of the Union or of loyal men has been received in the same way by the heroes of "the lost cause." And these men it will be remembered, persons like WADE HAMPTON and General WALKER, are the leaders of the Democratic party in the Southern States.

REPRESENTATION IN PARTY CONVENTIONS.

THE Geneva Courier has made a careful and interesting calculation, which shows the extreme inequality in the representation of the Republican party in a Republican Convention. By the present system, based upon Assembly Districts, without regard to the number of Republican voters, it appears that 26,269 Republicans living in the city of New York have the same power in a Convention as 74,896 Republicans living in the rural counties. That is, 26,259 Republican voters in the city have 65 delegates, while 27,169 in the agricultural districts have but 187. The 385 Republican voters of the Third Assembly District of the city are not equal in power and representation in the Convention to the 5618 Republicans of Allegheny County. The calculation tends to prove that less than one-third of the Republican voters of the State control the State Convention.

The injustice of such a system is evident. No defense can be made for it, and the adoption of the 8th of July should take up the subject and settle it. The Courier, which has evidently pondered the matter, proposes the following plan as a remedy:

"Let 1000 Republicans be the unit of representation, and Assembly Districts, as at present, be the division. Each Assembly District with less than 1000 Republicans shall have one delegate; 1200, and less than 1800, two delegates; 2000, and less than 2800, three delegates; 3500, and less than 4200, four delegates, etc., and allowing one delegate for each 1000 Republicans or fraction of 500 or more. The number of Republicans to be determined by the votes cast at the last election for State officers. There may be much better plans. We only suggest this as one for consideration."

UNDER WHICH?

THE political spectacle of the moment is instructive. The Republican party, the party of the country and of the war, of liberty, progress, and civilization, which has created every where the authority of the Government, obliterating the shameful stain of slavery, and maintaining the bond of the Union, has restored every solitary State but three to the full exercise of power in the Union upon the broad, simple, humane principle of equal civil and political rights, and has done this despite the opposition of the Executive head of the Government and the relentless hostility of an unscrupulous party. Knowing that upon no other principle can there be a peaceful Union and prosperous country, it has declared that it adheres to this policy. Knowing that without that tranquility the debt can not be paid, and that the debt is among the sides of the rebellion a spark of hope that it may be repudiated, the national creditors defrauded, and every man in the land disgraced; it has, single-handed, maintained the debt and rights and peace, declared that the national honor shall be faithfully defended, and has nominated as the representatives of these principles and this party of the great soldier of the war, who has shown himself as free from the trait of moral ambition of a renowned and victorious general as WASHINGTON himself, and with him a man of the same pure personal character and identified with the cause of constitutional liberty that triumphed in the war.

Upon the other hand the Democratic party, whose inhuman policy, alike a crime against the conscience and the prosperity of the country, plunged us into the war, which four years ago demanded that the Government should trent with traitors in arms, now baffled in every effort to overthrow the Government, either by force or by intrigue, with its enemies, stands torn with doubt and mad with the lust of power, wondering in what way it can most successfully deceive the country and reverse the great victory which it could not prevent. Conscious that its logical and secretly cherished design, if declared, would be repudiated by the people, it is driven to the device between those who would say nothing and those who would reveal the real party purpose. Hating equal rights as perilous to its party ascendency, it would thrust back into political and industrial chaos the States which the Republicans have restored, and renewing its alliance with the disaffected classes of the South would seek a reconstruction which should leave the spirit that rebelled and palliated rebellion paramount in the Government. Disorganizing, dangerous, reckless, and destructive, as every party indifferent to humanity and resolved upon injustice must necessarily be, the Democratic party goes into its Convention agreed only in contempt for the great principles of the Government, and in a passionate desire for its control.

These are the attitudes of the two parties that ask the sympathy and the support of the American people. The one, having successfully concluded the war, is organizing its realm, cherishing vengeance against no man or class, and anxious that those whom conspicuous disaffection have necessarily disfranchised may at the earliest moment—which depends upon themselves—again resume their share in the common government. The other anxious only that liberty and patriotism may be disfranchised, and disaffection put into power, in order that those who derided loyalty to the Union may now govern it.

To doubt the result would be to question the common-sense of the American people.

"THE NATION."

BY a curious coincidence the Tribune lately published in the same issue a letter from London which spoke of the Nation as "treacherous" to the Republican party, and a leader which deplored the waning of a weekly paper in New York which, after the manner of the London Spectator, should discuss all subjects, political, literary, social, and scientific, with ample knowledge, force, grace, and earnestness.

Now we have been faithful readers of the Nation from its first Number, and we take especial pleasure in saying our voluntary that it is the very paper which the Tribune so felicitously portrays. It discusses every public question with a degree of independence and ripeness of thought, a candor, independence, conviction, and good temper which we and the Tribune, and all our daily and weekly contemporaries, may most profitably study. Its literary criticisms are not less commendable. A reader can actually judge by them whether a book is good or not, although "genial" criticism or indiscriminate praise must be looked for in the Nation. Its scientific and other miscellany is accurate, and to the date. Its brief comments upon passing events of the week are not only sparkling, but often witty. It is truly Republican and radical in its politics; but it has no idols, and it often speaks even of MR. GREELEY, and MR. SUMNER, and MR. WADE, and MR. PHILLIPS, as if they, too, were mortal. Indeed, it is unreservedly of the opinion that the time has come for calling "war-horses" out to grass; and if the test of fidelity to human progress and Republican principles be continuous praise of MR. STEVENS, MR. BUTLER, and MR. BINGHAM, the Nation will be found wanting.

But the real value of the Nation among our papers is, that it serves the great cause to which the Republican party has devoted years the highest grounds of principle, and in no mere partisan manner. It criticises Republican measures and men; but as a friend, not as an enemy. It confides in the Republican party of that cause as fully that it believes it to be inspired by reckless measures and unscrupulous men. It believes, and we most heartily agree with it, that the course pursued by the New York Tribune, for instance, to procure the conviction of the President, was a thousandfold more "treacherous" to the Republican party than any fierce criticism of any measure advocated by MR. BUTLER or MR. SUMNER, because it was a fierce assault upon the most sacred principles of human conduct, and an incitement to party slaughter.

The character of the press in this country has signally improved within a few years. We doubt if it ever was more popular power than it is now. But among the signs of its real elevation and of its encouraging prospects we find the support of so truly able and independent a paper as the Nation one of the most cheering.

SWEETMEATS.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SOME sweetmeats taste like molasses. Gradgrind says it is because they are made with molasses: but this is not so; they have that flavor when cooked sugar is used. It is for this reason: liquids that are dense have their boiling points much higher than lighter ones. The syrup of sweetmeats is comparatively thin at first, and is gradually reduced to the proper consistency by boiling down. In this time that the sugar is burned, or partly caramelized, and this although the watchful eye of the skillful housewife sees none of the ordinary signs of burning. Rapid ebullition, which is sometimes sought after to hasten the process, is sure to produce the molasses taste and brown color; and the only way to beat your neighbors (which is, I believe, one of the highest triumphs this world can give) is to use more sugar, and evaporate the water up gradually to the desired state. Fruits of delicate flavors, especially the strawberry, raspberry, and cherry, require great care and attention, or the most imaginative person could not detect what they were intended for; they are generally burned in boiling no two great heat. We have just burned some myself. The fruit jellies sold in glass tumblers at groceries are chiefly gelatine, colored to suit the fancy, and named with perfect recklessness; call them by any name, and they would sell as well.

Of course these remarks apply particularly to fruits preserved in sugar; not to those abominations, as generally made, canned fruits. Nine out of ten of these have undergone slight vinous fermentation at least, which is sufficient to render them unwholesome and unpalatable. I have never found any thing equal to the simple one of a long experience than a compromise between canning and preserving by the old method; that is, round fruits, such as grow in a cluster, so as to crush its juice, which is done boiling in half its weight of sugar, the resulting syrup simmered slowly for an hour previous to their being canned in glass, air-tight, will have the flavor God gave it. What is the use of canning fruit without sugar? The sugar has also enough to be added in any event. The peach will float in an amber sea, the cherries and strawberries in a scarlet one, and the green-gages in such a peculiar yellow-green (like that what's-its-name cordial) that it makes one's mouth anticipate the coming day.

With your kind permission I will request that those who love fruit, in season and out of season, will refrain from scorching it into chocolate caramel (without the chocolate), and boil or simmer it slowly into

"A great syrup that with cinnamon,"

as MR. KEATS wrote.

If they don't like cinnamon, let them leave it out.

ELIZABETH, N. J. EUBERT P. WATSON.

LITERARY.

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS have issued a Life of SCHUYLER COLFAX, written by the Rev. A. Y. MOORE of South Bend, Indiana, who has been for several years his personal and personal friend. The work has been in preparation for some time, and is now published with the consent of MR. COLFAX, as the public naturally wishes to know the story of his life. It is illustrated with an admirable steel portrait, and will be valuable as a record of the honest and intelligent industry, the steady reliance upon the highest political principle, and the practical sagacity and ability which have made MR. COLFAX a representative American.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

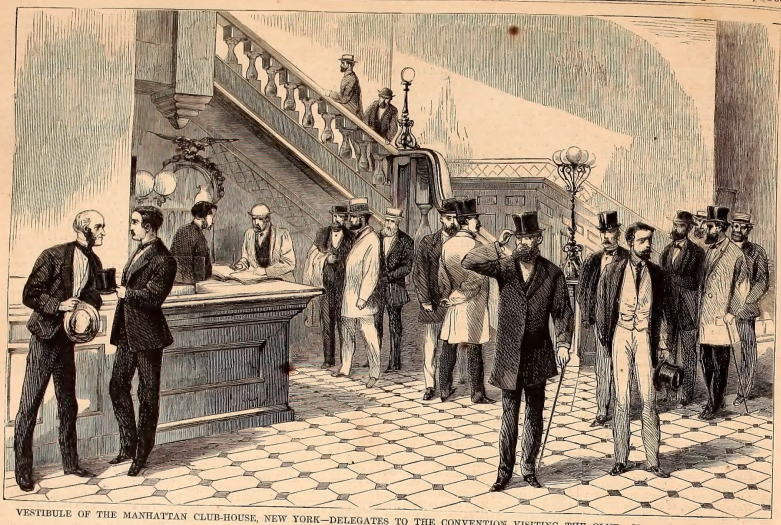
MESSRS. RICE and MACKEY were sworn in as Senators from the reconstructed State of Arkansas on June 28. The latter submitted the representatives of the same State on the following day.

The following resolution which was offered by Senator Cameron, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana, was passed in the Senate over the President's veto by 40 to 6, in the House by 108 to 39, all on the 25th June, the day the veto was received from the President.

NEWS ITEMS.

JOHN DABNEY, a colored man in Richmond, Virginia, purchased his freedom, and that of his family of Hanover, Virginia, just before the war, for $2500, agreeing to pay the money in monthly instalments. During the pendency of the struggle he paid about one-half of it. In Confederate money which was then of depreciated in value that his late mistress requested him to discontinue the payments until the close of the conflict. When slavery was abolished the debt was of course no longer due; but notwithstanding he was advised against such a course Dabney lately immediately set to work to procure, now the amount is unknown, $900 in greenbacks, being the balance of the $2000 he had contracted to pay.

The newly elected Louisiana Legislature convened on June 30. A majority of the Democratic members elect could not take the oath of office and withdrew, leaving there was could to organize the two HOUSES with QUORUMS.



FOREIGN NEWS.

THE religious and other reforms in ASSISI are exciting the ire of the Pope, and he has already pronounced an allocution against it, which promises to be an effective reply to the "Bull against the Comet." In this allocution the Pope expresses himself in language of the severest and exhaustive kind, declaring that "the Concordat should have been regarded by Austria as a sacred covenant by which she and all persons who approve of the laws recently passed by the Austrian Government concerning the press, education, civil marriage, and public education, to bewave the sentence of excommunication, and the other violations of the sacred rights of the Church." The Imperial Government has replied to the allocution of the Holiness." On the day after its publication BARON VON BENEDETTI, Minister of Austria, in presenting the Imperial Council, assured the members that the threats of the Holy See against the laws for the settlement of the laws just passed. So strong is the reform party in Austria that when the text of the Papal Encyclic in this wise was presented to the Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH for his signature and ratification previous to signing, that he had either to sign or resign. If he did not sign the law of the 25th of May would be void the reformation. It is at least noteworthy, if not significant, that the Emperor, on receiving from the allocution throughout Europe the statement WILLIAM and that was transmitted to Vienna, that the Queen of the Crown Prince of Prussia, and a vast concourse of people, witnessing the ceremony, and joining in the hymns which were sung.

MEXICO, from Austria, has announced to the English holders of Mexican bonds that the interest on the Mexican debt will be paid. All obligations on the part of Mexico to pay them. "A new way to pay old debts."

The Japanese revolution is announced as having come to an end by the submission of the TYCOON, SIOGO SOSHI. Nevertheless the struggle is continued, the latest feature assumed a new phase not clearly stated in the latest dispatches, and altogether the situation is obscure.

The King of SWEDEN and NORWAY is supposed to annex Sweden to the United States, and lately said that if Sweden to the United States, and lately said that if they gave him any more trouble, and refused to grant more taxes and to his barbers, he would hoist the more taxes and to his barbers, he would hoist the stars and stripes and claim British protection.

VESTIBULE OF THE MANHATTAN CLUB-HOUSE, NEW YORK—DELEGATES TO THE CONVENTION VISITING THE CLUB.—[SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.]

THE MANHATTAN CLUB.

THE Manhattan Club of New York is the social head-quarters of the Democracy, just as Tammany Hall, which we illustrate elsewhere, is the political quarters. The Club made extensive arrangements to extend its hospitalities to the delegates to the Convention in this city, and the handsome rooms—the vestibule of which we illustrate above—were crowded continually during the session of the Convention and for days before. Numbers of the members of the Club visited the various hotels, and invited the delegates to their Club-house; those accepting were registered in the visitors' book of the Club-house, and made it their quarters during their stay. Caucuses were also held there during the Convention, and the Manhattan Club was as strong a power in influencing the choice of a Democratic candidate for the Presidency as Tammany Hall itself. The Manhattan Club is one of the largest and most prosperous in the city, though quite young. It was founded a few years ago by JOHN VAN BUREN and a few kindred spirits. Messrs. AUGUST BELMONT, AUGUSTUS SCHELL, S. L. M. BARLOW, MANTON MARBLE, etc., are now the ruling spirits.

THE "LITTLE WESTERN" LOST.

A CAPTAIN JARRETT of Chicago, emulous of the fame of young BENNETT and the Henrietta, MACGREGOR and the Rob Roy, and other daring and successful yachtsmen and yachts, lately built a miniature life-boat which he called the Little Western, and in which he proposed to pass through the great lakes and the St. Lawrence, and thence across the Atlantic to Europe. But the disaster which occurred to the boat on June 21, and which we illustrate on this page, will probably put an end to the useless if not foolhardy scheme. On her second trip in Lake Michigan her sails became too heavy with the spray of the waves, and she capsized. She was immediately righted again, but instantly went over the other way. Captain JARRETT and a reporter named CHISHOLM were drowned.

THE "LITTLE WESTERN" OF CHICAGO CAPSIZING IN LAKE MICHIGAN, JUNE 21.—[SKETCHED BY W. LONG PALEN.]

FIRE-WORKS ON THE NIGHT OF THE FOURTH OF JULY.—DRAWN BY WINSLOW HOMER.—[SEE PAGE 446.]

THE "FOURTH" IN TOWN AND COUNTRY.

IS delightful contrast are the engravings which we give on pages 445 and 448, illustrating the celebration of the Fourth of July in the town and in the country—in the North and in the South. There is certainly a contrast in the manner of celebrating the day in the city and in the rural districts; one entails all manner of misery, the other is not wholly devoid of pleasantness; the one necessitates much aggravation of spirits and much perspiration, and provokes not a little profanity; the other does leave one a little room and some quiet. There is, too, an equally noticeable contrast in the drawing in the two pictures, the styles of Messrs. HOMER and WORTH being notably different, but each admirable in its way.

SILENCED AT LAST.—Heretofore our entrance to the magnificent salesroom of WHEELER & WILSON has been greeted by the musical click of their sewing machines, intermingled with the song of birds and the hum of pleasant voices. Alas, the change! The wheels now glide as swiftly, and the silver arms still weave the silken threads into graceful webs, but silent as a dream or an angel whisper. An improvement has hushed that silvery tongue. No longer will it time the mother's song as she sings her babe to sleep, or the music of the sewing girl who soothes for weal and loved ones. Silent as the heart-beat, or the ebb and flow of life-currents, the wheels and arms glide and glitter, leaving its pretty mistress to make all the noise.—[The Mail.]

THE LAST DAYS OF EX-President MARTIN VAN BUREN were made comfortable by the use of JAMES WHITCOMB'S ASTHMA REMEDY. Letters in our possession from his physician, and from Mr. C. BRYAN HASKELL, express much gratification with the results of its use.

FOR Moth Patches, Freckles, and Tan on the Face, use PERRY'S "Moth and Freckle Lotion." Sold every where. Depot 49 Bond Street, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$15 GET THE BEST. $15

OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS,

78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

Oroide is a new composition resembling Gold, retains its color and brilliancy. The OROIDE GOLD WATCHES are in hunting cases (Ladies' and Gentlemen's), manufactured in our factory in Switzerland, from the best materials, of the most approved styles, finished, well scientifically finished, are guaranteed reliable TIME-KEEPERS. As to appearance and durability, they have never been surpassed. Keys and no keys, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 inches of the most fashionable and correct description. Warranted one year. Price $15 payable to Express on receipt of the Watch. We have concluded to sell our celebrated Watches, Unprinciped persons are endeavoring to replenish their pockets by counterfeiting and substituting a spurious for the genuine Oroide Gold Watch.

EYE-GLASSES and SPECTACLES,

to improve the sight of old and young, without the disagreeable effect of frequent changes.

Bimonthar Glasses, combining extraordinary power, portability, and wide field of vision—for Sportsmen, Tourists, Travellers, etc. Catalogues sent free by enclosing stamp. Inventor, SEMMONS, Optician, 663 Broadway, New York.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,

Cor. Broadway, New York.

Flats and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

A Warning to Counterfeiters, and a Caution to Purchasers.

No expense will be spared, no legal means of punishing fraud will be neglected, in the effort to prevent the counterfeiting of HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. But scoundrelism, when its cunning and activity are stimulated by the hope of gain, is very ingenious and industrious. The man whose despicable business it is to simulate valuable proprietary medicines, and who substitute therefor dangerous or worthless preparations, are proverbially difficult to catch. Most of them are shrewd, cautious, and sly by their state to state with surprising agility, in the hope of evading the clutches of the law. The proprietors of HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS are not satisfied, if possible, to hunt them down. Travelling agents are employed for this purpose, and whenever an offender is detected he is prosecuted with the utmost rigor of the law.

No amount of vigilance, however, can prevent the occasional introduction of imitations and counterfeits. The public are therefore CAUTIONED not to purchase any article purporting to be HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS which is not authenticated by the handsome government stamp specially engraved for the proprietors, and also by their superb new label with a beautiful vignette, representing the conflict between St. George and the Dragon, at the top, and a miniature suite of hand, signed Hostetter & Smith, at the foot.

N.B.—The genuine BITTERS are sold in BOTTLES ONLY. All persons who pretend to sell the article by the gallon or barrel are impostors, and the stuff they offer is a worthless and probably poisonous counterfeit.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN,

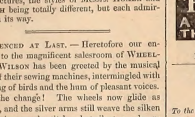
MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN,

and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."

Renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION

SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.



This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been established 25 years.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance.

For *gentlemen after shaving*it allays the smarting pain, and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"

for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

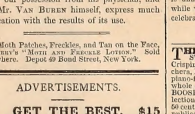
S. T. —1860.— X.

ANCIENT PINE ARTS.



To the Editor of the New York Herald:

Respecting the relics which were found in the late exhumations at Herculaneum, which have been forwarded to the Society of Antiquities in London, allowed your correspondent that the bottle resembling Drake's Plantation Bitters was undoubtedly placed among the ruins by the agent of Dr. Drake, we desire to state he is incorrect in every respect. If a bottle was found there bearing our lettering, the language of the Ancient Romans was different from the accepted literature of that day. Our Agent has other business than this in Europe, and has not been in Italy at all. No doubt American carry Plantation Bitters to Rome—but trying to impose upon a society of Antiquarians in this way seems quite useless, and we do not appreciate the joke. It is unnecessary for us to spend money in Europe while we are unable to supply the demand for these celebrated Bitters here.

Respectfully,

P. H. DRAKE & CO.

THE GRAND DUCHESS OF GEROLSTEIN, Martha, Norma, Travatore, Crispino e la Comare, Barbiere di Siviglia, Ballo in Maschera, La Sonnambula. Each opera arranged for the piano-forte, solo and duet, with English text, and the whole of the music; price 50 cents. All the above in BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET. The cheapest collection of modern music in the world; Sixty books, 50 cents each. Catalogues sent free. Also, cheap musical publications free. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway.

Prices from $3 to $10 per 100. We will send to any address, postpaid, One Sample, 25c., Three Samples, 50c., with Price-List.

All money sent by Post-Office Order at our risk. We guarantee all amounts to goods, at lowest rates for all money sent.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!

Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in the Men's and BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments by with certainty, as directed by us, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT, which will be sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & BURR, Clothing Warehouse, 214 Canal Street, and 96 Greene St., N.Y.

SPALDING'S PREPARED

GLUE

Mends Toys, Crockery, Wooden-ware, &c., &c. Useful in every house. Bottle with Brush, 25 cents.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements made! 3 New Patents received.

MARTINGALE RINGS, 8?c and $?5 single pairs.

SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross.

BILLIARD BALLS, $9 and $10 per set.

CHECKS, $8, $10, and $12 per 100.

Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons, $1 to $150 per gross pair.

WM. KNOX, 301 Broadway, New York.

An Easy Way of Procuring

what you want. HORACE WATERS & Co., 481 Broadway, will dispose of new and second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, Organs, of the Makers' own agency, to take from $5 to $25 monthly until paid. Fifty new and second-hand instruments for rent, rent applied if purchased, or for sale at bargains for cash.

BEAUTIFUL WOMEN. "National types: English, French, Spanish, Austrian, Turkish, Italian, Grecian, Swiss, Polish, Chinese, Swedish, Dutch, Japanese, etc., with portraits, in July No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, 30 cts., or $3 a year; clubs of 10, six months "on trial" for $10. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, possessing in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These cases are in hunting and open face, Lever and Lever Escapement, the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled throughout, and are the best watch for people in regard to use and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by any watch ever made. Each one is warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have a watch that is good for time, as a watch costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

FOR CLUB ORDERS.—If ten watches are ordered at one time, we will send one EXTRA Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have obtained so wide a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering imitations and worthless watches, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else can sell our Watches, and that any such representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

At the Explosion

In the Bowery,
On the evening of the 18th,
There stood a stripling,
The mangled bodies
The smitten, quivering victims,
Pleading for help, relief—
Some linger'd on to die,
To escape the dreadful agony—
Brought to my mind forcibly
My own condition
Of a few months ago.
I was at work in a bowery,
A tub of boiling liquid
Above my head;
I was in the act of removing it
When it partially upset,
And the liquid drove
About my right arm.
I was filled with the hot juice.
I called for help—
It took a full minute
Before assistance came.
I was taken to the hospital,
or have my whole body scalded if I relaxed my grasp.
But that minute seemed an hour. I supposed my arm was ruined for life. The fearful agony I suffered no mortal tongue can describe.
My physician who was called in ordered a plat bottle of WOLCOTT'S BALSAM FOR PAIN. My whole arm, although cooked, was sopped and kept constantly wet with Pain Balm for two weeks. I was relieved of all my pain in less than 20 minutes. The circulation continued perfect. Not even a blister. Redeemed a miracle.
The evaporating quality of the Pain Paint kept the whole limb perfectly cool, and the very next day I resumed my business as usual. The only difficulty experienced after the first day was in my wrist, where a piece of skin slipped off in removing my clothing.
Knowing that the druggist on the Bowery has produced at least a score of mangled or scalded limbs and bodies, I would most earnestly recommend Wolcott's Pain Paint as the most cooling, most efficient remedy ever known. Its healing powers will give relief at the very first application; and continuing its use freely, by keeping the wounds excluded from the air, will cure those who would otherwise die or be cripples for life.

GET WHO KNOWS THE VALUE OF PAIN PAINT.

NEW SONGS.

KITTY MCGEE. By HENRY TUCKER . . . . . 35c.
LIFE ON A HEAVY DRAY. By JOE KEY . . . . . 35c.
THE EVE THAT BRIGHTENS WHEN I CLOSE . . . . . 35c.
THE YELLOW HAIR'D LASSIE OF BERAN . . . . . 35c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 15c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1128 Broadway, 2d door above 29th St. Branch, 208 Bowery.

The Spirit of the Times.

OFFICE OF WILKES' SPIRIT, }
NEW YORK, June 30, 1868. }

WILKES' SPIRIT OF THE TIMES will this week resume its regular title, and henceforth will be "THE SPIRIT OF THE TIMES." Its publication was originally made under this title, nearly the entire term, and it ran under this title for about thirty years, acquiring a standard position and great popularity. In this we then changed to PORTER'S SPIRIT, in compliment to the able man who had founded the journal. At the death of Mr. Porter, in 1856, its name was changed to WILKES' SPIRIT; and now, after ten years of unexampled prosperity, it returns to its original title, thus uniting the merit and memory of old days with the vigor of the present, and preserving the sole and only recognized sporting authority of the United States. Especially is it important to add, that its present editor and the incomparable corps of writers who have made it famous, are the men of whom have been attached to it for years, will remain, as heretofore, associated with its fortunes.

GEORGE WILKES, Editor and Proprietor of THE SPIRIT OF THE TIMES and THE TURF.

P. S.—The SPIRIT OF THE TIMES is a high-toned gentlemen's weekly newspaper, devoted to Hunting, Racing, Shooting, Field Literature, and the Drama. Among its other features, it employs a distinguished Veterinary Professor, who answers all questions through its columns in regard to sick or injured horses or animals, and wrote prescriptions FREE. No horse-owner or veterinary student should be without THE SPIRIT. Subscription, $5 00. Single copies to be had at all the news stands.

CAMPAIGN BADGES, Medals, Pins, Flags, and Banners. Agents wanted. Catalogue free. Liberal Terms to Agents. Send to Headquarters. B. W. HITCHCOCK, 98 Spring St., New York (under St. Nicholas Hotel).

WATCHES, and ROSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, the Cheapest Reliable Lever. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and appearance lead us to believe that even judges have been deceived in the Watch. The movements are the result of scientific men, and has not only called forth the exclamations of the people in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the late Fair of Virginia. The movements are of American, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured by our own agency, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $25. Each watch will be found in a pigskin case, which, also, will be sent postpaid on demand.

Also, Roskopp's Patent Watch, the Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with privilege to examine.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

CHOICE (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.

IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

UNCOLORED JAPAN, 80c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED COFFEES, 20c., 25c.; best, 30c. per lb.

GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express. No larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently expect to receive them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses, and in packages as they come to us from the factory of first-class reputation. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 20 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number of Clubs cannot be formed, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third below the Regular Express charges, by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name under whatever style, as they are no

BOONS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,

Post-Office Box 5,643, New York City.

FALL RIVER AND NEWPORT LINE

BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.

Steamboats NEWPORT and OLD COLONY alternate daily (Sundays excepted), leaving New York from Pier 28, N. R., at 5 P.M. Leave Newport, on Old Colony and Newport Railway, at 8 A.M. due in Boston 6.10, in time for Eastern and Northern connections; or Dreibeat on Fall River, at 7 A.M., 7.45 A.M., and arrive in Boston at early business hours. Returning Trains leave Old Colony and Newport Railway Depot, corner of Kneeland and South Streets, at 4.30 and 5.30 P.M. Fare 4 hours the only direct route from Newport, Fall River, Taunton, New Bedford, Martha's Vineyard, Middleboro, the Shakspeare, Plymouth, and all towns on Cape Cod and Nantucket. Three sailings as fast as on any other line. For particulars inquire of the agents,

E. LITTLEFIELD, 73 Broadway, New York.
W. H. BALLOU, Supt. O. C. & N. R. R., Boston.
New York, July 4, 1868.

"TRY IT." A $3 Magazine, in clubs of 10, next half price. Specimen, 25 cts.; by mail, 30 cts. Only $1 a year. The PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. New Vol.—30th—begins with July No. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

STAFFORD'S

"Olive Tar,"

Expressed from the Juices of the Olive and Pine;

CURES HEMORRHAGE AT THE LUNGS;
CURES CONSUMPTION;
CURES CATARRH;
CURES CROUPITIS;
CURES QUINSY AND LOSS OF VOICE;
CURES SORE THROAT;
CURES RHEUMATISM;
CURES SCALDS AND BURNS;
CURES ASTHMA.

"OLIVE TAR" RELIEVES AND CURES ALL PAIN FROM WHATEVER CAUSE.

Sold by Druggists; 50 cts. per Bottle, Large Case $2.

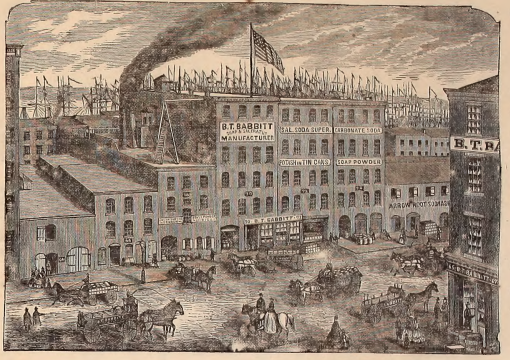
JEAN MAÉ'S WORKS

Just published by

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE SERVANTS OF THE STOMACH.
By JEAN MAÉ. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE HISTORY OF A MOUTHFUL OF BREAD, AND ITS EFFECT ON THE ORGANIZATION OF MEN AND ANIMALS. By JEAN MAÉ. 18mo, Cloth, 75 cts.



☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, to any part of the United States, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

B. T. BABBITT'S ARTICLES OF EVERY DAY USE

PUT UP IN CASES TO MEET THE WANTS OF FAMILIES.

FIVE DOLLAR CASE.

½ lb. Best Superfine Tea.....	$0 75
3 lbs. Pure "Lion Coffee"..	1 50
1 lb. Yeast Powder..........	75
8 lbs. Labor-Saving Union Soap........................	96
1 lb. Pure Saleratus.........	16
1 lb. Pure Potash............	22
1 Paper "Soap Powder"....	16
4 Cakes Best Toilet Soap...	50
	$5 00

TEN DOLLAR CASE.

1 lb. Superfine Tea...........	$1 50
4 lbs. Pure "Lion Coffee"..	2 00
2 lbs. Best Granulated Sugar	36
1 lb. Best Starch.............	13
2 lbs. Yeast Powder.........	1 50
20 lbs. Labor-Saving Union Soap........................	2 40
2 lbs. Pure Saleratus........	30
2 lbs. Pure Potash...........	44
3 Papers "Soap Powder"..	45
8 Cakes Best Toilet Soap...	1 00
	$10 08

If you can not obtain the Goods of your Grocer, send your Orders direct to the Factory, and the Case will be forwarded by Express to any part of the United States. Any person ordering TEN CASES will receive A PREMIUM OF ONE EXTRA CASE. Express Charges to be Paid by the Purchaser.

B. T. Babbitt's Lion Coffee.

This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed hermetically in cans containing ONE POUND; all the Aroma and delicacy of flavor are thereby preserved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is from fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure coffee. It is packed in cases of Ten, Twenty-four, Forty, and Sixty Pounds, Price FIFTY CENTS per lb. One Can in every Twenty-four-pound Case, two Cans in every Forty-pound Case, and three Cans in every Sixty-pound Case, contain a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK.

Use B. T. Babbitt's Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or ley in the market. Put up in Cans of One pound, Two pounds, Three pounds, Six pounds, and Twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make Fifteen Gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in the market.

B. T. Babbitt's Labor-Saving Union Soap.

B. T. BABBITT has for a long time been experimenting, and has now produced an article of Soap that is composed of the best washing material, and at the same time will not rot or injure the clothes in the least possible degree. He stamps his name on each bar, and guarantees that the Soap will not injure the most delicate fabric, while it will be found to be the most pleasant washing Soap ever offered in market. It is made from clean and pure material, contains no adulterations of any kind, and is especially adapted for woolens, which will not shrink after being washed with this Soap. Ask for B. T. BABBITT'S SOAP, and take no other. Each bar is wrapped in a Circular containing full directions for use, printed in English and German. One pound of this Soap is equal to three pounds of ordinary Family Soap. Directions sent in each Box for making One Pound of the above Soap into Three Gallons of handsome Soft Soap. It will remove Paint, Grease, Tar, and Stains of all kinds. It will not injure the fabric; on the contrary, it preserves it. It will wash in hard or salt water. But little labor is required where this Soap is used. Machinists and Printers will find this Soap SUPERIOR TO ANY THING IN THE MARKET.

☞ FOR SALE EVERY WHERE. ☜

B. T. BABBITT, Manufacturer,

Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

WASHING WITHOUT LABOR!—Something New!

B. T. Babbitt's celebrated SOAP POWDER

Warranted to remove DIRT and STAINS of every kind, leaving the Linen perfectly CLEAN AND WHITE.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.

To each six quarts of cold water required to cover the clothes, add two tablespoonfuls of this SOAP POWDER, first dissolved in two quarts of boiling water, mix this thoroughly with the cold water, put in the clothes and let them soak over night. Then rub the dirt streaks, and give them a thorough rinsing in the pounding-barrel or other vessel. Next put them in the boiler with clean water, add a little of the Powder, and after boiling for a short time all dirt and stains will be removed, leaving the clothes

EXCEEDINGLY WHITE.

Now rinse and blue as usual. The same water will answer a second time, if the clothes are not very dirty; it will likewise be found excellent for washing floors and any painted work. IF THE CLOTHES HAVE NOT BEEN SOAKED OVER NIGHT, they can be made perfectly clean by using a little more of the Powder when boiling, or by boiling in two waters.

THIS POWDER IS WARRANTED

Not to Rot or Injure the Clothes.

It leaves no unpleasant odor, Renders Bleaching Unnecessary, Dispenses with Rubbing, except for articles specially soiled, while the cost of the material for doing THE WASHING OF TEN PERSONS WILL NOT EXCEED TWO CENTS.

ONE PAPER OF THIS POWDER will make Twelve Quarts of best FAMILY SOFT SOAP.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Mix together six quarts of water and one paper of the Powder, and let them boil about two minutes; then add six quarts of cold water, stir them intimately together, and set the vessel away in a cool place where it will not freeze; when cold, you will have a very thick and nice white soap. This soap will wash well, and will not EAT the hands like other soft soap, nor ROT the clothes. By making the Powder into six quarts of soap, it can be used with Hard or Sea Water. The Soft Soap is best adapted for washing Calico and Woolen Goods. TO PREVENT DISAPPOINTMENT OR IMPOSITION, be sure and get

B. T. BABBITT'S SOAP POWDER!

For Sale Every where. If your Grocer does not keep it, and will not get it for you, send your Orders direct to the Factory.

B. T. BABBITT, Manufacturer, Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

Agents Wanted Every where.

THE BEST REAPER KNIFE GRINDER.

Made of FINE EMERY and VULCANIZED RUBBER, firm as steel, and always true. Cuts five times as fast as the grindstone, and gives a perfect edge. Weighs but 20 pounds, is clamped to the machine, a plank, or table, runs rapidly by gear, and turns easily. Is the best and cheapest. See it before you buy. For Circulars and BEST TERMS to Agents, address
E. G. STORKE, Auburn, N. Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

THE DOLLAR WATCH. The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, handsome case, glass crystal, white dial, steel and metal works, watch size, good order; will denote correct time. Warranted for two years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Sent by mail for $325 A MONTH, AND EXPENSES. 28 New Articles. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

Burnisher, Pencil Sharpener, Paper Cutter, and Pen Holder combined. Sells at sight. Agents wanted. Can make $10 a day. Samples sent by mail for 30c., or two styles for 50c. Address, MORSE ERASER CO., 404 Library Street, Philadelphia.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, between AVENUES B and C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.

N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and ev-

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents, by
W. HEPBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

Campaign Sleeve-Buttons.

IMITATION IVORY.

Perfect Likenesses of Grant and Colfax,
in relief. Red, White, Blue, Black, and Brown.
$1 00 per pair. Sent free on receipt of price.
Large Discount to the Trade.
Wm. M. WELLING, Patentee, 571 Broadway, N. Y.
AGENTS WANTED.

$60 a Week for Agents, local or travelling; no capital required. J. S. Te Lotte & Co, 735 Broadway, N.Y.

GRANT & COLFAX.

AGENTS WANTED—For the best LIFE OF GRANT, by Hon. J. T. Headley. Now ready. $2 50. An authentic LIFE OF COLFAX, with a splendid Portrait, in press. Price 25 cts., which we give to our subscrib-

AGENTS, READ THIS! The best money-making business out; largest profits and least risk; business strictly honorable. Enclose stamp for full particulars. Address W. M. BAKER, Fortville, Ind.

CURLS! CURLS! One application will curl your hair into beautiful curls, and last six months in every case, or money refunded. Sent by mail, postage paid, for 50 cents a package, or three for $1. Address M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

SOZODONT

Beautifies and Preserves the Teeth.

SOLD ALL AROUND THE WORLD.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 569 Broadway, N.Y. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

THE FOURTH OF JULY IN THE COUNTRY.—Drawn by THOMAS WORTH.—[See Page 446.]

"The Pen is Mightier than the Sword."

MORTON'S GOLD PENS

DO NOT WEAR OUT.

A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

BY THEIR USE

THE LABOR OF WRITING IS REDUCED,

Greater Uniformity is Obtained.

Ease, Elegance and Beauty are acquired

ECONOMY, PLEASURE AND PROFIT CONSULTED.

The Best, Cheapest and most Durable Instruments for Writing ever used.

SENT BY MAIL SAFELY.

Prices, Fifty Cents and upward.

NO TRAVELING AGENTS EMPLOYED.

Call and you will find Pens exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing; or enclose stamp for circular

A. MORTON,

20 MAIDEN LANE,

NEW YORK.

DRUNKENNESS CURED

By URIAH'S ANTIDOTE. Sent by mail for $1 25 by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South 8th St., Philadelphia. Circulars free.

KENNEDY'S

Scrofula Ointment

Cures Old Sores;
Cures Ulcerated Sore Legs;
Cures Scrofulous Sores on the Neck;
Cures Blackheads, or Pimples, on the Face;
Cures Scurvy Sores;
Cures Cancerous Ulcers.

Price $1 00 per Bottle.

MANUFACTURED BY DONALD KENNEDY,
ROXBURY, MASS.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed gratis by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

A Century of Triumphs over Dyspepsia, Liver Disease, Bowel Complaints, and various febrile and nervous disorders, has immortalized the Seltzer Spa, and these victories are now repeated throughout this hemisphere by TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, containing all the elements and producing all the

Extract from fashion article, Harper's Bazar, May 9:
"The fez does the work of the tarnubrus without necessitating any mannal labor," etc.

THE AUTOMATIC
CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER

Does the work in 20 minutes, without labor. Fits any stove or range. Warranted to do the work. No. 8, Medium Size, $10 00. Sent, C.O.D. Send stamp for Circular.

State and County Rights for sale, except Conn., N. J., Pa., Del., Md., New York City and Vicinity. Agents wanted for this territory. Address

GENERAL AGENT AUTOMATIC CLOTHES WASHER AND BOILER Co., No. 19 Courtlandt Street, New York.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN

Once Forward and two Backward Arches, insuring great strength, well balanced elasticity, evenness of point, and smoothness of execution. Sold by all Stationers. One gross in twelve counties a Scientific Gold Pen. One dozen Steel Pens (assorted points) and Patent Ink-retaining Penholder mailed on receipt of 50c. A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 and 113 William St., N.Y.

$10 to $20 a Day Guaranteed.

GOOD AGENTS wanted to introduce our new SEAM SPLITTER SEWING MACHINE—Stitch alike on both sides. The only first-class, low-priced machine in the market. WE WILL CONVINCE MACHINES to responsible parties, AND EMPLOY ENERGETIC AGENTS ON A SALARY. Full particulars and beautiful work furnished on application. Address W. G. WILSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

New Spring Goods
FOR GENTLEMEN

ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

HOUSE-FURNISHING OUTFITS!

Refrigerators, Meat Safes, Table Cutlery, Silver-plated Ware, Cooking Utensils.

CHINA AND GLASS WARE,
at greatly reduced prices.

BASSFORD'S,
Cooper Institute Corner Stores. Catalogues sent free.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the
Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

We take pleasure in calling the attention of buyers of Silver-plated Forks and Spoons to a valuable patented improvement in Electro-Plating Spoons and Forks, by which those parts most exposed to wear receive an EXTRA COAT OF SILVER, THREE TIMES THE USUAL THICKNESS, viz., on the back of the handle, heel of the bowl, and points of bowls of spoons, as illustrated in cut; back of the handle and breast and points of tines of forks.

It is confidently believed that this mode of Electro-Plating will supersede the old way of plating. The great advantage will be readily seen, as spoons and forks always wear through on these exposed points, while the plate is yet good upon other parts of the article. This new process will add

Three Times to the Durability of goods so plated.

The additional expense, at above low prices, only $1 00 per dozen on Table Spoons and Forks, and 50 cents per dozen on Tea Spoons.

All goods stamped "1847, ROGERS BROS., A 1, XII" are Electro-Plated by the new Patented Process.

PATENTED OCTOBER 29, 1867, and FEBRUARY, 1868.

☞ We also keep a full stock of SUPERIOR ELECTRO-SILVER-PLATED GOODS made by the celebrated

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., and ROGERS, SMITH, & CO.,

and fully guaranteed by us.

We ask especial attention to their new Patent

PORCELAIN-LINED ICE-PITCHER,

a valuable improvement, avoiding all possible objection to a silver-plated Ice-Pitcher with metal lining, and as applied is both

STRONG AND DURABLE.

Attention is also called to our large stock of

DINNER AND TEA SETS,

beautiful in form and decoration; with Crest, Monogram, or Initial.

ENGRAVED GLASS

to order, with Crest, Monogram, or Initial. CUTLERY, TEA-TRAYS, &c., all at popular prices.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO.,

The New Croquet.

KIRBY'S PATENT. Two colors only. Balls striped numerically. Universally used and preferred. Send for a circular. KIRBY & CO., 653 Broadway, N. Y.

THE NEW AMERICAN
CORNET and BAND INSTRUMENTS.

Louis Schreiber's
PATENT—with Water-Valves.

THE SWEETEST TONED, MOST POWERFUL, EASIEST BLOWN, AND TRUEST INSTRUMENTS ARE NOW MADE. POINT OF ACTION, AND AT THE MAKE OF THE VALVES. Call, examine, and test; or send for circulars, illustrated catalogue, price-list, and testimonials.

MUSICAL BOXES.

Playing from 2 to 24 tunes, costing from $3 50 to $2000 00. Every variety of the newest accompaniments. Musical Boxes are very durable.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., SOLE AGENTS,
No. 21 MAIDEN LANE (up stairs), New York City.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

WANTED—AGENTS. $175 per month to sell the NATIONAL FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This machine is equal to the standard machines in every respect, and is sold at the low price of $30. Address NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

CONSULAR SEAL
CHAMPAGNE,
AS IMPORTED FOR N.Y. UNION CLUB.
TOMES, MELVAIN & CO., No. 6 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufs of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 466 Broadway, near Broome, & 27 John, middle of block. Pipes and Holders made to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5246.

WELLING'S
DYSPEPSIA TABLETS.

Pleasant to the Taste. Relieve and cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and all weaknesses of the stomach. Fifty Cents per Box; sent, postage paid, on receipt of Fifty Cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 603.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE SCHUTZENFEST—THE PROCESSION PASSING THROUGH UNION SQUARE.—[SEE PAGE 453.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1868.

THE LINES DRAWN.

THE city of New York presented an extraordinary spectacle during the week that ended with the 4th of July. It was full of the late rebels and their friends, engaged in devising some method by which to persuade the country to renounce the victory it won in the war, and to intrust the Government to those who have done their utmost to destroy it. The Convention at Tammany Hall represented every disloyal individual and class in the country. Its object was to wrest the Government from the hands of those whose patriotic fidelity has been proved in every way—from the party which as a party accepted the challenge of war thrown down by those represented in the Convention—from the party whose unfaltering faith and energy forced the rebellion to unconditional surrender, saved the Union, and vindicated the amazing power of a free popular government. Had the Republican party doubted, and plotted, and faltered, and called for surrender, and encouraged rebellion; had it quibbled, and derided, and delayed; had it done exactly what the Democratic party did, the rebellion would have triumphed, the Government and Union would have been overthrown, and the hope of popular liberty every where in the world would have been fatally dimmed.

If, however, when the war ended, the rebel leaders in the Southern States and their political allies at the North had avowed frankly that they had put their cause to the test of the sword, and having lost, honorably acquiesced in the consequences; that, assenting to the abolition of slavery, and relieved from fear of personal harm or of general confiscation, they acknowledged the right of the loyal people to decide what political guarantees the changed condition of their States required; if, in such a spirit they had united with the people of the loyal States, old party lines would have disappeared, and the dividing questions would have been of a true commercial and manufacturing and agricultural policy. But such a course was not to be expected, and such union and generosity were too ideal. Whatever tendency there may have been toward this condition was arrested by the conduct of the Democratic party. Under the encouragement of its support the haughty, defiant, impracticable, and utterly intolerable spirit of the old slave leaders at the South awakened, and aimed to seize the political control of the late rebel States. In the old manner it harangued the loyal people of the country upon the Constitution, and still pandering with the mad effort to destroy it, this spirit and its disciples claimed to be its true interpreters. Dripping with the blood shed in rebellion to perpetuate slavery they denounced as they were the real defenders of law and the only friends of the rights of the people. They were the Hessians of the Revolution of '76 undertaking to teach patriotism to the Yankee sons of liberty!

Growing every month and every day more insolent, these men—whom mere craft, at least, should have taught to remain concealed—boldly threatening endless resistance to the Government, and bloody anarchy in the Southern States, with a smiling menace of war against the Union until they have their way, come thronging to New York to dictate terms to the Democratic Convention. They did not propose any form of acquiescence in the results of the war. At home JOHN FORSYTH, one of the most malignant of the rebels, and now one of the chief Democratic leaders in Alabama, spoke of the late rebel State governments as "overturned by revolution, tyranny, and the sword." BARRY, of the Charleston Mercury, from New York, gloried in the rebel military lines as "our lines," and declaring that "Southern men" would not submit to the reconstruction proposed by Congress.

A rebel colonel from Georgia, at a meeting in New York, shouted that if "Northern Democrats will take care of the bayonet, the Southern Democrats would be responsible for the result of the ballot in November," meaning that the KU-KLUX Klan would take care of loyal voters. MR. LANGDON, a Southern citizen, said to the Convention, "We vote that the 'iniquitous legislation' of Congress "will be wiped out forever." Rebel officers—one of them the hero of the FORT PILLOW massacre—were members of the Convention, and others attended as counselors. The presence of these rebels might have been a noble spectacle in the case we have supposed; but as a fact they were here to recover what they had lost in the field; they were here to serve "the lost cause" with exactly the same patriotic fidelity that sent them to Bull Run, and doomed Union soldiers to Andersonville and Salisbury.

Does any body suppose that the late rebels have changed their views of the nature of this Government? Does any thing tend to show it? If Governor BROWN, of Georgia, or General LONGSTREET, or any conspicuous rebel, honorably confesses his honest acquiescence in the great result, he is denounced and ridiculed not alone by the leading "Democrats" or exrebels of the Southern States but by the Northern leaders also. The only class of the population in those States which the Northern parties especially favor and praise is that of the unyielding, "consistent" rebels. If, on the other hand, any one of the late rebels accepts the situation in good faith and heartily seeks to aid in the speediest and most satisfactory settlement of our difficulties, then, like Governor BROWN, he acts openly with the Republican party. Are such facts of no significance? Do they not help to show in what direction and with which party lies peace? Was there an honest, loyal man who had given his sympathy, his prayers, his money, his blood, his friends, his children, to maintain this Union and its Government against the rebellion, who found it any more quickly last week as he reflected upon the assembly of the enemies of the Union and those who aided their rebellion, to obtain possession of its Government and to gratify their hatred of loyal men? Was there one such man in the city, is there one in the country, who does not solemnly resolve that he will do his utmost lies in him to defeat at the polls this party which again enters upon a Presidential campaign as it did in 1860 and in 1864 with the threat of revolution if it does not succeed? Is the immediate old slave power contending for the Government with the loyal people of the United States.

IS THE NATIONAL HONOR "BOSH?"

THE Republican members of the House who voted in favor of the resolution of MR. CORN, of Wisconsin, to break the plighted faith of the United States are infinitely more recreant to their party, both technically and morally, than the Republican Senators who voted against the conviction of the President. There had been no recognized authoritative expression of the party upon the subject of impeachment. But the National Convention of the party, fresh from every part of the country, and perfectly representing its convictions, adopted, with entire unanimity, a resolution that the debt should be paid according to its spirit as well as its letter. This is the test of national honor; and fifty-seven Republican Senators and REVERDY JOHNSON in order to move a reconsideration—have sought to lower it. Could they succeed the consequences would be deplorable.

Yet, although introduced by a Republican, the measure is not only in direct contravention of the Republican policy as officially declared, but it had barely a majority of the Republican vote in the House—a result, without MR. BINGHAM, being 57 Republican Yeas to 55 Nays; while the entire Democratic body upon the floor, except the two Democrats from New Jersey and FERNANDO WOOD, voted Aye. This is an illustration of the state of the case. Some Republicans, like General BUTLER, are actually deceived in favor of repudiation; but the party stigmatizes it as dishonor. Some Democrats are in favor of the Chicago Republican principle; but the party, as a party, favors repudiation.

The consequences, we say, would be deplorable. They are so evident that the most superficial observer can see them. They are the destruction of the law issuing them, and in destruction of good faith, the bonds may be taxed at all, they may be taxed at any rate. The Government may assume the right to make them worthless. The Herald says, without circumlocution, "All the talk about the faith of the Government to the bondholders is bosh. It is the only argument for repudiation. But that faith is no more "bosh" in one direction than is another. If the Government may steal a little, it may steal a great deal; it may steal from all of them; and if it may steal a little, it may steal a great deal. If its faith is "bosh" the best way is not to pay the debt, but to repudiate the debt by taxing the interest of the bonds ten per cent., but to break it altogether and extinguish the debt by repudiating it.

The repudiating character of the majority of this proceeding are so plain that it can not pass the Senate, unless we wholly misconceive the good sense of that body. MR. HOOPER, in reporting a bill in chamber to the resolution, made a brief and forcible statement of the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means acted only under peremptory instructions and contrary to its judgment, and that its members will oppose the bill reported with all their power. He says, truly, that the bill provides simply that the Government shall pay less interest than it agreed to pay, and that there is no precedent for such a law in the legislation of any civilized country. It destroys our national credit, and forbids us ever again to hope for foreign financial relief, however cruel and mortal the emergency may be. The Committee might well have added that the most fiercely unreconstructed rebel could not hope for a more damaging attack upon the Government than the passage of such a law would be.

It would be a fatal blow at that general confidence which is the fundamental condition of the restoration of the national prosperity. If the Government repudiates nothing is sure. If its faith be really "bosh" so are every principle and every interest in the country. And, certainly, the Democratic vote in the House, with the conceded strength of the repudiators in that party, shows conclusively that, should it regain ascendency, it would not hesitate to better the instructions of MR. CORN, leaving the country to discover in universal panic and suffering that, when the national faith is loosely regarded as "bosh," the welfare of the individual citizen is "all in your eye."

THE CELESTIAL EMBASSY.

HIS Celestial Excellency, MR. BURLINGAME, is having, as is most proper, a truly flowery reception. With his high-born and illustrious colleagues he is the Chinese Embassador entered the continent by "the granite portals of the Golden State," and they are receiving every where a welcome of good feeling as well as of pomp. As one looks at the picture in this issue shows, the youngest nation introducing the oldest to the friendship of Christendom. It is indeed, strange to hear a Yankee speaking for China, and claiming for her that kind of regard and respect which the world has not been accustomed to feel for the old empire. Despite all that we already know of its ancient and elaborate civilization, there is still the feeling that it is the most grotesque of barbarous nations, and that there is wholly warranted by that fact a common interest and knowledge and sympathy upon which the nations of Christendom are accustomed to meet. The popular image of China is an enormous country surrounded by a high wall, probably with broken bottles strewn along the top, where the people wear their hair in a long tail, squeeze the feet of the women deformity, subsist upon tea, and eat rats and dogs. The world at large has much the same feeling toward China that the genuine cockney John Bull of eighty years ago had toward France. It was a country in which the people spoke a vile lingo that nobody could understand, wore wooden shoes, and ate frogs.

> "They call their mothers mares,
> And all their daughters MISS,"

says the humorous HOOD, caricaturing the popular feeling.

And now the Celestial Embassador alights upon our shores—no outlandish foreigner, but a familiar public friend of our own, and with a wife with manners, Chinese noblemen, yet their official chief, he quietly says to this amazed Brother Jonathan, who evidently wonders how his CELESTIAL EXCELLENCY sealed the wall with a further damage to his attire, "We seek not only the good of China, but we seek your good, and the good of all mankind." Can the reader not see CHINA'S ancient Genius of III. surveying the Gallic frog NAPOLEON with mingled antipathy and incredulity? "We invite you," says this familiar voice emanating from the Asian mystery, "to a more intimate examination of the structure of Chinese civilization; to a better appreciation of the manners of that people, their moderation, their patience, their habits of scholarship, their competitive examinations, their high culture of tea and silk, and we shall ask for them from you modern science, which has taken its most rapid development within the history of man, and the holy doctrine of our Christian faith. It is for the West to say whether it will be a fair and friendly policy, or for one favored ed prejudice and on that assumption of superiority which is justified neither by physical ability nor by moral elevation."

This means, of course, the same free and familiar intercourse that we have with European nations. It means treaties of commerce and amity. It means an opening of the ports and a peaceful intercourse of great empire, secluded from the beginning of history, to the exploration and study of curiosity and science. It means the unrestricted admission into China of all the influences, moral, social, intellectual, and industrial, of the outer civilization which it has always suspected and avoided. If his Celestial Excellency does not too warmly state the truth, his embassy is one of the most remarkable events in history; and we await with the greatest interest the official propositions which he is authorized to make, by which this extraordinary change in the relations of China and the Western World is to be begun and accomplished.

THE PRESIDENTIAL PARDON.

THE President's Fourth of July proclamation is but another illustration of his hostility to the plan of reconstruction that Congress, which alone has rightful authority upon the subject, has adopted. It was further, of course, a bid for the political consideration of his claims to a nomination by the Democratic Convention. But it will have no appreciable effect upon the situation. The President can not repeal the laws by a proclamation. All but three of the rebel States are now restored to the Union upon conditions prescribed by Congress. Their Constitutions declare who are voters, and, unless the President can annul the clauses of a State Constitution, nobody can vote in the States restored to the Union except those who are constitutionally authorized. If, indeed, according to the late manifesto of that eminent Democratic statesman General FRANK BLAIR, there is no Government in the country but the Executive will, the President of the United States, like LOPEZ in Paraguay, may do just what he chooses. If, however, there be a Constitution, and laws, and a legislature, and a court, the Executive will is not the Government. And that happens to be the case.

There is, however, one very important question suggested by the proclamation. That is, whether the President has, under the circumstances, constitutional authority to issue it. The Constitution says that "he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." LUTHER MARTIN in the Convention proposed to add the words "except in treason," after the words "reprieves and pardons," but MR. WILSON objected that pardon before conviction might be necessary in order to obtain the testimony of accomplices, as in cases of forgery, and MR. MARTIN withdrew his amendment. It is evident that the Convention had in view the pardon of individual criminals, and in no degree pardon or amnesty as an act of state policy. What the Constitution did mean, however, in this respect, is shown in the seventyfirst Number of the Federalist. Alluding to the Shays-Dorr-Shay rebellion in Massachusetts, and to sedition in general, HAMILTON says: "But the principal argument for reposing the power of pardoning in cases like these is that in seasons of insurrection or rebellion there are often critical moments when a well-timed offer of pardon to the insurgents or rebels may restore the tranquillity of the commonwealth, and which, if suffered to pass unimproved, it may never be possible afterward to recall. This is undoubtedly the true view of the power of amnesty and pardon as a great policy of state.

If, in a time of profound peace, when the disturbance occasioned by a civil war is in course of adjustment by Congress, the President may by a general pardon relieve every rebel of every consequence of his offense, he may dispense with a law of Congress, constitutionally or permanently disfranchising certain chief rebels. But he may do more. If he have this anticipatory power to relieve a class of offenders from any penalty whatever, after the act, and before conviction, he may relieve before the act. If, when amnesty is not necessary to help subdue a rebellion, but when the rebellion has been long suppressed, the power of the President is so vast that he may of his own will relieve all who rebelled of any penalty whatever, he may also relieve all who shall rebel. In short this power, if admitted, the President may declare that he holds the restoration policy of Congress to be unconstitutional, and that if any body is any more convicted of any violation of it, he shall be pardoned. Under this interpretation President BUCHANAN might have proclaimed that any body who should be pursued for attempting a rebellion should be relieved of punishment.

In a word, the power assumed by the President in his proclamation is that of dispensing with the laws for the next three years. But half a million of persons liable to indictment for treason shall not be tried or punished, he may equally declare that all persons who are now liable to indictment for committing a libel not be tried or punished. The assumption is as preposterous as it is destructive of all constitutional government. Under such an individual estimate of alleged crime, may undoubtedly pardon before conviction, to insure the punishment of accomplices. But to assert that therefore he may by a general pardon relieve any person whatever who may be charged with a certain offense, is to claim for him as absolute a prerogative as JAMES II. asserted.

SHORT CUTS TO THE MILLENNIUM.

IT is not very edifying to see the House of Representatives resolving to steal from the national creditors by MR. CORN'S proposition, and by more insidious methods by the financial miserable report of the Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature two or three years ago to which we alluded at the time. No such relief can be made just in its application, nor can any law make a less value equal to a greater. When it is once seen that Legislatures may make by what they please, employers will pay by the hour or by the job. If labor is left free the law is useless. If the Government undertakes to regulate prices industry is paralyzed.

As SENATOR SHERMAN truly said, the title of the bill should be changed to a bill to increase the compensation of Government employés twenty per cent. If the Government has the power to ignore it may do, within moral limits, what it will with its own. But it must be very sure that the limits are moral. Now the money of the Government is the money of all the citizens raised by taxation for special purposes. The official agents of the people are honorably, morally bound to spend that money in the most economical manner. They have no right to waste it. They have no r[illegible] to say, "Here is a job that we could have done for a million of dollars, but other people do secure at that price, but we will pay two millions." When they do that, they tax all the people to pay more than the fair market-price to a very few of them. It is something which the people may do if they choose, but for which their assent can never be assumed, and it is very doubtful whether the people ought to choose to do it.

All this is wholly independent of the questions whether eight hours daily labor is not enough for any man, and whether society would not be happier if that limit were never exceeded. The industrial reform is really moral, not merely legislative. There is no short cut to relief from the burden of labor. It will come only by the growth and development of the co-operative principle, which is really based upon human sympathy and fraternity instead of individual competition and hostility. All the virtues are tributary to this relief. Temperance, patience, prudence, intelligence, are some of the names of the various force that will finally only humanize civilization. But no statutory law passed by politicians to please ignorance can take the place of any one of such influences in producing the result, or bring society a step nearer to the real reform.

THE SOUTHERN ELECTORAL VOTE.

THE resolution of Senator EDMUNDS in regard to the counting of the electoral vote requires very careful consideration. It provides that no such vote shall be counted from a State which, at the time of the election, shall not have adopted a constitution and have an organized government in operation under which the election shall be held.

The difficulty is, that it leaves to Congress to decide after the election whether certain votes which may determine the election shall be counted. It thus gives occasion for the most formidable disturbance. The party whose candidate was counted out would hardly fail to protest, and possibly refuse to submit. The State of Arkansas, for instance, is organized. Her government is in operation; her Senators and Representatives are admitted to Congress; the same government will be maintained by the whole power of the Government. What other ground should it be left to the discretion of Congress to count the electoral vote of Arkansas more than of Vermont? Excluded, by will, the vote of such States as shall not have been restored; but as there are but three, let them be specified and in advance.

These things are all forcibly said by Senator TRUMBULL in discussing the resolution. They seem to us conclusive. If a Presidential election is held in any of the lately restored States, it must, of course, be under the authority of the existing State government, which will transmit the sealed list to Congress. Even the New York Herald sees this. "The law choosing Presidential electors," it says, "will certainly be gone through with under the superintendence of the bastard State government, and the vote of no other voice will be recognized. Southern Democrats might as well get their tickets printed and then use them to light their tobacco-pipes as to bother with them any where else than in the Radical boxes."

The Presidential election will be conducted in Arkansas exactly as in Maine; and the votes will be certified and returned and counted in precisely the same manner. If Arkansas, now fully restored, is to vote only at the pleasure of Congress, let Maine be placed under the same discretion. If control of any power is to be left to be apprehended in the former than in the latter State, the State government will take the necessary steps for keeping order, even to requesting the presence of National assistance. We hope, therefore, that the joint resolution will not be passed in haste; for it may very easily involve an extremely grave blunder.

DEATH OF CARDINAL ANDREA.

THE Church of Rome is held up to the world by its advocates as a model of unity. But it is the unity of despotism, not that of Christian fraternity. Its persecutions directed against the wanderers from the fold are not less remarkable than its violence toward some of its own members. Neither the distinction of rank nor the rarest powers of mind and heart are a shield against its thunder-bolts. Talent, either in politics or religion, is sufficient to secure its implacable hostility.

We have recent tidings of the decease of Cardinal ANDREA—one of the six Cardinal Bishops of Rome—whom the Pope and the Jesuits have literally hunted to death, simply because he was a dangerous enemy to the temporal power. It is asserted that the Pope predicted his death the day before it occurred, and it is currently on the lips of the Italian newspapers that the Cardinal was poisoned by the Jesuits. This may not be true, but ANDREA's own opinion of the character of his enemies was pretty frankly expressed two years ago to a friend at Naples, obnoxious like himself to the Papal Government, and who contemplated visiting Rome. "Beware," said the Cardinal; "you are ill-noted there, and will not be safe. If I were you myself I should take the most minute precautions. They are capable of much you may not dream of." But whether poisoned or not, the Cardinal was judicially murdered.

Upon the Pope's return to Rome from his flight to Gaeta (in 1848) he rewarded ANDREA for his past fidelity by making him a Cardinal and Prefect of the Congregation of the Index. Here began the difficulty between the Cardinal and the Jesuits. The latter were bent upon censuring a certain book, and the former refused to adopt their views, which he deemed to be illiberal, and, finally, to retire from the Jesuits, he resigned his post as Prefect. The vengeance of his enemies slumbered. The influence of his position was felt in the next conclave for the election of Pope. Hence this recent persecution, terminating in his death. His physician years ago forbade him, as he valued his life, to remain in Rome on account of the unhealthy climate. Pope PIUS IX., however, pertinaciously refused leave of absence. In 1864 ANDREA was sent by the Pope to Naples without leave, and was consequently, in the teeth of all canon law, deprived of his dignity and privileges as a Cardinal, unless within three months he returned to Rome. He did not return, and little more than four months afterward (May 14) he died. He visited the Pope the day before his death, and was refused the restoration of his bishopric, which he most anxiously promised. That night he wrote a letter announcing the whole policy and system of the Roman Court, and dispatched it to the Vatican in the morning. In the afternoon of the 14th, after a short drive, he died so suddenly that his chaplain had hardly time to administer the last rites of the Church. The corpse was attended his sepulture, but the church was not hung in black, and the Cardinal's escutcheon was not, according to custom, placed over the door. His enemies could not refrain from a petty exhibition of triumph at his obsequies.

Cardinal ANDREA and King VICTOR EMANUEL were in accord as to the views of the temporal power, and the death of the former is a great blow to the Party of Progress in Italy.

THE SAVIOURS OF THE UNION.

THE chief Democratic paper of the city of New York, on the morning of the 4th of July, published a biographical list of the delegates to the Democratic Convention. It headed the article in large letters: "The Men upon whom the Republic relies for Salvation." "How the Record of Service to the Nation." "How the Republic's Friends will Celebrate the Republic's Natal Day."

Naturally curious to see who were the patriots upon whom the safety of the republic rests we began the list. Alabama was the first State mentioned. Of the first delegate on the list one was a rebel General, and another a rebel Colonel. Of the twelve district delegates, five were rebel soldiers, and one was in the rebel Congress. The next Southern State mentioned was North Carolina. Of the four delegates at large, two were rebel Generals, and one was in the Congress. Of the district delegates named, five were rebel officers, and one was in the civil service. At the head of the South Carolina delegation—the only other Southern State named—stands WADE HAMPTON, described as "unquestionably the leading man in South Carolina, and fills more nearly than any other the place left vacant by CALHOUN in the hearts of the white people."

Besides these there were scores of others as noted for heir hatred of the Union, whose sentiments were recently expressed by WADE HAMPTON at GEN RALEE'S Washington College in Virginia, tha the cause for which STONEWALL JACKSON fell could not be a lost cause, and would yet triumph; that is to say, that secession would yet be accomplished.

These are "the men upon whom the Republic relies for salvation."

"Their record of service to the nation" reaches from the shot at the unarmed Star of the West to the surrender of LEE to GRANT and the flight of JEFFERSON DAVIS to Canada and is illustrated by QUANTRELL's Lawrence massacre, by the Andersonville and Salisbury pens, by the assassination of President LINCOLN, by the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of brave men fighting for the Union, and by a debt of twenty-five hundred millions of dollars.

Five years ago those "friends of the Republic" celebrated the day by striking at its heart at Vicksburg and Gettysburg. This year they celebrated it by seeking some other means of consummating the crime that was then—thanks to the brave hearts and hands of loyal men!—wholly baffled.

Let no one say that it is a mistake of fact and of policy to regard these men as rebels, and that there are many of them who are not to be to remember the war. We do not describe them: they describe themselves. They not only venerate the lost cause as those who served it sincerely, but as those who serve it still, and do not hesitate to say so. If that is the cause of the loyal people of the United States they will follow WADE HAMPTON and his colleagues: not otherwise.

THE POSITION OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE.

WHETHER MR. CHASE receives the Democratic nomination or not, his position is most humiliating. The Chief Justice of the United States must feel that Presidential office is not an ennobling spectacle. His conduct degrades the judiciary, not because a citizen should renounce all patriotic interest in politics because he is a judge, but because I aye has office upon to suspicion. A Chief Justice who is so concerned with desire of the Executive office that he openly and shamefully and ridiculously apparent to all the world, views the doubt whether his judgments might not be affected by his ambition. Whatever the nomination of MR. CHASE might prove, therefore, as to the practical demoralization of the Democratic party, it certainly clouds his own fame and enrolls him among the most melancholy examples of those American public men who have been ruined by the Presidential frenzy.

He says in his letter of July 1, "The practical disposition of the question of suffrage, as well as all other domestic questions, is for the people of the States themselves, not for outsiders." If this means after the States are restored, nobody asserts any thing else. It is the very position of the Republican platform. If it means that Congress has no right to settle the question of suffrage in an unrestored State, then the Chief Justice has changed his views and has gone over to the Democratic ground. In his speech at Charleston on the 12th of May, 1865, MR. CHASE said plainly: "I proposed men that if Congress did not enfranchise them, "I would go to work and show that the United States Government was mistaken in making the delay. If you show this the mistake will be corrected." This is not only a hearty approval of the Republican policy, but was meant to be understood as such, and to secure the rebel nomination.

The Chief Justice says in conclusion: "It is an intense desire with me to see the Democratic party meeting the questions of the day in the spirit of 1776, and assuring to itself a long duration of ascendency. It can do so if it will." He forgets that the enduring supremacy of a party comes from real convictions and a logical policy. The Chief Justice seems anxious to see that a great party can not rat as an individual may. It is not enough for a party to insist down to the moment of its Convention, as the World did, that the question to be decided by the election is, whether the reconstruction policy shall stand, and when the Convention meets declare that it accepts the policy, and will nominate one of the old supporters of the policy, who eats his words for the occasion, so that literally each goes over to the other.

To secure a long duration of ascendency the Democratic party must find another course than the uncertain adoption of the Republican policy and the nomination of a wavering Republican.

THE ALPHABET AND THE BALLOT.

EDUCATION, the diffusion of intelligence, is to us the great national regenerator and pacificator. Knowledge is power, and power more so than among the freedmen, and power is confidence. The alphabet and the ballot are going hand in hand at the South. One protects and secures the other. The most intelligent recently-freed in North Carolina when it took the field did not contain twenty men who could read and write. A body of men of that race there was not a single man in it who could not do both. Such real for instruction, such readiness in learning, such results, were never known as the lately-emancipated race have displayed. During the last half of the year 1867 there were more than three thousand schools open for the freedmen.

Among the documents interested in the subject the New York branch of the Freedmen's Union Commission is well known to us, and none has been more faithful. But it has reached the end of its stint of work, and must turn with an exhausted treasury. It is without the means of bringing home the devoted band of women who for the past nine months have given up all the comforts of their own quiet Northern homes, for work carried on in the face of many privations, and in some places in opposition to the active enmity of the people. The better class." During the past season, as during the previous ones, the Society has educated many thousands of children and some hundreds of adults, and the trustees confidently believe that of the money which has been intrusted to them not a dollar has been wasted. But during the past three months the receipts have not equaled the promises at the time of the opening of the schools last fall, and the trustees are now compelled to ask all who feel an interest in this great work, and in its continuance, to contribute without delay such amount as they may be willing to give, sending it either to FRANCIS GEORGE SHAW, President, 30 Vesey Street, or to EDWARD F. DAVISON, Treasurer, 128 Pearl Street.

THE "HIGH-TONED" GENTRY AGAIN.

ON the day before the meeting of the Democratic Convention at Tammany Hall the World had an article upon the duty of the Southern delegates, which said to them, with great truth and distinctness, that if the Southern Democrats voted at all in the Presidential election they must vote under the new State governments, and must so for recognize them. If they did not vote, by what right were they represented in the Convention? The World knew, of course, that there were Southern delegates who talked of revolution, and so forth, in the event of defeat, and it therefore concluded—after showing the situation in which the Southern members were placed—"There is no way out of this dilemma except by the sword, and the land has already been drenched with too much fraternal blood."

But in the same article, with the irresistible Northern Democratic instinct to cower and cringe before the late haughty masters of the party, the World says:

"After the platform is adopted and the nominations made it will be time for the Southern delegates duty to contribute what they can to the success of the ticket in their own States. The bare implied condition of participating in the national council of the Democratic party is the condition which, with any quick sense of honor, the Southern delegates and the likeminded people they represent will be the first to recognize."

As they did in the Charleston Convention of 1860!

WHAT THE SOLDIERS SAY.

WE presume that the letter of General ORD was not read at the Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention at the Cooper Institute. The General has not been in circumstances of very dangerous Radical, but after the letter he wrote to the San Francisco meeting he must expect no mercy. He had been invited to be a Vice-President of the great ratification meeting in San Francisco, and he replied to the chairman:

"SIR,—Your note of the 29th instant, inviting me to attend a meeting to ratify the nomination of GRANT and COLFAX, on the 4th proximo, is just received.

"As I think it improper for officers of the army to take any active part in political affairs, I shall have to decline the honor of acting as Vice-President at the meeting, but as a friend who is anxious to show my appreciation of the great General and his associate, Mr. COLFAX, the country has honored so highly, it will afford me pleasure to be present at the meeting.

"I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"E. O. C. ORD,
"Brigadier and Brevet Major-General."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

THE organization of the Democratic Convention in the city took place on July 4, at Tammany Hall, which is described elsewhere in our columns. Henry S. Palmer, of Wisconsin was chosen temporary chairman, and after the organization and resolutions were appointed. On the 5th, Horatio Seymour, of New York, was chosen President, and, fully organized, the Convention began its work. The platform was very short, merely a tirade against the Republican policy of reconstruction, and a declaration of the general principles of the Democracy. Little was accomplished on the 6th except the session, the balloting not even before the lack of harmony between the Eastern and Western delegates was clearly manifested. At the time at which we go to press no nomination has been made or platform adopted.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Constitution has been declared in Mississippi by 53,647 majority.

President Johnson issued, on July 4, a proclamation of general amnesty and pardon to all engaged in the late rebellion, except those already excepted from the benefits of such proclamations.

The Board of Health of the city has called attention to the fact that many marriages are performed by notaries public in this city, which is illegal. The law requires that to perform the ceremony they must be General Canby has announced that the North Carolina Legislature had ratified the constitutional amendment, and issued an order regulating the new law in that State.

The Schutzenfest closed on July 5 with the distribution of prizes in Jones's Wood, New York. Governor Fenton, was crowned Schutzenking, and received as a present a silver vase valued at $1,000. A thousand bar worth $80, a merschaum pipe worth $100, and other prizes and donations aggregating in money value to over $3000.

The steamship occupied in a race from Oakland, California, opposite San Francisco, by the giving way of the boilers of one of the ferry-boats, forty persons were precipitated into the water, of whom a large number were drowned. Ten bodies were recovered.

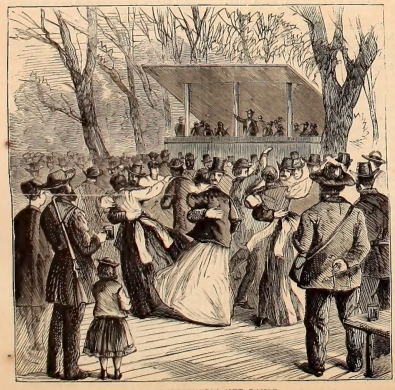
FOREIGN NEWS.

BAVARIA has signed the Nature-libation treaty with the United States.

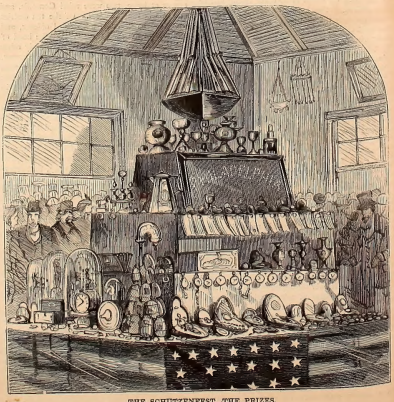
The affairs in China were menacing Pekin very seriously on May 30.

The Viceroyalty of the British man-of-war Chanticleer, for some actual or imagined insult to its flag, has demanded satisfaction from Mexico, which is refused to bombard it. The threat resulted in the holding of the Mexican flag over all American forts and other property, the appearance of an American fleet before the harbor to protect American interests, and the display of Mexican infantry and artillery in the city. The Captain Bridge then concluded to wait or dere from his Admiral.

There are peace signs in Europe. Minister Rouher, of France, says that "strong standing armies is a plague of peace; that Napoleon accepts German unity and the rights of nationalities; and that France has no idea of war except in defense of her territory." The Austrian Government furloughs thirty-six thousand soldiers for harvesting. Although no active army corps, classed, Hayti, was recently plundered by the peasantry in the hill-districts, and a revolution is feared. There has demanded the presence of an American man-of-war.



THE SCHUTZENFEST—THE DOMESTIC SHARP-SHOOTER.



THE SCHUTZENFEST—THE CONVIVAL SHARP-SHOOTER.

THE SCHUTZENFEST—SHOOTING-GALLERY AT JONES'S WOOD.—SHARP-SHOOTERS FIRING AT THE TARGETS.

THE SCHUTZENFEST—THE DANCE.

THE SCHUTZENFEST—THE PRIZES.

INDEPENDENCE.

OUR Freedom seeks no pathway strewn with flowers,
She treads rough roads and gurds uneven coasts,
And battling with the might of adverse powers,
She dares war's blood-red hosts.

Her children must be earnest, calm, and timid,
Not quick to wrath, but ready at her call;
They knew her well, the dauntless five-and-fifty
Of Independence Hall.

They counted and accepted each privation,
The sacrifice of self, by which they won her,
When to the truths of that old Declaration
They pledged their lives and honor.

Freedom to us to-day is no new-comer:
Full oft, despondent, gazing in her eyes,
We've gained the faith that drawn the warmth of summer
From winter's tempest skies.

Yet more than all before are we her debtors:
'Tis good and proper that we chant her hymns,
For at our call she struck the galling fetters
Off from four million limbs.

To us 'twas given to know the way of duty,
To find within the battle's heart our gem
Of priceless worth, and of eternal beauty,
To deck her diadem.

She is our love. What though her breast be gory
And thunder-scarred? What though the tyrant scorns?
Was not the Head, ineffable in glory,
Once crowned with cruel thorns?

Anew upon this birthday of the nation
We pledge ourselves through years of peace or strife
To those great principles which give duration
To Freedom's generous life.

THE SHARP-SHOOTERS' CARNIVAL.

HARLEQUIN, and Columbine, and Prince Carnival, and all the rest of the tribe of mimes, are supposed to be children of the land of GARIBALDI and GRISWALD; but of late years they have largely emigrated, and nowadays the Italian "Maccaroni" is "Jean Potage" in France, "Jack Pudding" in England, "Picked-herringe" in Holland, "Hanswurst" in Germany, and "Gracioso" in Spain. But of all the lands under the sun, the sprites seem to be most at home in this country, and the Yankee Prince Carnival appears to be, like our population, made up of all nations. He is as stolid as the Indian, as witty as the Frenchman, as grotesque as the German, as droll as the Spaniard, and a pretty good representative of all nations amalgamated in one.

But of all peoples the Germans appear to be fondest of Prince Carnival, and he is as much a patron saint with them as Santa Claus himself. It is doubtful, much as we hear of the extravagance and grotesqueness of Carnivals in some of the old countries, if there is any land in which the Germans carry their Carnival celebrations to such an extent as in this. In winter their Arion and other balls indoors are of the most humorous character, and their occasional outdoor carnivals, like that of the Sharp-shooters during the first week of this month, has never been excelled in this country.

We have illustrated elsewhere the procession through the streets of New York, with some of the scenes witnessed by our artists, CHARLES G. BUSH and STANLEY FOX, and joined them in their note-books, and the reader who did not see it may enjoy in their reproductions some of the grotesqueness and humor of this midsummer carnival. The procession took place on June 30, and was witnessed and participated in by a quarter of a million persons. Our front-page illustration represents a part of the cortège passing through Union Square. This procession was a most fantastic display, but arranged with artistic design. There were seven distinct divisions. The first was composed of various German infantry commands; the second of various groups or squads representing soldiers of different ages, and designed to illustrate the gradual development of the warrior-knight of old into the sharp-shooter of to-day; the third was a triumphal chariot, on which were grouped a number of ladies representing various countries, and all fraternizing about the figure of Columbia, "the noblest (and loveliest) of them all;" the fourth was composed of the various companies of sharp-shooters; the fifth a number of companies illustrating the various uniforms, from the Continental of 1776 to those of the present day; the sixth was formed of the various German singing societies of the city and vicinity; and the seventh all the German artillery organization of New York. In the second division, which was the most fantastic of all, there were armored knights with their lances, bowmen with the weapon of TELL, musketeers of the days of Frederick the Great, Prussian needle-gun soldiers of Old Fritz, soldiers with flint-lock guns, Tyrolean warriors with rifles, and, finally, sharp-shooters with every variety of the modern Needle, Carding, Chassepot, and breech-loading rifles. The chariot consisted of a platform, with a raised throne under a canopy of the rear end, handsomely decorated with the American colors and garlands of natural flowers, and around the sides were shields with the coats of arms of the various represented in the car. Six white horses drew this imposing vehicle, led by as many jockeys in costume, and the reins were held by an experienced John, assisted by two grooms all in scarlet.

The various scenes on page 452 will further serve to illustrate the peculiar spirit of the occasion. The German never enjoys himself, whether at feast or work, without his children, and the little ones as well as the rifles were in arms during the festival week. It was not unusual to see a sturdy Teuton lauded down, as is the one in our sketch, with a fat baby and his favorite rifle, and those of his friends who were engaged in dancing. Another very common and characteristic scene is reproduced in the second sketch on the same page, illustrating the Teutons at the lager-beer tables. The dancing, as well as the drinking, was kept up continuously, day and night, in spite of the hot weather. On the same page with these we give a view in the shooting-gallery, representing the firing; and a view of the prize-stand, and the various prizes grouped on and around it.

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

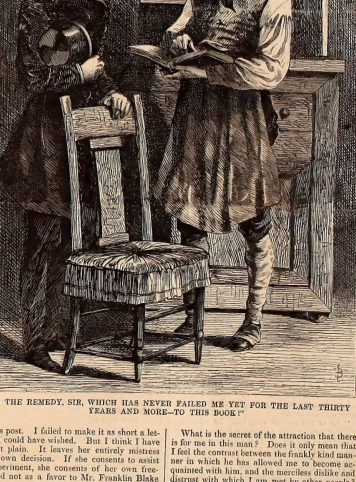
Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

FOURTH NARRATIVE.

Extracted from the Journal of Ezra Jennings.

1849.—June 15..... With some interruption from patients, and some interruption from pain, I finished my letter to Miss Verinder in time for



"You shall have it on the earliest possible day," I answered. "In the mean time, we must be as careful of your health as we can." If we allow you to become exhausted, we shall fail in that way. You must get an appetite for your dinner. In other words, you must get a ride or a walk this morning in the fresh air."

"I will ride, if they can find me a horse here. By-the-by, I wrote to Mr. Bruff yesterday. Have you written to Miss Verinder?"

"Yes—by last night's post."

"Very good. We shall have some news worth hearing to tell each other to-morrow. Don't go yet! I have a word to say to you. You appeared to think, yesterday, that our experiment with the opium was not likely to be viewed very favorably by some of my friends. You were quite right, I call old Gabriel Betteredge one of my friends; and you will be amused to hear that he protested strongly when I saw him yesterday. You have done a wonderful number of foolish things in the course of your life, Mr. Franklin; but this tops them all! There is Betteredge's opinion! You will make allowances for his prejudices, I am sure, if you and he happen to meet."

I left Mr. Blake, to go my rounds among my patients; feeling the better and the happier even for the short interview that I had had with him.

"TO THE REMEDY, SIR, WHICH HAS NEVER FAILED ME YET FOR THE LAST THIRTY YEARS AND MORE—TO THIS BOOK!"

to-day's post. I failed to make it as short a letter as I could have wished. But I think I have made it plain. It leaves her entirely mistress of her own decision. If she consents to assist the experiment, she consents of her own free will, and not as a favor to Mr. Franklin Blake or to me.

June 16.—Rose late, after a dreadful night; the vengeance of yesterday's opium pursuing me through a series of frightful dreams. At one time, I was whirling through empty space with the phantoms of the dead, friends and enemies together. At another, the one beloved face which I shall never see again, rose at the bedside, hideously phosphorescent in the black darkness, and glared and grinned at me. A slight return of the pain, at the usual hour in the early morning, was welcome as a change. It dispelled the visions—and it was bearable because it did that.

My bad night made it late in the morning before I could get to Mr. Franklin Blake. I found him stretched on the sofa, breakfasting on brandy and soda-water, and a dry biscuit.

"I am beginning as well as you could possibly wish," he said. "A miserable, restless night; and a total failure of appetite this morning. Exactly what happened last year when I gave up my cigars. The sooner I am ready for my second dose of laudanum the better I shall be pleased."

What is the secret of the attraction that there is for me in this man? Does it only mean that I feel the contrast between the frankly kind manner in which he has allowed me to become acquainted with him, and the merciless dislike and distrust with which I am met by other people? Or is there really something in him which answers to the yearning that I have for a little human sympathy—the yearning, which has survived the solitude and persecution of many years; which seems to grow keener and keener, as the time comes nearer and nearer when I shall endure and feel no more? How useless to ask these questions! Mr. Blake has given me a new interest in life. Let that be enough, without seeking to know what the new interest is.

June 17.—Before breakfast this morning Mr. Candy informed me that he was going away for a fortnight, on a visit to a friend in the south of England. He gave me as many special directions, poor fellow, about the patients, as if he still had the large practice which he possessed before he was taken ill. The practice is worth little enough now! Other doctors have superseded him; and nobody who can help it will employ me.

It is perhaps fortunate that he is to be away just at this time. He would have been mortified if I had not informed him of the experiment which I am going to try with Mr. Blake. And I hardly know what undesirable results might not have happened if I had taken him into my confidence. Better as it is. Unquestionably, better as it is.

The post brought me Miss Verinder's answer, after Mr. Candy had left the house.

A charming letter! It gives me the highest opinion of her. There is no attempt to conceal the interest that she feels in our proceedings. She tells me, in the prettiest manner, that my letter has satisfied her as Mr. Blake's innocence, without the slightest need (so far as she is concerned) of putting my assertion to the proof. She even upbraids herself—most unreservedly, poor thing!—for not having divined at the time what the true solution of the mystery might really be. The motive underlying all this proceeds evidently from something more than a generous eagerness to make atonement for a wrong which she has innocently inflicted on another person. It is plain that she has loved him throughout the estrangement between them. In more than one place the rapture of discovering that he has deserved to be loved breaks its way innocently through the stoutest formalities of pen and ink, and even defies the stronger restraint still of writing to a stranger. Is it possible (I ask myself, in reading this delightful letter) that I, of all men in the world, am chosen to be the means of bringing these two young people together again? My own happiness has been trampled under foot; my own love has been torn from me. Shall I live to see a happiness of others, which is of my making—a love renewed, which is of my bringing back? Oh merciful Death, let me see it before your arms enfold me, before your voice whispers to me, "Rest at last!"

There are two requests contained in the letter. One of them prevents me from showing it to Mr. Franklin Blake. I am authorized to tell him that Miss Verinder willingly consents to place her house at our disposal; and, that said, I am desired to add no more.

So far, it is easy to comply with her wishes. But the second request causes embarrasses me seriously.

Not content with having written to Mr. Betteredge, instructing him to carry out whatever directions I may have to give, Miss Verinder asks leave to assist me, by personally superintending the restoration of her own sitting-room. She only waits a word of reply from me, to make the journey to Yorkshire, and to be present as one of the witnesses on the night when the opium is tried for the second time.

Here, again, there is a motive under the surface; and, here again, I fancy that I can find it out.

What she has forbidden me to tell Mr. Franklin Blake, she is (as I interpret it) eager to tell him with her own lips, before he is put to the test which is to vindicate his character in the eyes of other people. I understand and admire this generous anxiety to acquit him, without waiting until his innocence may, or may not, be proved. It is the atonement that she is longing to make, poor girl, after having innocently and inevitably wronged him. But the thing can not be done. I have no sort of doubt that the agitation which a meeting between them would produce on both sides—the old feelings which it would excite, the new hopes which it would awaken—would, in their effect on the mind of Mr. Blake, be almost certainly fatal to the success of our experiment. It is hard enough, as things are, to reproduce in him the conditions as they existed, or nearly as they existed, last year. With new emotions and new causes to agitate him, the attempt would be simply useless.

And yet, knowing this, I can not find it in my heart to disappoint her. I am ready to let her discover some new arrangement, before post-time, which will allow me to say Yes to Miss Verinder, without danger to the secret on which I have bound myself to render to Mr. Franklin Blake.

Two o'clock.—I have just returned from my round of medical visits: having begun, of course, by calling at the hotel.

Mr. Blake's report of the night is the same as before. He has had some intervals of broken sleep, and no more. But he feels it less to-day, having slept after supper, as I ordered. His under-dinner sleep is the result, no doubt, of the rule which I made him to take. I find I shall have to curtail his restorative exercise in the fresh air. He must not be too well; he must not be too ill. It is a case (as the sailors would say) of very fine steering.

He has not heard yet from Mr. Bruff. I found him eager to hear if I had received any answer from Miss Verinder.

I told him exactly what I was permitted to tell, and no more. It was quite unnecessary to invent excuses for not showing him the letter. He told me bitterly enough, poor fellow, that he understood the delicacy which prevented me from to produce it. "She consents, of course, as a matter of common courtesy and common justice," he said. "But she keeps her own opinion of me, and waits to see the result." I was sorely tempted to hint that he was now wronging her as she had wronged him. On reflection, I shrunk from forestalling her in the double luxury of surprising and forgiving him.

My visit was a very short one. After the experience of the other night, I have been compelled once more to give up my dinner-hour. As a necessary result, the agony of the disease that is in me has got the upper hand again. I felt the attack coming on, and promptly, so as not to alarm or distress him. It only lasted a quarter of an hour this time, and it left me strength enough to go on with my work.

Five o'clock.—I have written my reply to Miss Verinder.

The arrangement I have proposed reconciles the interest on both sides, if she will only consent to it. After first stating the objections that there are to a meeting between Mr. Blake and herself, before the experiment is tried, I have suggested that she should so time her journey as to arrive at the house privately, on the evening when we make the attempt. Traveling by the afternoon train from London, she would delay her arrival until nine o'clock. At that hour, I have undertaken to see Mr. Blake safely into his bedchamber; and so to leave Miss Verinder free to occupy her own room until the time comes for administering the laudanum. When that has been done, there can be no objection to her watching the result, with the rest of us, in the next morning she shall show Mr. Blake (if she likes) her correspondence with me, and shall satisfy him in that way that he was acquitted in her estimation, before the question of his innocence was put to the proof.

In the terms I have written for her. This is all that I can do to-day. To-morrow I must see Mr. Betteredge, and give the necessary directions for reopening the house.

June 18.—Late again, in calling on Mr. Franklin Blake. More of that horrible pain in the early morning; followed, this time, by complete prostration, for some hours. I foresee, in spite of my precautions, that it exacts from me, at last, I shall have to return to the opium for the hundredth time. If I had only myself to think of, I should offer the sharp pain to the frightful dreams. But the physical suffering exhausts me. If I let myself sink, it may end in my becoming addicted to Mr. Blake at the time when he wants me most.

It was nearly nine o'clock before I could get to the house in Montagu Square. The visit, even in my shattered condition, proved to be a most amusing one—thanks entirely to the presence, on the scene, of Gabriel Betteredge.

I found him in the room, when I went in. He withdrew to the window and looked out, while I put my usual customary question to my patient. Mr. Blake had slept badly again, and he felt the loss of rest this morning more than he had felt it yet.

I asked next if he had heard from Mr. Bruff.

A letter had reached him that morning. Mr. Bruff expressed the strongest disapproval of the course which his friend and client was taking under my advice. It was mischievous—for it exceeded what I might never be entitled. It was quite unintelligible to his mind, except that he looked like a piece of trickery, akin to the tricks of the circus, clairvoyance and the like. It unsettled Miss Verinder's house, and it would end in unsettling Miss Verinder herself. In a word (without mentioning names) to an eminent physician; and the eminent physician had smiled, had shaken his head, and had said—nothing. On these grounds, Mr. Bruff entered his protest, and left it there.

My next inquiry related to the subject of the Diamond. Had the lawyer produced any evidence to prove that the jewel was in London?

No, the lawyer had simply declined to discuss the question. He was himself satisfied that the Moonstone had been pledged to Mr. Luker. His estimable friend, Mr. Matthew Bruff (whose consummate knowledge of the Indian character no one could deny), was satisfied also. Under these circumstances, and with the many demands already made on him, he must decline entering into any disputes on the subject of evidence. Time would show; and Mr. Bruff was willing to wait for time.

It was quite plain—even if Mr. Blake had not made it palpable out of his reporting by means of the letter, instead of reading what was actually written—that distrust of me was at the bottom of all this. Having myself proved the result, I was neither mortified nor surprised. I asked Mr. Blake if his friend's protest had shaken him. He answered emphatically that it had not produced the slightest effect on his mind. I was free after that to dismiss Mr. Bruff from consideration—and I did dismiss him, accordingly.

A pause in the talk between us followed—and Gabriel Betteredge came out from his retirement at the window.

"Can you favor me with your attention, Sir?" he inquired, addressing himself to me.

"I am quite at your service," I answered.

Betteredge took a chair and seated himself at the table. He produced a big old-fashioned pocket-leather pocket-book, with a pencil of dimensions to match. Having put on his spectacles he opened the pocket-book, at a blank leaf, and addressed himself to me once more.

"I have lived," said Betteredge, looking at me sternly, "fifty years in the service of my late lady. I was page-boy before that in the service of the old lord, her father. I am now sixty-one between seventy and eighty years of age—never mind exactly where! I am reckoned by those who are pretty knowledge and experience of the world to stand on the right side of common sense. All and what does it all end in? It ends, Mr. Ezra Jennings, in a conjuring trick being performed on Mr. Franklin Blake by a doctor's assistant with a bottle of laudanum; and, by the living jingo, I'm appointed, in my old age, to be conjurer to him!"

Mr. Blake burst out laughing. I attempted to speak. Betteredge held up his hand in token that he had not done yet.

"Not a word, Mr. Jennings!" he said. "It don't want a word, Sir, from you. I have got my principles, thank God. If I am to order come to me which is own brother to an order come from Bedlam, it don't matter. So long as I get it from my master or mistress, as the case may be, I obey it. I may have my own opinion, which is also, you will please to remember, the opinion of Mr. Bruff—the Great Mr. Bruff!" said Betteredge, raising his voice, and shaking his head at me solemnly. "I don't matter; I withdraw my opinion, for all that. My young lady says, 'Do it.' And I say, 'Miss, it shall be done.' Here I am, with my book and my pencil—the latter not pointed so well as I could wish; but when Christians take leave of their senses, also it is to expect that pencils will keep their points? Give me your orders, Mr. Jennings. I'll have them in writing, Sir. I'm determined not to be behind 'em, or before 'em, by so much as a hair's-breadth. I'm a blind agent!" repeated Betteredge, with infinite relish of his own description of himself.

"I am very sorry," I began, "that I and I don't agree—"

"Don't bring me into it!" interposed Betteredge, edge. "This is not a matter of argument, it's a matter of obedience. Issue your directions, Sir—issue your direction!"

"I have only to make an end to take him at his word. I "issued my directions" as plainly and as gravely as I could.

"I need hardly say, Sir, as it was furnished lawyer—to begin with."

"Why?"

"Because there was a stuffed buzzard, Mr. Jennings, in the hall last year. When the family left the buzzard was put away with the other things. When the buzzard was put away—he burst."

"We will except the buzzard then."

Betteredge took a note, and made an exception. "The linen hall to be furnished again, as furnished last year. A burst buzzard alone excepted." "Have to go on, Mr. Jennings—"

"The carpet to be laid down on the stairs, as before.' Sorry to disappoint you, Sir. But that can't be done either."

"Why not?"

"Because the man who laid that carpet down is dead, Mr. Jennings; and the like of him for fitting carpets together a second time is not likely to be found in all England, look where you may."

"Very well. We must try the next best man in England."

Betteredge took another note, and I went on issuing my directions.

"The housekeeper's sitting-room to be restored exactly to what it was last year. Also, the corridor leading from the sitting-room to the first landing. Also, the bedroom over the sitting-room, the second landing to the best bedrooms. Also, the bedroom occupied last June by Mr. Franklin Blake."

Betteredge's blunt pencil followed me conscientiously, word by word. "Go on, Sir," he said, with infinite gravity, "and you'll be a deal of writing left in the point of this pencil yet."

I told him that I had no more directions to give. "Eh, Sir?" said Betteredge, in a state of blank surprise, "you're not going to begin with me took up the carpet last year, Mr. Jennings, we found a surprising quantity of pins. Am I responsible for putting back the pins?"

"Certainly not."

Betteredge made a note of that concession on the spot.

"As to the first corridor next," he resumed. "When we moved the ornaments in that part, we moved a great deal of rubbish. Some of it lately described in the catalogue of the house as 'Cupid, god of Love.' He had two wings last year, in the fleshy shoulders. One wing, the eye being off him, for the moment, he lost one of them. Am I responsible for Cupid's wing?"

I made another concession, and Betteredge made another note.

"As to the second corridor," he went on. "There have been words spoken at last year in the doors of the rooms (to every one of which I can swear, if necessary), my mind is easy. Judge, reasonable, Sir, of the words. But as to Mr. Franklin's bedroom (if that is to be put back to what it was before), I want to know who is responsible for keeping it in a perpetual state of litter, no matter how often it may be set right—who is responsible for the litter, and his French novels every where—I say, who is responsible for untidying the tidiness of Mr. Franklin's room?"

Mr. Blake declared that he would assume the whole responsibility with the greatest pleasure. Betteredge respectfully shook his head over the solution of the difficulty without first referring it to my sanction and approval. I accepted Mr. Blake's proposal; and Betteredge made a last entry in the pocket-book to that effect.

"Look in when you like, Mr. Jennings, between this and to-morrow night, and you'll see the stuffed buzzard, and the other case of the Cupid's wing—as also for permitting me to wash my hands of all responsibility in respect of the pins on the carpet, and the litter in Mr. Franklin's room. Speaking as a servant, I am deeply indebted to you. Speaking as a man, I consider you to be a person whose head is full of nuggets; and I take up my testimony against your experiment as a delusion and a snare. Don't be afraid, on that account, of my feelings as a man getting in the way of my duty as a servant. You shall be obeyed—the nuggets notwithstanding, Sir, you shall be obeyed. If it ends in your setting the house on fire, damme if I send for the engines unless you ring the bell and order them first!"

With that farewell assurance he made me a bow, and walked out of the room.

"Do you think we can depend on him?" I asked.

"Implicitly," answered Mr. Blake. "When we go to bed to-night we shall find nothing neglected, and nothing forgotten."

June 19.—Another protest against our contemplated proceedings! From a lady this time.

The morning's post brought me two letters. One from Miss Verinder, consenting, in the kindest manner, to the arrangement that I have proposed. The other from the lady under whose care she is living—Mrs. Merridew.

Mrs. Merridew presents her compliments, and does not pretend to understand the subject on which I have thought proper to correspond with Miss Verinder, in its scientific bearings. Viewed in its social bearings, however, she feels free to pronounce an opinion. I am probably, Mrs. Merridew thinks, not aware that Miss Verinder is barely nineteen years of age. To allow a young lady of that age to be present (without a "chaperon") in a house full of men among whom a medical experiment is being carried on, is an outrage on propriety which Mrs. Merridew can not possibly permit. If the matter is allowed to proceed, she will feel it to be her duty—at a painful sacrifice of her personal convenience—to accompany Miss Verinder to Yorkshire. Under these circumstances she ventures to request, as a favor, that I will reconsider the subject; seeing that Miss Verinder declines to be guided by any opinion but mine. Her presence can not possibly be necessary; and a word from me, to that effect, would relieve both Mrs. Merridew and myself of a very unpleasant responsibility.

Translated into polite commonplace into plain English, the meaning of this is, as I take it, that Mrs. Merridew stands in mortal fear of the opinion of the world, and has unfortunately appointed to the very last man in existence who has any reason to regard that opinion with respect. I won't dangle Mrs. Merridew; and I won't write a reconciliation between two young people who love each other, and who have been parted too long already. Putting aside plain English into polite commonplace, this means that Mr. Jennings presents his compliments to Mrs. Merridew, and regrets that he does not feel justified in interfering any further in the matter.

Mr. Blake's report of himself this morning was to the same effect. He had determined not to disturb Betteredge by overlooking him at the house to-day. To-morrow will be time enough for our first visit of inspection.

June 20.—Mr. Blake is beginning to feel his combined anxiety and pain at night. The sooner the ooms are refurnished now the better.

On our way to the house this morning he consulted me, after the nervous impatience of his irresolution, about a letter (forwarded to him from London) which he had received from Sergeant Cuff.

The Sergeant writes from Ireland. He acknowledges the receipt (through his house-keeping of a certain letter from which Mr. Blake had at his residence near Dorking, and announces his return to England as likely to take place in a week or less. He will mean time be requested to be favored with Mr. Blake's reasons for wishing to speak to him (as stated in the message) on the subject of the Moonstone. If Mr. Blake can convict him of having made any serious mistake, in the course of his last year's inquiry concerning the Diamond, he will consider it a duty (after the liberal manner in which he was treated by the late Lady Verinder) to place himself at his disposal gratuitously. If not, he begs permission to remain in his retirement, surrounded by the peaceful floricultural attractions of a country life.

After reading the letter, I had no hesitation in advising Mr. Blake to inform Sergeant Cuff, in reply, of all that had happened since the inquiry was suspended last year, and to leave him to draw his own conclusions from those plain facts.

On second thoughts, I also suggested inviting the Sergeant to be present at the experiment, in the event of his returning to England in time to join us. He would be a valuable witness to have in any case; and, if I proved to be wrong in believing the Diamond to be hidden in Mr. Blake's room, his advice might be of great importance, as a future stage of the proceedings over which I should have no control. Mr. Blake's last consideration appeared to decide Mr. Blake. He promised to follow my advice.

The usual arrangement informed us that the work of refurnishing was in full progress, as we entered the drive that led to the house.

Betteredge was stationed for the occasion in a fisherman's red cap and an apron of green baize, met us in the outer hall. The moment he saw me he pulled out the pocket-book and pencil, and obstinately insisted on taking notes of every thing that I said to him. Look where we might we found, in the hall forgotten, that the work was advancing as rapidly and as intelligently as it was possible to desire. But there was still much to be done in the inner hall, and in Miss Verinder's room. It seemed doubtful whether the house would be ready for us before the end of the week.

Having congratulated Betteredge on the progress that he had made (he persisted in taking notes every time I opened my lips; declining, at the same time, to pay the slightest attention to any thing said by Mr. Blake), and having promised to return for a second visit of inspection in a day or two, we prepared to leave the house, going out by the back way. Before we were clear of the passages down stairs I was stopped by Betteredge, just as I was passing the door which led into his own room.

"Could I say two words to you in private?" he asked, in a mysterious whisper.

I consented of course. Mr. Blake walked on to wait for me in the garden, while I accompanied Betteredge into his room. I fully anticipated a demand for certain new concessions, following the precedent already established in the cases of the stuffed buzzard and the Cupid's wing. To my great surprise, Betteredge laid his hand confidentially on my arm, and put this extraordinary question to me:

"Mr. Jennings, do you happen to be acquainted with Robinson Crusoe?"

I answered that I had read Robinson Crusoe when I was a child.

"Not since then?" inquired Betteredge.

"Not since then."

He fell back a few steps, and looked at me with an expression of compassionate curiosity, tempered by superstitious awe.

"He has not read Robinson Crusoe since he was a child," said Betteredge, speaking to himself—not to me. "Let's try how Robinson Crusoe strikes him now!"

He unlocked a cupboard in a corner, and produced a dirty and well dog's-eared book which exhaled a strong odor of stale tobacco as he turned over the leaves. Having found a passage of which he was apparently in search, he presented me to join him in the corner; still mysteriously confidential, and still speaking under his breath.

"In regard to this locust cookery of yours, Sir, with the bandanum and Mr. Franklin Blake," he began. "While the work-people are in the house, my duty as a servant is to keep the letter of my feelings as a man. When the work-people are gone, my feelings as a man get the better of my duty as a servant. Very good. Monday night, Mr. Jennings, it was borne in powerfully on my mind that this new medical enterprise of yours would end (as I say) in yielding to this secret Dictate, I should have put all the furniture away again with my own hands, and have warmed the cockles of the chimneys in the premises when they came the next morning."

"I am glad to find, from what I have seen up stairs," I said, "that you resisted the secret Dictate."

"Resisted," was the word," returned Betteredge. "Wrestled is the word. I wrestled, Sir, between the silent orders in my bosom pulling me one way, and the written orders in my pocket-book pulling me the other (by the force of your presence) I was in a cold sweat. In that dreadful perturbation of mind and laxity of body, to what wonderful Aid did I apply? I apply, Sir, which has never failed me yet for the last thirty years and more—to This Book!"

He laid the book a resounding blow with his open hand, and struck out of it a stronger smell of stale tobacco than ever.

"What is it, Sir?" pursued Betteredge, "at the first page I opened? This awful bit, Sir, page one hundred and seventy-seven, at folio twenty: 'Friday, I observed many like Reflections, I afterward made it a certain rule with me, That whenever I found these secret Impressions or Dictates of my Mind, to doing, or not doing any Thing that presented; or to going this Way, or that Way, I never failed to obey the secret Dictate.' As I live by bread, Mr. Jennings, those were the first words that met my eye, exactly at the time when I myself was setting secret Dictate at defiance! You don't see any thing at all out of the common in that, do you, Sir?"

I honestly owned that I saw nothing more.

"You don't feel at all shaken, Mr. Jennings, in respect to this medical enterprise of yours?"

"Not the least in the world."

Betteredge stared hard at me, in dead silence. He closed the book with great deliberation; he looked it up again in the cupboard with extraordinary care; he wheeled round, and stared hard at me once more. Then he spoke.

"Sir," he said, gravely, "you are a great allowances to be made for a man who has not read Robinson Crusoe since he was a child. I wish you good-morning."

He opened his door with a low bow, and left me at liberty to find my own way into the garden. Mr. Blake joined me on the lawn at once.

"You needn't tell me what has happened," he said. "Betteredge has played his last card: he has made another prophetic discovery in Robinson Crusoe. Have you humored his favorite delusion? No? You have let him see that you don't believe in Friday, and the rest of it, Jennings! you have fallen to the lowest possible place in Betteredge's estimation. Say what you like, and do what you like, for the future. You will find that he won't waste another word on you now."

June 21.—A short entry must suffice in my journal to-day.

Mr. Blake has had the worst night that he has passed yet. I have been obliged, greatly against my will, to prescribe for him. Men of his sensitive organization are fortunately quick in feeling the effect of remedial measures. Otherwise I should be inclined to think he will be totally unfit for the experiment, when the time comes to try it.

As for myself, after some little remission of my pains for the last two days, I had an attack this morning, of which I shall say nothing but that it has decided me to return to the opium. I shall close this book, and take my full dose—five hundred drops.

June 22.—Our prospects look better to-day. Mr. Blake's nervous suffering is greatly allayed. He slept a little last night. My night, thanks to the opinion, was the night of a man who is ruined. I can't say that I woke this morning; the finer expression would be, that I recovered my senses.

We drove to the house to see if the refurnishing was done. It will be completed to-morrow —Saturday. As Mr. Blake foretold, Betteredge raised no further obstacles. From first to last he was ominously polite.

My medical enterprise (as Betteredge calls it) must now, inevitably, be delayed until Monday next. To-morrow evening the workmen will be late in the house. On the next day the established Sunday tyranny, which is one of the institutions of this free country, so times the weather as to make it impossible to ask any body to travel to us from London. Until Monday comes there is nothing to be done but to watch Mr. Blake carefully, and to keep him, if possible, in the same state in which I find him to-day.

In the mean while I have prevailed upon him to write to Mr. Bruff, making a point of it that he shall be present as one of the witnesses. I especially choose the lawyer, because he is strongly prejudiced against us. If we convince him we place our victory beyond the possibility of dispute.

Mr. Blake has also written to Sergeant Cuff; and I have sent a line to Miss Verinder. With these, and with old Betteredge (who is really a person of importance in the family) we shall have witnesses enough for the purpose—without including Mrs. Merridew, if Mr. Blake's nervous persists in sacrificing herself to the opinion of the world.

June 23.—The vengeance of the opium overtook me again last night. No matter: I must go on with it now till Monday is over and gone.

Mr. Blake is not so well again to-day. On two this morning he confesses that he opened the drawer in which his opium was put away. He only succeeded in locking it up again by a violent effort. His next proceeding, in case of accident, was to throw the key out of window. The waiter brought it in this morning, discovered at the bottom of an empty cistern—such is fate! I have taken possession of the key until Tuesday next.

June 24.—Mr. Blake and I took a long drive in an open carriage. We both felt beneficially the blessed influence of the soft summer air. dined with him at the hotel. To my great relief—for I found him in an overwrought, overexcited state this morning—he had two hours' sound sleep on the sofa after dinner. It is to be another bad night now—I am not afraid of the consequences.

June 25, Monday.—The day of the expedition!—It is five o'clock in the afternoon. We have just arrived at the house.

GOODMAN MISERY

PETER and Paul met in a village on a certain day, when the rain was falling in torrents. They were wet to the skin. They were both in quest of a lodging for the night, but could find none. A rich man—the Richard—had turned them from his gates, bidding them remember that his house was not a public wine-shop, when a poor woman, who was washing clothes in a brook, took pity on them and led them to her neighbor, the Goodman Misery. How much more considerate was the poor washer-woman than Richard with his closed gates; for, having bethought herself on the way of what Misery would probably have thought wherewith to baste the fast and slake the thirst of his guests, she provided herself with some cooked fish, a big loaf, and a pitcher of Sosa wine. Peter and Paul ate with a will. The hungry man tastes the sweetest viands. But not all the viands in the meal was at an end. Goodman Misery was no poor he had no bed to offer them, save the straw upon which he usually stretched his weary limbs. The two travelers were, however, too considerate to accept it. They elected to sit up, and, by way of passing the time, suggested that Misery should tell his story to them. The Goodman consented, for it was a short and not a very eventful one. The matter he had to tell was, that a thief had stripped his pear-tree, the fruit of which was nearly all he had to depend upon for his wretched living. He (as well as the thief) shared the fruit with them, had he not suffered this cruel robbery.

Touched by his distress, Peter and Paul told Goodman Misery that they would pray to Heaven for him. And one of them considerately added, if he, Goodman Misery, had any particular desire would he mention it?

The Goodman desired no more from the Lord than that any man who might climb his pear-tree should be fixed to it, and immovable, until he, Goodman Misery, willed that he should descend from it.

On the very day which saw the retreating figures of Peter and Paul, which Misery was gone to fetch a pitcher of water, the same thief who had stolen his finest pears returned to the tree. Goodman Misery, having left the door open, perceived the rascal immovable amidst the branches.

"Rascal, I have got you, have I?" Misery shouted; and then, aside and in a low voice to himself: "Heaven. Who, then, were my guests last night? This time you will need to be in no hurry to pick my pears; but let me tell you that you will pay a heavy price for them in the tortures you will have to endure at my hands. To begin with, all the town shall see you in your present plight. Then I will light a roaring fire under my tree, and smoke and dry you like a Mayence ham."

Goodman Misery having departed in quest of fire-wood to make and dry the thief like a Mayence ham, the culprit cried lustily until he attracted two of the Goodman's neighbors. Yielding to the prayers of the thief, these two honest folk climbed the tree to rescue their fellow-creature, whereupon they discovered that they too were fixed to the branches. The three had been left in company just seventeen hours and a half when Goodman Misery returned with a bag of bread and a gallon of vinegar in his head. He was terrified to find three men settled in his pear-tree.

"Come, come," he cried; "the fair will be a good one with so many customers. And pray what did you two new-comers want here? Couldn't you ask me for it? Peace, and not come in my absence to steal them?"

"We are not thieves," they replied. "We are charitable neighbors, come to help a man whose lamentations smote us to the heart. Where we were passing by, we saw you in the market; there are plenty without yours."

"If what you say be true," said Misery, "you want something in my tree, and may come down as soon as you please; the punishment is for thieves only." Whereupon the two neighbors found themselves free, and quickly regained the ground; but the thief remained fixed to the branches in a pitiable condition after his long imprisonment, while a fever consumed and punished at the power of the Goodman. They begged hard that Misery would take pity every on the thief. His brother-in-law was dead many hours. The rascal prayed hard also, crying, "I'll pay any sum, but, in the name of God, let me come down. I am dying of thirst."

At this word Misery permitted himself to be mollified. He told the thief, in releasing him, that he owed his deliverance to the name of God. To show that he had a generous heart, and that self had never dictated any of the actions of his life, he would make a present to the rascal of the bad stolen. He would be released from bondage in the tree, on the condition that he would take an oath never to climb that tree, or any tree, and never come within one hundred feet of it while the pears were ripe.

"May a hundred devils seize me," said the thief, "if I ever come within a league of it again while I live!"

"That is enough," said the Goodman. "Come down, neighbor; you are free, but never return, if you please."

The thief was so stiff and swollen in his limbs, that poor old Misery had to help him down with a ladder; for nothing would persuade the neighbors to approach the tree for that purpose. The adventure made a great noise in the neighborhood, and thenceforth Misery's pears were respected scrupulously.

But Goodman Misery was old, and his strength was waning daily. He was content with the fruit of his pear-tree, but it was the pears that contented him. One day a knock was made at his door. He went to open it, and beheld a visitor whom he had long expected, but whom he did not imagine to be quite so near his mortal hearth. It was Death, who, on entering, had stepped aside to tell him that his hour was near.

"Be welcome," said the Goodman, without flinching a muscle, and looking steadfastly at him as one who did not fear him. Misery had thought on his coming, though he had met with very little on his back. Death was surprised to find himself so well received.

"What!" said he, "you do not at least no fear of me! No fear of Death! at whose look the strongest tremble, from the shepherd to the king?"

"No, I have no dread of your presence," Misery said. "What pleasure have I in this life? If any thing in this world could give me a regret, it would be that of parting from my pear-tree, which has fed me through so many years. But you, Death, who, like the sun, have brook no delays nor subterfuges when you beckon. All I will ask and beg you to grant me before I die, is, that I may eat my fill of my pears in your presence. Afterward I shall be ready."

"Thy wish is too modest a wish to be refused," said Death.

Misery crept forth into his yard, Death following closely on his steps. The Goodman gathered many times round his beloved tree, seeking the finest pear. At length having selected a magnificent one, "Death," said he, "I will eat that one: I pray you lend me your scythe to cut it down."

"This instrument is never lent," quoth Death.

"No good soldier permits himself to be disarmed. But it seems to me it would be better to pluck your pear with the hand. It would be bruised by a fall. Climb into the tree."

"A good idea," said Misery. "If I had the strength I should not hesitate; but I am old and hardly stand?"

"Well," Death answered, "I will afford this service. I will climb the tree myself."

Death climbed the pear-tree, and plucked the finest which Misery coveted so ardently; but was astonished when he found it impossible to regain the ground.

"Goodman Misery," said Death, "tell me what kind of a tree is this?"

"Can not you see that it is a pear-tree?"

"Yes, yes," said he; "but I can move neither hand nor foot upon it?"

"I faith that's your business," Goodman Misery answered.

"What, Goodman! You dare to play a trick upon me, at whose nod all the world trembles? Do you know the risks you are running?"

"I am very sorry," was Misery's cool answer. "But what have you risked yourself in coming to disturb the peace of an unfortunate who never did you harm in his life? What fantastic notion led you to me? You have the time to reflect, however; and since I have you now under my thumb I will do a little good to the poor world that you have held in bondage for so many centuries. No! Without the help of a miracle you will not get out of that tree until I please to permit you."

Death, who had never found himself in such a plight, saw that he had to deal with some supernatural power.

"Goodman Misery," he pleaded, "I deserve this for having been too amiable toward you. But don't abuse the power with which the All Powerful has invested you for an instant, over me. Make no further opposition, I pray you, to the decrees of Heaven. Consent that I shall descend the tree at once, or I will be angry with you."

"Blast it," Misery answered; "and I protest to you, by all that is most sacred in the world, dead as you are, that I will hold you until you get free from it by God's will."

"I perceive," Death went on, "that I entered an unfortunate house for myself to-day. But come, come, Goodman Misery. I have business in the four quarters of the world, and it must be ended before sunset. Do you wish to arrest the course of nature? If I were to make my way out of this predicament you might feel it sharply."

"Nay," said Misery, "I fear nothing. Every man who is above the fear of Death is beyond the reach of fear. You can have no effect on me. I am always ready to start for the next world when the Lord shall summon me."

"Very fine sentiments, Goodman Misery. Thou mayest boast, Goodman, of being the first in this life who has gotten the better of Death. Heaven commands me with thy consent. I leave thee, to return to thee only on the last day of judgment. Then the last struggle between the great work and man shall be no more. Now, I see the end, I promise you; so now, without hesitation, shake hands with me, or let me fly away. A queen is waiting for me, in the farthest leagues away."

"Ought I to believe you? Or is it only to try me that you speak thus to me?"

"No, never shalt thou see me again until all nature is desolated. The last attack of the scythe shall fall upon thee. The edicts of Death are irrevocable. Dost thou hear me, Goodman?"

"Yes, I hear; and I believe in thy words. Come down when it shall please thee."

At this Death grew furious, and disappeared from the sight of Misery. The Goodman has never heard of Death since, although he has often been told of him by travelers in his neighborhood, almost next door; so that Misery has lived to a wonderful age, and still dwells in rags near his pear-tree. And, according to the solemn promise of Death, Misery lives till the world shall be no more.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE great discovery of certain French chemists whereby pure oxygen may be abundantly and cheaply obtained, and used in the production of artificial light, is likely before long to make a revolution in our present system of lighting streets and public and private dwellings. The inventors have successfully contested with a pitch-pine knot, whose flickering flame they have entirely overcome, and banished their rude dwellings. But with the onward march of science artificial light has grown brighter and brighter, until at last the grandest discovery of all has been made, which promises to afford us something more nearly approximating to daylight than even the most ingenious savant could have thought possible.

Certain chemical substances subjected to the action of heat, yield immense quantities of pure oxygen, which can be obtained in a condensed form at a moderate cost, and this new oxygen gas light is produced from a solid pencil of compressed magnesia, fixed in a solid support, which is surrounded by a jet of gas, consisting of illuminating gas or hydrogen burning with the pure oxygen gas. As the magnesia is thus made incandescent in the mode of burning this gas, which requires a double tube, the light produced is of extraordinary intensity, quite equal to several hundred candles, and is numerous advantages recommend it to general use. Experiments made with this brilliant light show that it is more economical than ordinary gas. It is many times more brilliant than the latter, and requires less for the same consumption of coal gas. According to the French reports, it would require only 1,000 cubic feet used produced in the city of Paris, and exceeds that of the Imperial Gas Company consumed on the day during standard Argand burners, with fifteen holes, and with glass chimney seven inches in height, to the same end and cause to be extinguished. It is more agreeable to the than any of the lights ordinarily used; hence must be a blending of the illuminating gas with the pure oxygen portion, more nearly approaching the sunbeam. All the more delicate shades of whatever color are seen almost as though illuminated by daylight. The light burns steadily, and consequently will be a great blessing to all who are obliged to use the eyes considerably by artificial light. Much less heat is thrown out by this light than by any of the lights now in common use. Besides, although it exists there all in brilliancy; consequently one of the most objectionable features in the use of coal gas is in great part removed by this invention. Another great advantage is that it contains ozone in two ways: by removing its oxygen, which is so essential for respiration, and by producing carbonic acid gas; but this is counteracted in a great degree, instead of robbing the air, and yields only a sixteenth or eighteenth part of carbonic acid gas. Another great illumination it has the additional advantage that by a possibility can not be "blown out." The chief objection is so intense that it can not be extinguished in the ordinary manner. The proposed method of doing this differs markedly from the making of coal gas: for there is no ill odor attending it; and if hydrogen should be employed, as proposed, to increase ingredients of the chemists, their method of fabricating it by heating fine anthracite coal dust, peat, or other carbonaceous substance mingled with hydrate of lime, would furnish us with means for illuminating and heating, without contaminating the atmosphere of our crowded cities with the nauseating and unwholesome gases with which we are now annoyed. Dr. Doremus, who has recently been making various experiments with the oxygen gas light, and from whose report we have gathered these interesting facts, confidently believes that these gases will be extensively employed as a certain new processes for heating as well as illuminating purposes, and that all our culinary operations may be performed by their aid alone.

The "Louisiana Ice Manufacturing Company" said to be doing a good business, and New Orleans boasts that it will not hereafter be dependent upon Boston for its supply of this necessary luxury. The process is described as being very simple, consisting in using the machinery necessary to make a certain gas which has an affinity for caloric, in contact with water. It can be made very cheap, less than one cent per pound, and melts less rapidly than the Boston article. The manufactured ice is opaque, the natural ice clear.

The operatives in Lowell are employed in 39 cotton and 10 woolen factories, and manage to eat a good deal. It is stated, on good authority, that there are sold in Lowell 1,000 weekly pastilles—a small article, drawn by machine, equirous jewelry, or nothing at all. As general thing people in this city are not rich enough to give away valuables for nothing, nor even for a nominal trifle—they expect to make money some way. So, when somebody advertises that he will give fifty dollars' worth of some commodity for 25 dollars, every body at once rest assured that there is swindle somewhere.

An Irishman, living near Zoeenee, has devised an ingenious method of keeping his cellar cool. Over it he rotated—is walled and floored with zinc, and is first a large tank filled nearly to the top with ice. A articles of furniture, such as a writing-table, a chair or two, a sofa-bedstead, a small stove, a couple of bookcases, and kept free to their mouthpiece by means of screws, running the whole length of the tank. In this room the owner passes the hot hours of the day, receiving his friends and writing his letters, with the cellar beneath instead of a dip beneath the surface.

An immense bed of solid salt, said to be 300 feet thick, has been discovered in the immediate neighborhood of Berlin, Prussia.

A recent visitor to Lincoln's grave in Springfield describes the Ridge cemetery as a beautiful and noble and a half from the city, upon a broken plateau of land which nature has evidently adapted for that purpose, being a group of beautiful knolls and ridges ornamented with walks, shrubbery, and evergreen trees. Besides the pathways little rills of water in spring-water long musically down the steep slopes and form a sparkling brook in the valley into a pond or lake stream in the distance. The tomb of Abraham Lincoln is situated upon the highest point of ground, and is a very humble, though not common, structure, being solidly built of blue limestone, plain red brick, marble base top, with a marble urn on each corner. The door closed with a marble slab, across the top of which is cut the name, "LINCOLN."

The Methodist Home for Aged and Infirm Women in Philadelphia has just received a gift of $10,000, the income of which is to be expended in the building of a "Home" for respectable working-women.

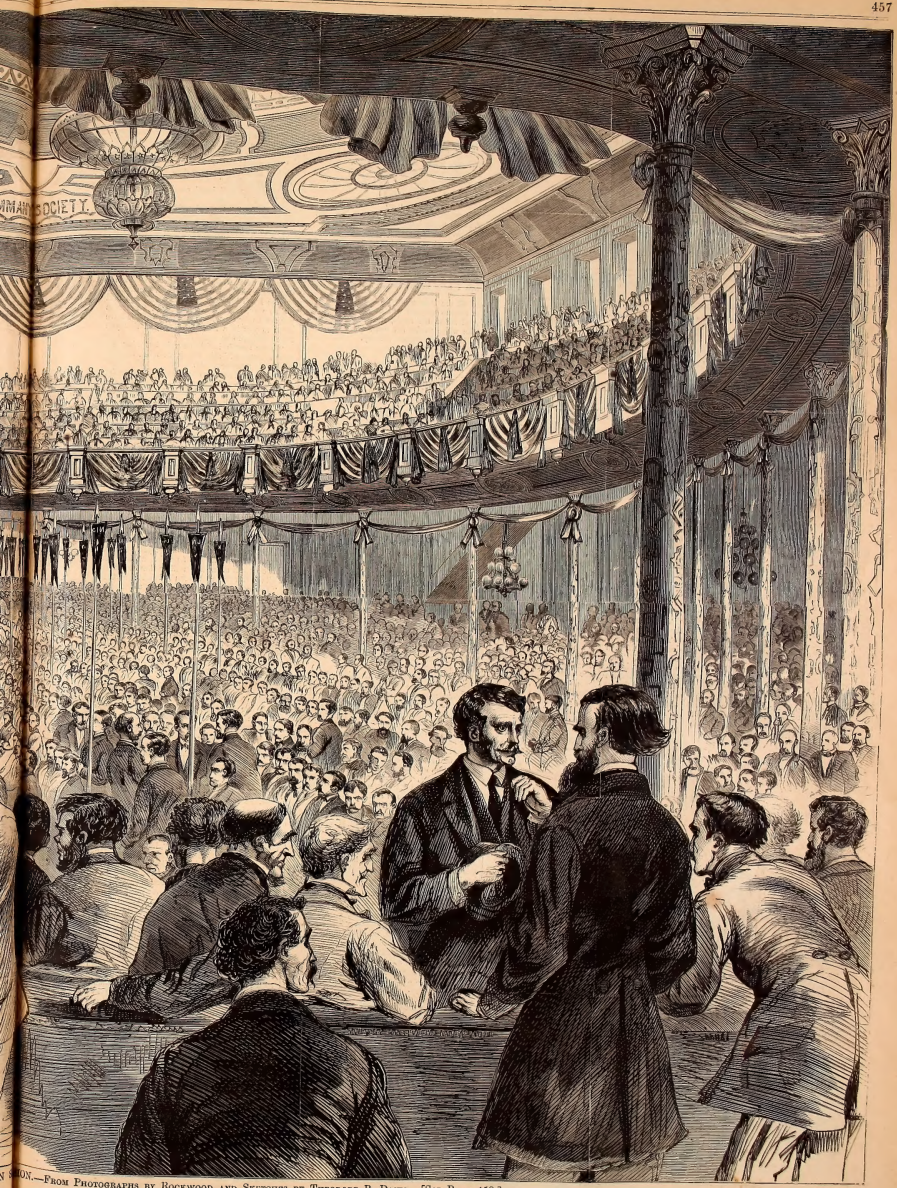
Adelaide Neilson, the popular tragedienne, sailed for Europe last week, in the steamer Vale of Clyde. She has not only enjoyed almost unexampled success in the States, but has made a fortune. She is one of the best private life, a large number of warm friends.

It is stated that she has given her husband a handsome presentations in the United States, Canada, and Australia; that he has given her a handsome and costly diamond necklace, and that she has purchased costly jewelry, etc. "Elizabeth," "Mary Stuart," and "Juliet," in particular, she has appeared ninety, sixty-seven, and sixty-two times respectively. Her husband has accompanied Madame Ristori to the steamer on the day of her departure; and, after the usual ceremony of farewell, Manager Grau handed her a card, on which among other items was written, "Amount, $1,000 in 1870." Ristori smiled on glancing at the card, and answered in French, "I shall be prepared upon you and not me." Therefore this country may look to become the favorite tragedienne.

Without pretending to vouch for the accuracy the statement, we quote the following curious production of a Scotch maid, which is given in a verbatim copy of an "Essay on Coal," delivered in 1869, by a candidate for graduation at the examiners at Cheltenham, England: "Coal is a mineral substance. It is found in the earth. It is thin: First they dig a large pit in the earth. The pit is so large in the upper part that a man can go in the pit, and cover the whole with peat. Then they burn in the timber. The timber burns for a month to become charcoal, and out of the charcoal they make coal gas, with which we light our streets and houses."

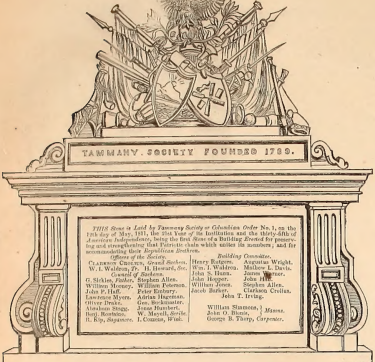
The Japanese Government has now in hand a coinage of copper coin, which is to be of the value of a cent-book in Russia is kept: One day in 1170 the Emperor Nicholas was walking in the park, with his son at the head, and her physicians ordered her to rub her Imperial nose with a lump of tallow. But as there was no tallow in the palace they sent a servant who bought a tit, and the Empress was cured of her sickness. The Emperor, however, was so much impressed by the book of domestic accounts kept by his housekeeper that he wrote in it:

"For curing his Majesty of a cold, tallow, ten rubles."



As he knew that he had no cold the day before, the Emperor suspected a swindle, and, to clear the matter up, he examined the book, and found the following item of accounts: What was his amazement to find every day, throughout the year, "For curing his Majesty of his Majesty, ten rubles." He of course demanded an explanation from his housekeeper, whereupon it was found that since the days of the Empress Catherine, the first Empress, under the Russian Government, the house accounts were charged with the sum daily, the price of tallow meant for imperial noses which had not existed.

A velocipede mania is prevailing in Paris just now Calls are made in these cold carriages, and fashionable ladies exercise with them in public parks. The rich and regard them as exceedingly nice. They are to be seen in the streets, as well as promenades and the parks.



A country farmer, who recently made a visit to our charming Central Park, has been inspired by the sight of the pretty rustic bridges, seats, and summer-houses to attempt something of the same sort. On a small scale, upon his own home grounds. He says: "These things cost but little, chiefly labor, which can be performed at convenient hours, and yet how much of beauty, pleasure, and happiness they afford. It pays to attend to these seemingly unimportant matters. The people in the country are becoming more and more refined and appreciative of things that are beautiful and pleasant to the eye; the useful must concede something to the ornamental, and the farmer who fails to recognize this principle, and keep up with the times in this respect, will soon find himself behind the rest of value in the improvement of his place."

INTERIOR OF TAMMANY HALL, NEW YORK—THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION IN SESSION.—F

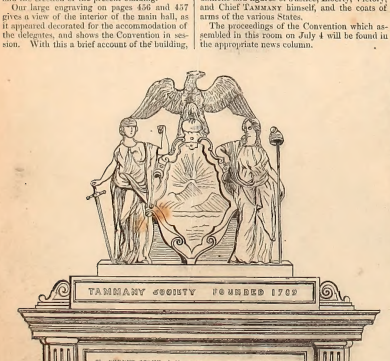
N SION.—From Photographs by Rockwood and Sketches by Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 458.]

Photographed by Albert Nagell, 51 Third Avenue, New York.

THE TAMMANY HALL CONVENTION.

THE new Tammany Hall was dedicated to political purposes on July 4 by the assemblage in its main room of the National Democratic Convention. Before the delegates entered the hall a number of the officers and members of the Tammany Society proceeded to formally dedicate it, which was done by reading the Declaration of Independence, and the delivery of a short address by Mayor HOFFMAN.

We have before given a brief account of the Tammany Society and its previous Wigwams and Halls. As supplementary to that account we have given on this page engravings of the twelves set in the wall of the main hall to commemorate the founding of the Society in 1789, and the erection of the present building.



Our large engraving on pages 456 and 457 gives a view of the interior of the main hall, as it appeared decorated for the accommodation of the delegates, and shows the Convention in session. With this a brief account of the building, from an architectural point of view, may not be uninteresting.

Tammany Hall cost over $300,000, and the ground on which it stands cost $80,000 more. All but the main hall and committee rooms are to be leased, and $30,000 per annum has been refused for the building.

The Society's plan gives New Yorkers an idea of its dimensions by saying that it dwarfs the Academy of Music which stands by its side. The building covers a space of ground 116 feet by 122, is three stories high, and the main hall will comfortably accommodate five thousand persons.

Twenty thousand dollars were expended in decorating the hall for the sitting of the late Convention. The permanent decorations of the building consist for the most part of elaborate and finely executed fresco-work, embracing medallions and figures of Justice, Liberty, Victory, and Chief TAMMANY himself, and the coats of arms of the various States.

The proceedings of the Convention which assembled in this room on July 4 will be found in the appropriate news column.

Photographed by Albert Nagell, 51 Third Avenue, New York.

SLEEP.

OH, is it Death that comes
To have a foretaste of the whole?
To-night the planets and the stars
Will glimmer through my window-bars,
But will not shine upon my soul.

For I shall lie as dead,
Though yet I am above the ground;
All passionless, with scarce a breath,
With hands of rest and eyes of death,
I shall be carried swiftly round.

Or if my life should break
The idle night with doubtful gleams,
Through mosaic arches will I go,
Through arches ruinous and low,
And chase the true and false in dreams.

Why should I fall asleep?
When I am still upon my bed,
The moon will shine, the winds will rise,
And all around and through the skies
The light clouds travel o'er my head.

Oh busy, busy things!
Ye mock me with your ceaseless life,
For all the hidden springs will flow,
And all the blades of grass will grow,
When I have neither peace nor strife.

And all the long night through,
The restless streams will hurry by;
And round the lands, with endless roar,
The white waves full upon the shore,
And lie by bit devour the dry.

Even thus, but silently,
Eternity, thy tide shall flow—
And side by side with every star
The long-drawn swell shall bear me far,
An idle boat with none to row.

My senses fall with sleep;
My heart beats thick; the night is noon:
And faintly through its misty folds
I hear a drowsy clock that holds
Its converse with the waning moon.

Oh, solemn mystery!
That I should be so closely bound
With neither terror nor constraint,
Without a murmur of complaint,
And lose myself upon such ground!

THE WILD MAN OF VIENNA.

A German Tradition.

FIRST in antiquity, but only first in the list of second-class hotels in Murray's Hand-book, stands that of the Wild Man, one of the most venerable houses in the Austrian Capital, for we find it mentioned in history during the siege of Vienna by Mathias Corvinus in the year 1485.

To this house and to the name it has adopted is attached a singular tradition, unmistakably German in its character, which we obtained from an authentic source, our informant being no other than the present owner of the establishment, to whom we are indebted for the following narrative:

In the year 1444, when Ladislaus, King of Hungary, fell at the unfortunate battle of Varna, overcome by the countless army of Amurat, which entirely routed the Christian forces, there was, amongst the few who escaped the carnage of that dreadful day, a lancer, named Georg of the Valley. This young fellow was of prepossessing exterior and by nature unusually daring in courage, but it would seem he knew how to make use of his feet as well as of his hands, for he contrived, after the engagement which proved fatal to so many his countrymen, to escape unobserved, and to gain the neighboring forest, so as, at least for the time, to place his life in safety. So far so well, but even there his position was a very equivocal one; he could not continue in those wild and deserted haunts without certainty of starvation, and he could not venture beyond without risk of discovery and capture. A stranger to the locality, ignorant of the language, how was he to set about finding his way out of the intricacies of this wilderness, and what chance had he of reaching his home even if he met with a fellow-being who was not an enemy?

No wonder that our hero was preoccupied with these embarrassing reflections; and no wonder that faint, weary, and helpless, almost within sight of the gory field strewn with the lifeless bodies of his comrades, he should fall a prey to all the fatal suggestions of despair.

Georg sat down beneath a tree, resting his chin in his hands, and, staring into vacancy, was giving way to the gloomiest thoughts, when a sound fell upon his ear which told him of the approach of human footsteps. His first impulse was to welcome any incident that could bring a change in his miserable prospects; the second, to apprehend some ambush and to mistrust all strangers. He accordingly rose, and stealing cautiously round concealed himself behind the trunk of the tree which sheltered him, so as to observe the new-comer from behind as soon as he should have passed; but he was counting without his host, for, as if he had guessed his intention, the stranger, instead of pursuing the path, turned abruptly off and passed by the very spot whither the unfortunate refugee had retreated. Further dissimulation he now felt would be worse than useless, so putting a bold face on the circumstance, Georg looked up and saluted the newcomer, albeit not much reassured by his aspect.

He might be about fifty years of age, and the dress he wore was bizarre, to say the least of it; it consisted of a tightly-fitting black velvet suit, over which was thrown a dark claret-colored cloak large enough to envelop his whole person, while a broad-brimmed pointed black felt hat shaded his features. He returned the young man's bow with a smile which was meant to be friendly, but scarcely masked the sinister expression of his deep-set eyes.

"You don't seem to be in a very pleasant position, Mr. Soldier?" said he. "He who fights and runs away—you know the rest, I dare say; but you see it isn't enough to run away; the question is—what are you to do next?"

"True enough, Sir Stranger," replied Georg, "and that is just what I am considering."

"No doubt you are; and pray what conclusion has your wisdomship come to?"

Georg looked up, first because he had no answer to give; and secondly, because he was mystified by the tone and language of his new acquaintance.

"One would think," he said at length, "that you had some expedient to offer by your asking so many questions."

"Well done, well done! evasive but shrewd," said he of the cloak; "and you are not far wrong either, for I could offer you more than one expedient; that is, if you like to hear them."

"Beggars mustn't be choosers," said Georg, with a sigh. "But perhaps you will explain, that I may know whether you are not making game of a poor devil."

"You've hit it again, my dear fellow," said the stranger; "for, as you say, you are a poor, miserable devil, while on the other hand I am a rich, powerful devil, for to tell you the truth, I am the Devil himself. Now don't start in that foolish way, when you can see—for I am sure you are a very sensible young man—that I have come to you in a friendly spirit, and that you have nothing to be afraid of."

"Your speech is fair enough, but what are your intentions?" said Georg, who was determined to do nothing rashly.

"They depend entirely on yourself. I am ready, if you say the word, not only to insure your safety, but to start you with luck and money enough to enable you to have a jolly time of it as long as you are for this world."

Georg felt sorely tempted, and almost forgot his apprehensions in the contemplation of this brilliant prospective: he hesitated; and the Devil, anxious to follow up his advantage, hastened to conclude the matter.

"Then it's a bargain?" he said, extending his open hand.

But the action recalled the young man to his senses: he mechanically withdrew his own.

"There are two parties to a bargain," he replied, "and as yet we have only talked of the terms on one side; please to go on and tell me what is expected on the other."

"Oh, dear me!" answered Lucifer, with a shrug of indifference, "a mere nothing; just your signature to this little bit of parchment, and you will never hear me again for a hundred years—at all the enjoyments I mean to bestow on you."

"I thought as much," said Georg, contemptuously, and with a tone of bitter disappointment; "then you may just go back whence you came, for no signature of mine will you ever get, I can tell you, while I have a sword to my side or courage.

"Now, now, you hot-headed fellow," said the Devil, who had no mind to let his victim escape, "do wait a bit, and don't give me the trouble of running after you this hot day; listen to reason, and see how much more generous I am with you than you deserve. I will make you another proposal rather than leave you in the wretchedness in which I found you. I will undertake to befriend you as before suggested, on the simple condition that for the next three years you will neither wash, nor shave, nor comb, nor cut your hair, nor your nails, nor make any alteration in your dress. How does that suit you?"

"That is another matter," said Georg, still somewhat reluctant to enter into any compact, however plausible: "I don't say I will refuse—"

"Done!" said the Devil; and he had scarcely uttered the word when, to Georg's astonishment, he found himself at Vienna. Arrived there, he had no time to think of a bear, within which was a pocket, where he found a purse filled with gold pieces, and a note to the effect that as long as he continued to observe the prescribed conditions it would never be empty, however extravagantly he might spend.

It was not long before Georg began to be alarmed at his rash bargain. In vain he tried to reassure himself with the reflection that his penance would be at an end in three years. Three years, under such circumstances, began to assume the proportions of ten, for he soon became so frightful an object that he was shunned by all decent people, while the very street-boys would pelt him with mud, and then run away, screaming, "The wild man is after us!" and ultimately he was known by no other name. He now perceived the object Lucifer had in view. "He thought," said he to himself, "to degrade me until I lost all self-respect, and that then I should give myself up to vice, and so become his prey; but I will give him the slip after all, and see if I can not get some good even out of this malicious plot."

Acting upon this wise resolution, Georg hunted about the streets of Vienna till he found a modest, unpretending dwelling adjoining a much-frequented inn, which could scarcely fail to afford him a retreat till the term of his probation should be ended. Here he established himself, and under the idea that he was gifted with extraordinary powers of divination, he drew the simple country folk around him far and near, and soon obtained the reputation of being a wise man or magician—an idea that received considerable support from his extraordinary appearance. Georg gave excellent advice to his clients, and as he assumed a paternal tone, and charged nothing for consultations, he was regarded as the oracle of the country round.

At the end of the first half of the third year "Master Urian"—for so the Devil called himself—appeared unexpectedly, and announced to him the visit of a certain Hans Ponsheimer, who had heard of his fame, and was coming from an adjoining town named Lugeck to consult him on the state of his affairs.

"Now," said the Devil, "I must begin by observing, Master Georg, that you have been going on lately in a way that doesn't suit my book at all, and if you are determined to slip through my fingers, I must contrive to make my profit some other way; you will be so good, therefore, as to attend to my directions, and to follow them implicitly."

Georg nodded his acquiescence.

"What I require of you, then," continued the other, "is this; when this burgher makes his appearance you will listen to his story, and when he has come to an end, you will tell him that, implicated as he is, you can rescue him from his difficulties. He will ask you how, and you will then say that you can not tell him any thing at-out it until he has promised you one of his three daughters—who, I can tell you, are all very beautiful—in marriage. They are, however, haughty and self-conscious, and knowing nothing of their father's ruin—for he is on the eve of bankruptcy—they expect to match with princes; so you may guess the airs they will give themselves when they receive the advances of one so repulsive as yourself."

A few days after this interview the predicted visit took place: Hans Ponsheimer arrived at the inn, and without giving himself time to rest or eat, went straight to the wise man's domicile. All passed as foretold, except that on Georg's making known his conditions Hans laughed him to scorn, and asked him what he took him for, to suppose that his daughters would ever consent to marry such an object as him.

"My dear Sir," answered Georg, coolly; "I only take you for what you are—a ruined man, whose credit to-morrow morning will not be worth that," and he snapped his fingers.

"What!" said the merchant, "ruined! Hans Ponsheimer without credit! When you cease to be a bear and become a man I will believe that, and not before."

"More extraordinary things than either have happened before now," said Georg, quietly. "Are you not expecting in a few days to be called upon for a large sum?" he continued.

The merchant stared: "I am, Sir," said he; "but how came you to know this?"

"That is my secret," replied Georg.

"Still, I do not see how that proves my point; I have a much larger amount coming to me before that is due, so that my risk is amply covered."

"Oh, my good Sir, that is just where the shoe pinches; you think you will receive the sum—you are relying upon it; but not one penny of it will you ever touch, take my word for it—so if you have your credit at heart, you must look out for some other means of liquidating your debt."

The merchant bounded from his seat, still incredulous.

"It is not, it can not be true; vile miscreant, you menace me for the sake of forcing me to comply with your designs; but this shall not be." He was interrupted by the arrival of a mounted messenger from Lugeck, who desired to say a word to him in private, without loss of time.

"Your servant may speak before me, Hans Ponsheimer," said Georg, "or if you prefer it I will be his spokesman; he is come to announce to you the failure of the house we were just speaking of."

The courier stood speechless by, and Ponsheimer, aghast, now turned a depreceating eye on the magician, whose sincerity he had so rudely called in question.

"Hans Ponsheimer," said he, "if we will say more of your cavalier treatment, more especially out of regard for the close relationship in which we shall soon stand to each other;" the merchant shuddered involuntarily; but his time he restrained all expression of his disgust. "I am willing to release you from all your embarrassments, provided I have your word that one of your daughters shall be my wife."

"I consent," said Hans, and he heaved a deep sigh; "you have my word, the word of Hans Ponsheimer, till this day as good as his bond."

"Then," replied Georg, "I am willing to enter into partnership with you, and I deposit as capital the amount of the debt you have to pay." And he counted out the notes with a contemptuous and a deliberation which took every one by surprise. Hans, fully sensible of the obligation he had received, and relieved of an enormous load, stretched out his hand to shake that of his sheg benefactor; but when he saw the long claws at the ends of his fingers, the thought of the real promise he had made on behalf of his dainty daughters overcame him, and he trembled in every limb. However, it was impossible to retract, and Ponsheimer was obliged to withdraw, promising his future son-in-law that his bride should be ready in a few days, only requesting a reasonable time to prepare her for the change that was to take place in her lot.

Hans went home broken-hearted, and wondering how he should ever venture to break the matter to his daughters, who, on his approach, came out to welcome him back. They were completely mystified at his downcast looks, and at last coaxed him to tell them the cause of his trouble. Hans related his story briefly, but honestly; he disguised nothing, and painted the Wild Man in all his hideousness; then waited anxiously to see how they took the information. The two elder made very short work of it; they declared that nothing should ever induce them to accede to so revolting a condition, and fell upon their father with the harshest reproach. The unhappy man sat before them in an attitude of mute despondency. As he raised his eyes they fell on the face of his youngest child, and he saw that her eyes were filled with tears. She was his favorite, and unable to witness her father's distress, she rose, and throwing her arms round his neck, "Father, dear," she said, "I will marry the Wild Man; my life is yours, I will not forsake you."

Ponsheimer was overcome by this touching proof of his child's generosity and affection.

"Trudchen," he exclaimed, "you have always been the joy of my life, and you are my consolation in this trial; Heaven, I am convinced, will reward you for this sacrifice."

But Gertrude closed her father's lips with a kiss, and begged he would have no fears for her, as no happiness the world could give could exceed the satisfaction of feeling she had done her duty.

But the merchant was not at ease with himself, and was still deliberating on the dilemma in which he was placed, when a great commotion was heard in the street, occasioned by a gorgeous pageant which was defiling through the town, to the surprise of all its inhabitants; the carriage of the wealthy Wild Man, which was Ponsheimer's house, and when he looked out of window he saw a magnificent coach drawn by six richly-harnessed horses, and attended by servants in handsome liveries, approaching his house. As soon as it drew up, an elegant cavalier alighted and entered the door. Hans advanced to the stairs, but what was his surprise to find himself in the embrace of a handsome youth, who, in voice of the Wild Man, called him his future father, and begged to see his destined bride.

Gertrude's astonishment and joy may be imagined, but it did not exceed that of her father; while, as for her heartless and unfilial sisters, no words could describe their rage and despair.

Unable to endure the sight of a happiness which had been within their reach, and which they themselves had rejected, they quarrelled their father for deceiving them, and their sister for taking advantage of them. Lucifer stood by and smiled; his prey escaped him, for that very day one of them hung herself, while the body of the other was found in the river next morning.

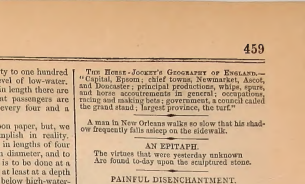
Georg of the Valley lived happily with his gentle and beautiful wife, and his respectable father-in-law. Their marriage was blessed by a tide-deed dated 1459, in which the house they occupied at Lugeck is designated under the name of The Black Bear.

On the spot where stood the inn, of which Georg inhabited a portion in the days of his disguise, now stands the magnificent Inn the Wild Man, in the middle of the Kürnthnergasse.

TUNNELS AND TUNNELING.

WITH our modern appliances for tunnel-driving, works of this kind are only a matter of money—the engineering difficulties are now of less easily conquered; but it is a puzzle to modern engineers how the ancients, long before gunpowder was known, and often with mere hoops and tools, were able to drive the subways they did through solid rock. The longest tunnel of the ancient world was that constructed by the Emperor Claudius to draw the waters of the Lake Fucinus, now Celano, into the River Liris. This work is more than nine miles in length and more than twenty feet high, and is ventilated with tunnel shafts. Such was the splendid work of the Romans that it is still in excellent condition. Without saying a word about Hannibal's notion of tunneling through the Alps by the solvent powers of vinegar, we may jump at once to the experience had in England in works of this kind, both for the passage of canals and railways. It is estimated that the latter alone in England has ninety miles of railway-tunnels, or one mile of tunnel to every hundred and fifty-four of open rail. It is generally supposed that the Box Tunnel is the longest in England; but this is an error. The Woodhead Summit Tunnel possesses this honor. Its length is three miles and sixteen yards, with a gradient of one in two hundred. The Medway Tunnel, on the South Eastern, is the next longest seven hundred and forty yards; the Sevenoaks, on the same line, is three thousand six hundred yards; and the Box Tunnel is three thousand two hundred and twenty-seven yards: so that, instead of being the first as regards length, it is the fourth. The next noted tunnel, however, is under the bed of a great river, is the Thames Tunnel. It is only one thousand two hundred feet in length, but it was the most expensive work ever produced, costing one thousand pounds a yard, or two and a half times as much per yard as the next Mont Cenis Tunnel, now in course of construction. It is about to be put to some really practical purpose, having been purchased by the East London Railway, for the purpose of bringing together the Northeastern and Southeastern ends of London.

But these tunnels are playthings compared with those projected and in progress. It has been proposed to drive a tunnel under the sea between New Brighton and Bootle. This work would be four thousand eight hundred yards in length, and would cost upward of three quarters of a million of money. But what is a few hundred yards compared to a tunnel that shall connect the shores of England and France? One of these engineers propose to carry a road under the narrow sea by means of iron tubes, and another gentleman proposes a tunnel at a great depth. Of the former schemes those of Mr. Chalmers, an Englishman, and M. de Gammond, a Frenchman, are the most startling. Mr. Chalmers suggests the sinking a tube in the Channel, in ord'r to keep which gigantic structures moored on one spot, he proposes to cover it with an embankment of stones, one hundred and fifty feet wide at the base, and from forty to one hundred and twenty feet below the level of low-water. In this tube of eighteen miles in length there are to be three ventilators, so that passengers are promised breathing-holes at every four and a half miles' distance.



This is all very pleasant upon paper, but, we fear, rather difficult to accomplish in reality. He proposes to build his tube in lengths of four hundred feet, and thirty feet in diameter, and to join them under water. This is to be done at a depth of one hundred feet, and at least at a depth of one hundred and fifty feet below high-water-mark in a swift tideway, and is to cost only twelve millions; but then it is to repay the company that undertakes it by yielding a net revenue of one million three hundred thousand pounds annually. But Mr. Chalmers is quite mild in his ideas compared with M. de Gammond. This gentleman, in addition to laying down the tube, suggests a great ocean station midway in the Channel. Here he proposes to have a harbor and basins, into which any home-bound ship may enter, and discharge her passengers by means of a huge shaft three hundred and thirty yards in diameter, opening into the tunnel, and giving egress to both England and France. This bold undertaking is estimated will cost seven million two hundred thousand pounds. So much for the iron tube scheme. Mr. George Remington, on the other hand, says that the tunnel should be driven at a depth of from ninety to one hundred and thirty feet below the bed of the Channel, making a total of ayr three hundred feet from the sea level. He would cross between cape Grisnez and Dungeness Point. There are to be three air-shafts of one hundred feet in diameter, and the whole he estimates to cost six million seven hundred and ninety-eight thousand two hundred pounds.

These tunnels are at present confined to the brains of their projectors, but the Great Mont Cenis Tunnel is advancing for toward completion. It is seven and a half miles in length. It is being made by Italian engineers, at the joint expense of Italy and France. This great work was commenced on both sides of the mountain in 1857, and it was contemplated that it would not be finished before the year 1873. At first the excavation was made wholly by manual labor, but now the boring process is performed by the most elaborate machinery, driven by compressed air. The great difficulty to be overcome is the badness of the air, which gets worse as the tunnel is penetrated further. The blasting occasions vast accumulations of foul air, which hangs in the workings by reason of the gradients ascending from the Italian side. However, pure air is conveyed by the compressing apparatus in sufficient quantities to sustain the workmen. The advance is being made from both sides, and the embrace will take place four thousand one hundred and thirty-eight feet above the level of the sea, or one thousand two hundred and seventy-six feet below the summit of the Mont Cenis Railway, which, in scoring derision of the labors of the human moles below, is now climbing the topmost passes of the mountain. The total cost of this tunnel can not be less than six millions of money. In the early days of railway construction English engineers always tunneled to avoid a very slight gradient; now it is found that engines can go where horses can not, by means of steam engine, with its central gripping rail, enabling it to climb passes that Stephenson would have shuddered to contemplate.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ESSAY ON HOUSEKEEPING.

WIFE AIDS—Is worried out of Eden to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow Eve's heaviest punishment was going to housekeeping. After living accustomed to plain delicious fruit when they first lived, and never think of breadstuff, dinner, or supper, as an awful thing. Adam must have been to Adam to just come in soon in a state of starvation; to know whether dinner was ready, and to find fault with the cook. Had Mrs. dumplings were not done, how Eve would have taunted over that one spoonful of pudding from the forbidden tree! and how often the invalid must have banged the door—wait a minute, had no doors to bang—and left Eve alone, probably, in his wrath over undone cooking! We ourselves believe Eve wept a girl. This was full punishment must have come upon us by way of our erring ancestress. When we are learned enough, we mean to expound the offensive-colored riddle of "who was Adam's wife?" by pointing to our readers that his mother kept "help," and that Cain courted her. Of course Eve had a "girl," and being "green and just come over," doubtless she mistook pomegranates for potatoes, and oranges for apples—but of the melons, and remained the chickens to their feathers; and Mr. Adam said: "It's your fault, my dear," to Eve—and Eve wept.

Then there must have been other tears to shed when the first dinner-set came to pieces and button—buttons also came in with the fall—were absent therefrom.

Mrs. Eve's disobedience brought housekeeping upon the world, and all its woe! we are sure of that.

MOTTO FOR HARD-WORKING CUT and Come again.

THE HORSE-JOCKEY'S GEOGRAPHY OF ENGLAND.—Capital, Epsom; chief towns, Newmarket, Ascot, and Doncaster; principal productions, whips, spurs, and horse accoutrements in general; occupations, racing and making bets; government, a council called the grand stand; largest province, the turf."

A man in New Orleans walks so slow that his shadow frequently falls asleep on the sidewalk.

AN EPITAPH.

The virtues that were yesterday unknown
Are found to-day upon the sculptured stone.

PAINFUL DISENCHANTMENT.

No 1. Size of Caister imagined by me as about fitting (loosely) the feet of my adored L-i-z-a when she wore (No. 2) the long skirt then in vogue.

No. 3. The actual size discovered when she put on (No. 4) the at present worn short dress.

A COOL SUGGESTION.

[For the Warm Weather.]

Attentive Wife. "DINNER'S READY, CHARLIE; COME ALONG, THERE'S A DEAR, BEFORE IT GETS HOT!"

THE YOUNGEST INTRODUCING THE OLDEST.

AMERICA. "Brothers and Sisters, I am happy to present to you the Oldest Member of the Family, who desires our better acquaintance."

WASHING AND SHEARING SHEEP IN THE COUNTRY.—SKETCHED BY EDWIN FORBES.—[SEE PAGE 462.]

SHEEP-FARMING.

"The sheep is a civilized being, and will not bite, wound the school-boy beginning his composition, as the comic legend has it. He was not far from the truth, and it may be said that the sheep and man are equally capable of, and equally improved by, civilization, though the latter ungrateful beast will sometimes bite. Some of the philosophers and geologists who have looked in vain for the sheep among earth's fossil remains, ensure us that the sheep and goat were created at about the same time with and for the express use of man. We know not how this may be, but certain it is that the sheep and mankind have progressed together in civilization—the one becoming more perfect in development and valuable as the man grew wiser. Sheep formed the principal wealth of the patriarchs, and they often had thousands where the farmer of to-day has ten; but the superior breed of the modern ten makes them more valuable than twice a thousand of the gaunt-like animals of the patriarchal age. In all times they were bred for their milk and skins, their flesh not being then thought a delicacy. Now "spring lamb and peas" are served up daily in the season as among the greatest delicacies; the skins are used for garments, gloves, and for various sorts of manufactures; the wool is consumed in the making of fabrics ("all wool" is a great recommendation of goods); and the animals themselves indirectly affect other wide-spread industries of all civilized peoples, while in some barbarous nations they are used as beasts of burden.

We look about $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 annually in America because we do not keep sheep enough. We have, probably, more sheep pastures in each State of the Union than there are in all England, yet we raise only about half as many sheep, and that so carelessly that we have to buy two-thirds of our wool for manufacturing purposes, besides three-fourths of our woolen fabrics from the English. We raise about 200,000,000 sheep, and 100,000,000 pounds of wool, all of which (and a great deal more which is imported) is manufactured here, while we annually buy abroad at least $40,000,000 worth of woolen fabrics. There is a large field, and a large demand for sheep in America, and they can be reared at less cost than in Spain, France, or Belgium; but as our manufacturers can not compete with those countries, either in the style, texture, or cheapness of their goods, the management to enter into sheep-farming in this country is not as great as these figures would seem to warrant.

Our sheep-farmers and country readers generally will find our paper on page 461 of interest in this connection, as illustrative of the manner of washing and shearing sheep in vogue among the small farmers in this country. Early in the spring or summer of each year, as soon as the weather is warm enough for the sheep to go without the warm winter over-coat with which bountiful Nature provides them, they are carefully washed, and immediately shorn of their wool in the manner illustrated.

IMPORTANT FROM WASHINGTON:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 20, 1868.

TO WHEELER & WILSON, of New York:

SIRS,—The Department has received One Gold Medal, awarded to your firm on Sewing and Button-Hole Machines, at the Paris Universal Exposition of 1867.

Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.
[Com.]

DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES recommends WHITCOMB'S ASTHMA REMEDY.—[Com.]

For Moth Patches, Freckles, and Tan on the Face, use PERRY'S "MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION." Sold every where. Depot 49 Bond Street, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$15 GET THE BEST. $15
GOOD WILL WATCH CO.,
IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS,
78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

Oroble is a new composition resembling Gold, refine its the color and brilliancy. The OROBLE GOLD WATCHES are in hunting cases (Ladies' and Gentlemen's), manufactured at our factory in Switzerland, from the best materials, of the most approved styles, jeweled, and handsomely finished; are guaranteed reliable TIME-KEEPERS. As to appearance, durability, etc., they are unsurpassed by any other solid gold watch, by watches of the most rare and costly description. Warranted for ten years. Price $15, payable to Express on receipt of the Watch. We have concluded to retail our splendid watches, at the lowest possible prices, endeavoring to replenish their depleted purses by counterfeiting and substituting a spurious for the genuine Oroble Gold Watch.

EYE-GLASSES and SPECTACLES.

Adapted to every vision; the optics of old and young, without the distressing effect of Bausch & Lomb's Bioscular Glasses, combining extraordinary power, great durability, and wide field of observation. Our Sportsmen's Glasses and Opera. Catalogues sent free by enclosing stamp. Inventor, SEMMONS, Optician, 609½ Broadway, New York.

CLOTHING! CLOTHING! CLOTHING!

Our stock for the present season is of unparalleled extent and variety in both MEN'S AND BOYS' CLOTHING. Persons at a distance can obtain perfect-fitting garments from us, with certainty and dispatch, by the aid of OUR NEW RULES OF SELF-MEASUREMENT. Rules and Priced Price-list sent by mail on application. FREEMAN & BURR, Clothing Warehouse, 154 Fulton St., and 99 Nassau St., N. Y.

FRECKLES, PIMPLES, TAN,
MOTH-BLOTCHES, SUNBURN,
and all eruptions of the SKIN effectually removed by

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN LOTION."

Renders the SKIN and COMPLEXION
SOFT, FAIR, and BLOOMING.

This is the only harmless and reliable remedy for diseases of the skin, and has been established 28 years.

For ladies in the nursery it is of great importance.

For gentlemen after shaving it allays the smarting pain and makes the face delightfully cool and pleasant.

PHALON'S "PAPHIAN SOAP"

for the toilet, nursery, and bath, delightfully perfumed, 25 cents per cake. Sold every where.

"FLOR DE MAYO"
A NEW PERFUME FOR
THE HANDKERCHIEF
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
PHALON & SON, 517 Broadway, N. Y.

S. T.—1860.—X.

MRS. PARTINGTON INSULTED.—The White Mountains of New Hampshire are evidently a great institution—very high, from which fine, beautiful view, four-dollar dinners. But the practical eye of a certain renowned Dame saw those smooth-faced rocks, and the European adventurer was quick to take-pash to the Tip-top House with his familiar S. T.—1860—X. PLANTATION BITTERS. This raised the ire of the MRS. Partington composing the Legislature of the Granite State, who put their two heads together, outlawed Dr. Drake, and made it a penal offense to ply the article bouh on their beloved hills. Verily, the fine arts are a discount in New Hampshire. Query.—Do. Drake pay them for this splendid advertisement?

MAGNOLIA WATER—A delightful toilet article superior to Cologne, and at half the price.

THE GRAND DUCHESS OF GEROLSTEIN. Strauss, Offenbach, Suppé, Labitzky, Tyrrwitzer, Crispino e la Comare, Der Freischütz, Un Ballo in Maschera, Le Sonnambula. Each opera arranged for the piano, solo, duet, trio, quartet, and full piece, and the whole of the music; price 50 cents. All the above in BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET, the cheapest collection of modern music in the world. Sixty books, 50 cents each. Catalogues free. Any music or musical publications free. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway.

SPALDING'S PREPARED
GLUE

Mends Toys, Crockery, Wooden-ware, &c., &c. Useful in every house. Bottle with Brush, 25 cents.

Prices from $3 to $10 per 100. We will send to any address, postpaid, One Sample, 25c., Three Samples, 50c., with Price-List.

All moneys sent by Post-Office Order at our risk. We guarantee full amount in goods, at lowest rates, for all money sent.

My Wife had an Ulcer

On her leg
Thirteen years,
Caused by varicose veins
Extending from her ankle to her knee;
Some physicians said away
To the bone.
I have employed
Over twenty eminent physicians
All rent cured.
But all attempts at cure
Proved utterly short
Until I used WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT,
Which the doctors told me
Was humbug.
But, humbug or not,
It has done the work complete
In less than one month.
Removing the pain
At first application,
I kept her leg wet
With PAIN PAINT constantly
Till healed.
I wish we had more humbugs as useful
As Dr. WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT.
I am well known in this city,
And any person
Can make further inquiry
At 103 West Street, New York,
At the Pioneer Store,
Of which I am proprietor,
And I shall be happy
To answer all inquiries
Personally by the use of PAIN PAINT.
MAY 12, 1868. PETER MINCK.

MILLER'S STRANGERS'S GUIDE to the Cities of NEW YORK, BROOKLYN, and adjacent places, comprising notices of every object of interest to strangers, and containing Railroads, Churches, Hotels, Places of Amusement, Libraries, Institutions, etc., etc., with numerous illustrations. Price $1 25.

MILLER'S NEW GUIDE to the HUDSON RIVER. Illustrated. By T. Addison Richards. With Map. Price $1 25.

MILLER'S GUIDE to NIAGARA FALL. By T. Addison Richards. Illustrated. With Map. Price $1 25.

MILLER'S GUIDE to SARATOGA SPRINGS and vicinity. Illustrated. By T. Addison Richards. Price $1 25.

Sent, postage free, on receipt of price.

JAMES MILLER, Publisher, 647 Broadway, New York.

An Easy Way of Procuring

what you want.—HORACE WATERS & Co. 481 Broadway, will dispose of new and second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of all the best makers, and receive from $5 to $25 monthly until paid. Fifty new and second-hand instruments for rent, and rent applied if purchased, or for sale at bargains for cash.

200 RARE RECEIPTS.

STAFFORD'S METROPOLITAN RECEIPT-BOOK for the Million; containing many Secrets, and much valuable information never before made public, including over 200 Receipts, of practical use to the intelligent Metropolitan Resident of the city. Price 25 cents, mailed postpaid, free, to any part of the United States. Address P. O. Box 247, New York City.

Lorillard's Yacht Club Pipe!

A GENUINE MEERSCHAUM!

ORDERS FOR THESE ELEGANT PIPES
ARE PLACED DAILY
IN THE
VARIOUS SIZED PACKAGES of LORILLARD'S
YACHT CLUB SMOKING TOBACCO.

THE YACHT CLUB SMOKING TOBACCO is made of the best smoking leaf in the world, after an original process exclusively our own, whereby ALL POISONOUS NICOTINE IS EXTRACTED. It is beseechly unsurpassed in aromatic flavor, anti-nervous effects, and soothing qualities.

It is put up in various sized sacks, in which we PACK DAILY a certain number of orders for GENUINE MEERSCHAUM PIPES, beautifully carved, after an original and appropriate design, by KALDENBERGER & SON, who warrant every pipe the purest material.

Parties finding orders, by inclosing same to us, indorsed with their full address, will receive their pipes by express.

The Yacht Club Smoking Tobacco is Sold by all Respectable Dealers.

P. LORILLARD, Nos. 16, 18, and 20 Chambers Street, New York.

NEW SONGS.

KITTY MCGEE. By Henry Tucker. . . . . 35c.
LOVE IN MY HEARTHOME PAY NO REST. . . . . 30c.
THE EYE THAT BRIGHTENS WHEN I COME. . . . . 30c.
PLEADING HAIR ADJUST THY SURTAIN. . . . . 30c.
Arranged for flute or violin, 10c. each. Music mailed.

FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 Broadway, 2d door above 26th St. Branch, 208 Bowery.

A GENTS WANTED for the best "LIVES OF GRANT and COLFAX" yet issued. Complete in One Volume, By Hon. B. D. MAYNETTE (widely known as "E.D.M." of Cincinnati Gazette, and "Veterun Observer" of N.Y. Times). Two Editions, English and German. Elegantly illustrated with emblematic Title-Page, Steel Portraits, and numerous Engravings. Full account of Lives, with Republican Platform and Letters of Acceptance. Price low, to suit the times. Large profit to Agents. For territory west of Indiana, apply to our Western Office, R. L. LAMBERT, Supt., P. O. Drawer No. 10, Bloomington, Ill. East of Illinois, apply to R. W. CARROLL & Co., Publishers, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

New Summer Goods

FOR GENTLEMEN.

ROMAN SCARFS AND TIES,
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
AT POPULAR PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

HEADQUARTERS for Cuming's Books, Engravings, and Medals. Now ready, the best LIFE OF GRANT, by Hon. J. T. HEADLEY, also, an authentic LIFE OF COLFAX, with a splendid steel Portrait, published under his sanction, and given as a premium to every subscriber to the Life of Grant. Send $1 for six samples of our Medals and Engravings.

E. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N.Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., 10 cents.

DAVID WATSON, Agt., Adams Press Co.,
29 Courtlandt Street, New York.

HARPER'S
HAND-BOOK FOR EUROPE.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1868, and a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. By W. PEMBERTON FETRIDGE. Seventh Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEMBERTON FETRIDGE, Author of "Harper's Hand-Book." Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NORDHOFF'S CAPE COD.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have nearly ready
NORDHOFF'S CAPE COD. Cape Cod and All Along Shore: Stories. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. 12mo, Cloth.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Prime of Queen Anne: A new story," by MRS. DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a charming and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1863 was commenced the issue of "The Prime of Queen Anne," by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Household Angel," a Novel, by FIVE HUGH LORLOW.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every, Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, to one remittance; or, six Copies for $20 00.

The HARPER'S PERIODICALS will be delivered to subscribers without extra charge.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 50 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing Two Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscribers from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, and 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on the wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to BANK NOTES, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line: Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

PERIODICAL DEALERS supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S BAZAR at Seven Dollars per hundred each.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.

IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 50 cents, 75 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-houses, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in the article by buying which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.

GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express, as we generally find orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Tea Districts to our store and to our customers.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B. — Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending direct to us.

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are SPURIOUS IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

SECURE HEALTH IN ADVANCE.

It is as difficult to extinguish a raging fever as a raging fire; but you can prevent a conflagration by reducing the combustibles to the proof, and you can prevent an attack of fever by invigorating and purifying your "house of clay."

The "outside preserver" upon the constitution and the vital powers at this season is tremendous. Every bore of the millions which cover the surface of the body is a drain upon its substance and its strength. To meet this depletion, keep up the stamina under such a constant outflow of dissolving flesh, a tonic and invigorant is absolutely necessary, and time, that tries all things, has proved that impart a degree of strength and resistant power to the over-taxed vital forces which is unattainable by any other known means. The effect of this inestimable vegetable preparation is to increase the appetite, accelerate digestion, tone the excretive organs, give firmness to the nerves, purify the blood, cheer the spirits, and, by thus rallying all the forces of the body, enable it to defy the enervating influence of the heat, and pass triumphantly through the trying ordeal of the Summer months. As a safeguard against epidemics, as a preventive of the feebleness, lassitude, and prostration, of which so many thousands complain at this season, it has a national reputation founded on twenty-five years of uninterrupted and unequaled success.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS.

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.

N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIOIDE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIOIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color so long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jewelled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each is now warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $18. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have a watch, open face and key wind, that is as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $3 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION.—Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches. In some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that we sell those or our own Oroide Watches only. Purchasers of these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

TESTIMONIALS.

From The New York Independent.

Our readers have probably observed in our paper the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These professed to be manufactured by a watch they then only described as in process of construction, and in the case which is ornamental and durable, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in all classes of society who can not afford to pay a price of $40 or $50 for a first-class silver watch, nor $125 to $175 for a gold one, yet would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time. These Oroide Watches seem to suit their cases exactly.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: GREENWOOD, July 27, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I have received the watch you sent per the Adams Express. It is very neat. It keeps good time, and is of a handsome appearance. I have disposed of it to a friend of mine, and now wish you to send me one of the same kind. I may be able to get some orders for you ere long. When you send it, direct it to Howe de Grace, Md., as that is the nearest point for me to get it. Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, yours, &c. W. D. BOSWOOD.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: YORK, PA., December 18, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—I received the Watch to-day, and I am very much pleased with it. It is in reality more than you advertise. There are five persons who will wish to get one of your watches in a few days. Yours respectfully, JOSEPH ZIEGLEMAN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: OFFICE MERCHANTS' UNION EXPRESS, STEINBOAT, Dec. 4, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—Please send me a half dozen Oroide Watches—small, medium, and large sizes. The watch you sent me the first one I ever saw that I could not tell from a gold watch. I will send a gold man watches. Please send me samples of your chains. I am going to keep two or three men travelling all the time. Very truly yours, R. H. MUNSON.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: GREENWOOD, Nov. 28, 1867.

DEAR SIRS,—Will you send three others wish you to send four of your Imitation Gold Watches, at $18 each, gentlemen's size, and receive payment on delivery. Address Greenwood Farms, Rev. Dr. Armitage, County, Lake Superior, Michigan, by express to Negoue, for Michael Lynch, Michael Cunsal, John Sicheu, and Henry Cooper. —all of Greenwood. Your watches are certainly a great success here. Yours truly, MICHAEL LYNCH.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: FORT HARKER, KANSAS, Nov. 27, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—Please send me a watch. I made quite a spec. on the last watch I sent for. I have not yet finished; for they will sell well. Several of my friends have received watches from you, and they like them very well. Send by Express. Dec 2d. I am, very respectfully, yours, &c. HENRY A. LEONARD, Bugler, Co. H, 7th U. S. C.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: GENTS,—I did not reach this place as soon as I expected when I wrote to you from Idaho, but was quieted when I arrived here to find that my order was filled, and the watch in the express office. I like the watches well, especially the large one. My brother will start for New York soon, and will call and see you. Thanking you for your promptness, I remain yours, JOHN T. CROWELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: LA GRANGE, OHIO, January 15, 1868.

SIRS,—I am glad to say that the watch for my friend gave entire satisfaction; and, as he deals in the article, you may expect further orders; and, as we are personally known, you can send the money to me after having it registered, to save $1 paying expenses back on the money. Hoping you will deal promptly with us, we remain your most obedient servants, WEST NEWTON, January 15, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: WEST NEWTON, January 15, 1868.

GENTS,—Please send me, C. O. D., two of your Oroide Watches, gents' size. Will send one of them mock a plain case as you have, the other one carved. Also two of your two-dollar chains. Send to Lima, Ally Co., Ohio, by W. Lloyd Express. Respectfully yours, W. H. MCCLELLAND.

P.S.—The Ladies' Watch you sent me was all that I could ask for the money. It keeps good time, and is a splendid article.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: PORT HENRY, N. Y., January 15, 1868.

Please send me per express two watches, gents' size; and if they prove to be as good as the one you sent me, I think I will want more. D. A. WASSON.

WATCHES, and ROSKOFF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH, and the Improved Aluminum Bronze. Aluminum Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seemingly combined the strength of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers. Price, from $16 to $20. Further details will be given to any applicant, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of JEWELRY, also Aluminum Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with privilege to examine.

Address JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

SOZODONT

Perfumes the Breath,

Beautifies and Preserves the Teeth.

SOLD ALL AROUND THE WORLD.

PHYSIOGNOMY; or, the Science of Expression" is in the Human Face, Voice, Walk, Action, with other allied subjects. By WM. B. HARDING, Author. If one may sometimes detect a rogue or an impostor by certain rules of science, he can always do so when certainly with reliable rules, such as are taught in the "Physiognomical Chart for Learners," illustrated with 44 Engravings. 12mo. Cloth; $2 50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, No. 192 Broadway. ☞ Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

PIMPLES on the FACE

Disappear instantly when STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS are used. Clear the blood of all taint of "Scrofula," Diseases of the Skin, Salt-Rheum, Sores, and Tumors; regulate the bowels, and cures Dyspepsia; leaves the Complexion Clear and White. Iron and Sulphur Powders are agreeable to the taste, and have never failed to cure. Sold by respectable Druggists. Will send by mail, one package of powders on receipt of $1; three packages, $2 50. Address HALL & RUSSELL, Wholesale Druggists, 218 Greenwich St., New York.

Whittier's Barefoot Boy,

L. PRANG & CO. have just issued ready the fourth edition of Eastman Johnson's poetical illustration of Whittier's famous poem entitled "BAREFOOT BOY;" one of the most charming genre pictures ever painted in this country. The first three editions of this chromo were sold in advance of publication.

THE POST, the N. Y. Evening Mail, says of our chromo "Your admirable chromo of 'The Barefoot Boy,' . . . is not a mere illustration of any of Whittier's poems, and in EVERY WAY SATISFACTORY as a work of art."

THE PAINTER, Engraver, and Publisher, says of our chromo: "It strikes me as being one of the best chromolithographs I have ever seen."

Sold at all Art Stores, or sent by express, free of charge, to any address in the United States, East of the Mississippi, on receipt of price.

Size 24 x 30. Price . . . . . Five Dollars.

L. PRANG & CO., Art Publishers, Boston.

BARTLETT MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT, 569 Broadway, New York. Needles, &c., for all Machines.

BARTLETT'S Reversible Sewing Machines are the lowest-priced reliable Machines. Examine different machines, or send for circular to Depot, 569 Broadway.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite Photographic, beautifully Colored, will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents, by W. HEPBURNE, 192 Nassau St., New York.

"I was Lean, and I became Stout."

Containing Practical Directions as to Food, Exercise, Bathing, Clothing, Stimulants, Tobacco, &c., to INSURE SUCCESS in every case. Second Thousand just published.

Published by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston.
Sent free by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Indelible Pencils.

For Marking Clothing, &c.: Single, 50 cts.; 2 for $1; per doz., $2 75; per gross, $25.

For Writing on Glass, Oilcloth, &c.: two for $1; per doz., $4.

Sent, freight prepaid, on receipt of price.

"More convenient than ink."—Inst. Agriculturist.

"Invaluable to Housekeepers."—Chicago Tribune.

MANUFACTURED AND SOLD BY THE INDELIBLE PENCIL CO., Boston. Send for circular.

☞ Sold by Stationers and Dealers every where.

FALL RIVER AND NEWPORT LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.

Steamboats leave from the OLD COLONY and Albany dally (Sundays excepted), leaving New York from Pier 28, N. R., at 5 P.M., Annex Newport, via Old Colony and Newport Railway, at 4 A.M. (due in Boston at 9 A.M. in time for Business). Northern connections or breakfast on board at 7 A.M., leave at 7.45 A.M., and arrive in Boston at 12 noon. Returning, Morning Trains leave Old Colony and Newport Railway Depot, corner of Kneeland and South Streets, at 8 A.M. and 5.30 P.M. This is the only direct route for Newport, Fall River, Taunton, New Bedford, Martha's Vineyard, Middleford, the Bridgewaters, Plymouth, and all towns on Cape Cod and Nantucket. Prices always as low as on any other line. For particulars inquire of the agents,

E. LITTLEFIELD, 72 Broadway, New York.
W. H. BULLOCK, Supt. O. C. & N. R. R., Boston.
New York Office, 192 Broadway.

8000 AGENTS wanted to sell 10 NEW INVENTIONS, of great value to families; all pay great profits to agents. Sample, postpaid, 25 cents. Circular, sample, gratis, postpaid. EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

660 MILES

OF THE

Union Pacific RAILROAD

Are now finished and in active operation. One hundred and twenty miles have been built in the last three months. More than twenty thousand men are employed, and this average of forty miles per month will be continued throughout the season, making NINE HUNDRED COMPLETED MILES by January 1st, and it is now probable that the ENTIRE GRAND LINE TO THE PACIFIC WILL BE OPEN FOR BUSINESS IN 1869.

No other first-class railroad in the world has been built and equipped so rapidly as the Union Pacific, which runs west from Omaha

ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

The United States Government makes of this railroad a GREAT NATIONAL WORK, and aids its construction by very liberal grants of money and of lands. To further insure the speedy completion of the Road, the Company are authorized to issue their own

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

having thirty years to run, and having interest coupons payable semi-annually at the rate of six per cent in gold. The principal, as well as interest, is made PAYABLE IN GOLD.

The Mortgage Bonds of nearly all other railroads in this country are payable, principal and interest, in currency—and it is asserted, and with much force of prediction, that no other railroad company in the world, building so great an extent of road, issues bonds of equal value with the First Mortgage Bonds now offered for sale by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The price of these Bonds is now 102 and accrued interest from July 1, in currency. The Company believe that at this price their Bonds are the

Safest and Most Profitable Investment in the market, and they confidently expect that they will shortly command a higher premium than any similar security. The Company reserve the right to advance the price at any time, and will not fill any orders or receive any subscriptions on which the money has not been actually paid at the Company's office before the time of such advance. Subscriptions will be received in New York

AT THE COMPANY'S OFFICE,

No. 20 NASSAU STREET,

And by JOHN J. CISCO & SON, Bankers,

No. 59 WALL STREET.

And by the Company's advertised agents throughout the United States.

Remittances should be made in drafts or other funds par to New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local agents, will look to them for their safe delivery.

A PAMPHLET and MAP FOR 1868 has just been published by the Company, giving fuller information than is possible in an advertisement, respecting the Progress of the Work, the Resources of the Country traversed by the Road, the Means for Construction, and the Value of the Bonds, which will be sent free on application at the Company's offices or to any of the advertised agents.

JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer,
JULY 2, 1868. New York.

$325 A MONTH, AND EXPENSES. 78 New Articles. Address H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

STAFFORD'S

"Olive Tar,"

Expressed from the Juices of the Olive and Pine,

Cures BLEEDING AT THE LUNGS;
Cures CONSUMPTION;
Cures CATARRH;
Cures BRONCHITIS;
Cures QUINSY AND LOSS OF VOICE;
Cures SORE THROAT;
Cures RHEUMATISM;
Cures SCALDS AND BURNS;
Cures ASTHMA.

"OLIVE TAR" RELIEVES AND CURES ALL PAIN FROM WHATEVER CAUSE.

Sold by Druggists: 50 cts. per Bottle, Large Cans $2.

Imitation Ivory Goods.

Great Improvements make! 5 New Patents received. MARTINDALE RINGS, 18 carat gold, single gross. SHEET BUTTONS, red, white, blue, $4 per gross. BILLHEADS, $2 50 and $3 50 per set. CHECKS, $3, $4, and $5 per 1000. Also a great variety of Ivory, Pearl, and Gilt Sleeve Buttons. Send for Price List. Address

WM. M. WELLING, 371 Broadway, New York.

CAMPAIGN Badges and Medals.

FIFTY DIFFERENT STYLES

of ELEGANT CAMPAIGN BADGES, MEDALS, and PINS now ready. AGENTS WANTED EVERY WHERE—and now is the time to secure them. Assorted lot, as samples, sent post-paid on receipt of $2 a dozen.

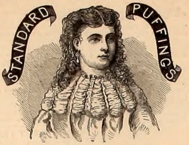
Also, The People's Edition, Lives of GRANT and COLFAX. Price 25 cents.

Also, GRANT AND COLFAX SONGSTER. Sent free on receipt of price, 10 cents.

Also, all the novelties and every thing in the campaign line.

For the RIGHT GOODS at the RIGHT PRICES, send to Headquarters. Send for descriptive catalogue. Address

B. W. HITCHCOX,



Publisher, 44 Beekman Street, Campaign Goods, 18 Spring Street (under St. Nicholas Hotel), New York.

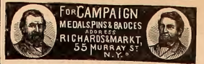
DEAD CALM.—WAITING FOR A SWELL.

TRY THE PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue, Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat Box.
Price 10 and 20 cts. Sold by all Grocers, and by Plymouth Color Co. (C. T. Raynolds & Co.,) 106 & 108 Fulton St., New York.

LAWN, SWISS, LINEN, and CAMBRIC

IN FOUR (QUADRUPLE),
FIVE (QUINTUPLE), and
EIGHT (OCTUPLE) ROWS,

TRADE-MARK.



PATENT.

For making and trimming
Ladies' and Children's Wear.
WARRANTED TO WASH
and retain its original
BEAUTY AND FULLNESS.

For Sale by the Fancy and Dry Goods Houses throughout the country.

1841. S. DAVIS, JR.'S
Celebrated DIAMOND HAMS,
Cincinnati. Sold by leading Grocers in chief cities.
READ & ROUNDEY, Cor. Beaver and New Sts., N.Y.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS for sale at all respectable Art Stores. Catalogues mailed FREE by L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, and Dissolving View Apparatus, with the improved Calcium Light, and several thousand artistically-colored Photographic Views on Glass, illustrating Art, Science, History, Travels, &c., &c. Priced and illustrated Catalogue free on application. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, No. 49 Nassau Street, New York.

TARRANT'S
EFFERVESCENT
SELTZER APERIENT

Every Man his own Mineral Spa.—Each invalid can not go to Germany to drink the Seltzer Water, but he can carry a portable Seltzer Spa with him wherever he goes, in the shape of a bottle of TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT, and produce the effervescent duplicate of a glass of the original fluid in two minutes.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Skin.
Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

B. T. BABBITT'S ARTICLES OF EVERY DAY USE

PUT UP IN CASES TO MEET THE WANTS OF FAMILIES.

FIVE DOLLAR CASE.

½ lb. Best Superfine Tea	$0 75
3 lbs. Pure "Lion Coffee"	1 50
1 lb. Yeast Powder	75
8 lbs. Labor-Saving Union Soap	96
1 lb. Pure Saleratus	16
1 lb. Pure Potash	22
1 Paper "Soap Powder"	16
4 Cakes Best Toilet Soap	50
	$5 00

TEN DOLLAR CASE.

1 lb. Superfine Tea	$1 50
4 lbs. Pure "Lion Coffee"	2 00
2 lbs. Best Granulated Sugar	36
1 lb. Best Starch	13
2 lbs. Yeast Powder	1 50
20 lbs. Labor-Saving Union Soap	2 40
2 lbs. Pure Saleratus	30
2 lbs. Pure Potash	44
3 Papers "Soap Powder"	45
8 Cakes Best Toilet Soap	1 00
	$10 08

If you can not obtain the Goods of your Grocer, send your Orders direct to the Factory, and the Case will be forwarded by Express to any part of the United States. Any person ordering TEN CASES will receive A PREMIUM OF ONE EXTRA CASE. Express Charges to be Paid by the Purchaser.

B. T. Babbitt's Lion Coffee.

This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed hermetically in cans containing ONE POUND; all the Aroma and delicacy of flavor are thereby preserved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is from fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure coffee. It is packed in cases of TEN, TWENTY-FOUR, FORTY, and SIXTY POUNDS, Price FIFTY CENTS per lb. One Can in every Twenty-four-pound Case, two Cans in every Forty-pound Case, and three Cans in every Sixty-pound Case, contain a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK.

Use B. T. Babbitt's Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker.

Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or ley in the market. Put up in Cans of One pound, Two pounds, Three pounds, Six pounds, and Twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make Fifteen Gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in the market.

B. T. Babbitt's Labor-Saving Union Soap.

B. T. BABBITT has for a long time been experimenting, and has now produced an article of Soap that is composed of the best washing material, and at the same time will not ROT or injure the clothes in the least possible degree. He stamps his name on each bar, and guarantees that the Soap will not injure the most delicate fabric, while it will be found to be the most pleasant washing Soap ever offered in market. It is made from CLEAN and PURE material, contains no adulterations of any kind, and is especially adapted for woolens, which will not shrink after being washed with this Soap. Ask for B. T. BABBITT'S SOAP, and take no other. Each bar is wrapped in a Circular containing full directions for use, printed in English and German. One pound of this Soap is equal to three pounds of ordinary Family Soap. Directions sent in each Box for making One Pound of the above Soap into Three Gallons of handsome Soft Soap. It will remove Paint, Grease, Tar, and Stains of all kinds. It will not injure the fabric; on the contrary, it preserves it. It will wash in hard or salt water. But little labor is required where this Soap is used. Machinists and Printers will find this Soap SUPERIOR TO ANY THING IN THE MARKET.

☞ FOR SALE EVERY WHERE. ☜

B. T. BABBITT, Manufacturer,

Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

WASHING WITHOUT LABOR!—Something New!

B. T. Babbitt's celebrated SOAP POWDER

Warranted to remove DIRT and STAINS of every kind, leaving the Linen perfectly CLEAN AND WHITE.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.

To each six quarts of cold water required to cover the clothes, add two tablespoonfuls of this SOAP POWDER, first dissolved in two quarts of boiling water, mix this thoroughly with the cold water, put in the clothes and let them soak over night. Then rub the dirt streaks, and give them a thorough rinsing in the pounding-barrel or other vessel. Next put them in the boiler with clean water, add a little of the Powder, and after boiling for a short time all dirt and stains will be removed, leaving the clothes

EXCEEDINGLY WHITE.

Now rinse and blue as usual. The same water will answer a second time, if the clothes are not very dirty; it will likewise be found excellent for washing floors and any painted work. IF THE CLOTHES HAVE NOT BEEN SOAKED OVER NIGHT, they can be made perfectly clean by using A LITTLE MORE OF THE POWDER when boiling, or by boiling in two waters.

THIS POWDER IS WARRANTED

Not to Rot or Injure the Clothes.

It leaves no unpleasant odor, RENDERS BLEACHING UNNECESSARY, DISPENSES WITH RUBBING, except for articles specially soiled, while the cost of the material for doing THE WASHING OF TEN PERSONS WILL NOT EXCEED TWO CENTS.

ONE PAPER OF THIS POWDER will make Twelve Quarts of best FAMILY SOFT SOAP.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Mix together six quarts of water and one paper of the Powder, and let them boil about two minutes; then add six quarts of cold water, stir them intimately together, and set the vessel away in a cool place where it will not freeze; when cold, you will have a very thick and nice white soap. This soap will wash well, and will not EAT the hands like other soft soap, nor ROT the clothes. By making the Powder into six quarts of soap, it can be used with Hard or Sea Water. The Soft Soap is best adapted for washing Calico and Woolen Goods. TO PREVENT DISAPPOINTMENT OR IMPOSITION, be sure and get

B. T. BABBITT'S SOAP POWDER!

For Sale Every where. If your Grocer does not keep it, and will not get it for you, send your Orders direct to the Factory.

B. T. BABBITT, Manufacturer, Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, and 43 and 44 West Street, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 604.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

HON. HORATIO SEYMOUR, DEMOCRATIC NOMINEE FOR PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 468.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1868.

THE GREAT ISSUE.

THE Democratic Convention of 1864 declared the war a failure. The loyal people scorned the words and fought on to an unconditional victory. The Democratic Convention of 1868 declares that the war debt shall be repudiated. Loyal men say the words will be equally spurned by the same honorable people. In 1864 upon a platform of surrender to rebellion the Democrats nominated the conspicuous military failure of the war. In 1868, upon a platform of repudiation, they nominate a pure Copperhead. In 1864 the men who thought it possible to prevent a victory directed the Convention. In 1868 the same men who think there is at least a chance of disgracing the victors controlled it. There is no doubt as to the issues of the campaign. Shall the ex-rebels and their political allies dishonor the national name by repudiating the debt and betraying the loyal citizens of the Southern States? Shall all the work of reconstruction be undone, and the country plunged anew into the vortex of disorganization? Shall the policy of subjecting the loyal population to the late rebels be substituted for the policy of reconstruction upon equal rights which is now in process of accomplishment?

These are the questions fairly put to the good sense and patriotism of the American people by the two platforms and the candidates. Nor does it become necessary to be detailed that the Democratic platform explicitly opens the question of reconstruction. Its declaration is, that "the reconstruction acts (so called) of Congress are unjustifiable, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." Any man or officer who refuses to acknowledge them is justified by the Democratic platform. Any State into power in any matter must treat those acts as void or belie its declarations. If it acts as it professes to believe it will set the acts aside. If it chooses to belie its words, it will let them stand. But in what manner is it likely to respect or enforce acts which it denounces as void? If the reconstruction acts are to be overthrown, it is the Democratic party come into power. If they are to remain, which will most honorably maintain them—the party which believes in the principle they embody, or that which decides the principle and declares them usurpations, revolutionary, and void?

The active and reflective reader will also remark that, according to the Democratic platform, the present situation of the country, if not altogether what might be wished, is wholly due to the Republican party. That man like Mr. HAMPTON and N. B. FORREST and General HOKE, and a hundred other rebel officers who not in the field, have directly or indirectly done any thing to disturb the national tranquillity or increase the public debt, is not remotely suggested. But words were feeble in the months of the Confederate upon Independence to describe the enormous offenses of a party which had led the country in its noble and triumphant endeavor to the rebellion, whether in the field or in Copperhead councils; which has removed the unspeakable stain from the national character, and which, without a stroke of vengeance, has restored the Union upon the enduring principles of liberty and justice. It has not made WADE HAMPTON and his companions the arbiters of the fate of their fellow neighbors; and the Democratic party, which four years ago clamored for surrender to WADE HAMPTON and FORREST and HOKE, now denounces the party that prevented the surrender, and that honors all loyal men in the land.

The issue of reconstruction raised by the Democratic Convention is precisely the issue which ANDREW JOHNSON has been contending; namely, that when the rebellion in arms was overthrown the only national right whatever within the United States was the right of prosecuting for treason, and that every State might reorganize itself as it chose. The Republican ground of reconstruction is, that as there was no authority left in any Southern State after the surrender but that of the United States, no step toward civil government could be taken but by their authority, and that they were bound in reorganizing the States to take such measures as emancipation and the general welfare of the country required. Upon this principle the Government proceeded. It moved slowly, for only gradually could the real disposition of the Southern States, upon which so much depended, be ascertained. It did not act upon any abstract theory, for it was peculiarly a subject of practical statesmanship. It has now restored all but three of the States that made war upon the Union. The complete pacification of those States, their adaptation to the radical changes wrought by the war, and their renewed industry and prosperity, are results that can be only slowly attained, but are not attainable at all until after their political reorganization. It is this which the Democratic platform of 1868 denounces as void. It is this which the American people will sustain precisely as they sustained the war, against the declaration of the Democratic platform of 1864 that it was a failure.

THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE.

MR. HORATIO SEYMOUR has written two letters positively declining to be a candidate for the Presidency. In the delegation of the State he formally and pointedly withdrew his name. In the Convention he announced that his personal honor required him to refuse to allow his name to be mentioned. Yet we presume that there was no one familiar with the facts of politics, or with MR. SEYMOUR's public career, who did not know that he was a candidate: and that fact is illustrative of the man.

The Democratic party is a party of the New York Managers, as the platform is of the Pendletonians. When it was suggested that MR. SEYMOUR was not favorable to CHASE, an astute observer asked, "Are you quite sure of it?" He, evidently, was not, and he laughed at the excessive greenness of the Herald in supposing that MR. SEYMOUR would seriously withdraw in favor of the Chief Justice. "There is no compromise between right and wrong," said southern Democrat; "if we are right the Republicans to be right, we ought not to nominate a candidate: if we are right, we ought to nominate one of our own representative men, and not a reluctant candidate like SEYMOUR."

The Convention agreed with this gentleman, and we have a truly representative man of the party, which, by its unscrupulous devotion to the extension and perpetuity of human slavery, plunged the country into war; which insisted that the rebellion was successful until it was only destroyed, and which contends that, as the country would not be destroyed, it shall be disgraced. Of this kind of patriotism and statesmanship HORATIO SEYMOUR is a proper representative. When the war was imminent, and the rebel Senators were seceding and all was doubt and darkness and confusion, MR. SEYMOUR was addressing mobs in favor of the whole responsibility of their crime upon those who, believing that liberty was a better national policy than slavery, had lawfully declared that slavery should not be extended over the national domain. When the war began this prophetic statesman announced that it would develop the resources of the South and prove ruinous to the North. When it became clear that it was a question between slavery and the Union, MR. SEYMOUR insisted that the Union must be worth more than slavery. When the agony of the war was extremest MR. SEYMOUR, then Governor, came to the city of New York, and in a public speech derided the patriotism of the people, and instigated them a mob against the Government then engaged in drafting men. He presided at the Convention which urged surrender to the rebellion. Rejected by the people as Governor, he appeared at Democratic Conventions after the final victory of GRANT and the Union army to denounce the party that had sustained the war, and to insist in the public mind the idea that the war debt was a wicked creation of the Republican party, and that the taxation was the result of Republican misrule and not of the rebellion. No word of encouragement to loyal men in the field fighting for their country—no syllable of sympathy with the millions of Union men, held in the most hopeless slavery by his countrymen—no declaration of any great, generous, humane principle of public and national action, has ever fallen from the lips of this representative of the Democratic party. His name is free from his youth to politics and to public speaking. A plausible politician, an unscrupulous partisan, the champion and leader of the only aristocratic class in the country, the flatterer of the laboring man, and the stigmatizer of labor, MR. SEYMOUR is the fit candidate of a party which, in its prime, sought to add to the American Republic a vast slave empire; and in its decadence, still inspired by the spirit of slavery, seeks to perpetuate class hatreds, and to govern the country unjustly.

NATIONAL HONOR OR DISHONOR.

THE Democratic platform declares, that where "the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States."

The Republican platform declares, that "We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime, and the national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted."

Which of these is honorable, and which dishonorable? What was the explicit understanding of every person who invested a dollar in the public funds? Had any body suggested that payment was to be made in any thing but coin would the loans have been taken? In other words, the United States had said in the crisis of the war: "We are sorely pressed, and we must be ruined if we can not get money. If any body will lend us money we will pay him in paper," could the money have been lured?

But it is not a matter of conjecture. In a dark hour MR. THADDEUS STEVENS, as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, did propose that the principal and interest of the pending loan should be paid in paper. He was promptly overruled; yet his bare proposition was a serious disaster to the public credit.

MR. CHASE, Secretary of the Treasury, said distinctly in 1864, that it was the purpose of the Government to pay the FIVE-TWENTIES, "the other bonds of the United States, in coin."

MR. M'CULLOCH, Secretary of the TREASURY, said in 1867: "I consider the faith of the Government pledged to pay the FIVE-TWENTY bonds, when they are paid, in coin;" and he speaks of "the express understanding" under which the loan was negotiated.

The authorized Government agents every where urged investment in the bonds, because they were payable in gold.

It has always been the practice of the Government to pay the principal and interest of the public debt in coin.

The act approved March 8, 1868, does indeed provide in terms that the principal and interest shall be paid in gold. But must we therefore infer that the Government meant to repudiate all its pledges but this? As MR. ESCOTT suggests, in his letter in reply to General BUTLER, was not the object evidently to stimulate the sale of the bonds?

There is no doubt whatever of the intention of the Government in issuing the bonds, nor of the understanding of the people in taking them. They were bought to enable to pay dollars, not the promises of dollars. They were a solemn contract made by a Government in a desperate struggle, and their repudiation under whatever form is, as the Republican platform truly says, a national crime. The individual debtor might as well insist that "in right and in justice" he might pay his notes with other notes as the United States should insist that it would pay its promises in paper. No party that had heartily supported the war would propose it, and the people that refused to surrender to force will not succumb to the most unblushing fraud.

WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?

THE Instrumentality most important in defeating MR. PENDLETON before the Democratic Convention was unquestionably the platform, which was drawn in exact accordance with MR. PENDLETON's views—favoring payment of the FIVE-TWENTIES in paper. The platform was unanimously adopted by the Convention, New York voting for it, although MR. SEYMOUR, in important speeches designed to show his exact position, had demonstrated clearly that it would be a violation of good faith to pay them in that manner. The platform, which was adopted after a sadly long day's proceedings, went forth as the sentiment of MR. PENDLETON, and the Convention was then held in hand by the reins of the New York delegation until public sentiment against the platform had been sufficiently collected. Bondholders universally pronounced against it, the bonds receded in every market, and the controversy became wide-spread that it would be fatal to put upon the platform the candidate to whose views it had been made to conform with careful precision. Investigation into this subject will plainly show that this was a part of the deep-laid scheme by which the only eminent opposer of that policy among all the candidates was rejected for the hour. If MR. SEYMOUR had intended while making his speeches against repudiation to have the platform constructed in conformity with his views, a counter declaration of views on Resolutions or before the Convention itself would have taken place, and no doubt with success; but as this was not done, and MR. SEYMOUR was careful to inform the public of his distinct views, it may safely be assumed that it was with no other design than to influence the Convention in his behalf at the time when the utmost importunity and danger of the platform should be made to appear, and when from this apparent cause the Convention was about to name as its standard-bearer one of the Pendletonians, CHASE, HENDRICKS, or HANCOCK, with whom the PENDLETON strength had been tried in open contest. The result would be that the latter would then naturally be to some one who had stood or appeared to stand aloof from the fierce struggle, and whose elevation would leave to the West the right of naming the candidate in July, 1872.

On the afternoon immediately before the day of nomination this matter had doubtless been partly arranged when Ohio joined New York in the motion of the latter, which was carried, to adjourn over to the next day for the purpose, it was said, of careful deliberation.

The Convention had clearly shown—PENDLETON having failed—that either CHASE or HANCOCK or HENDRICKS would be nominated; and although HANCOCK and HENDRICKS were allowed to have a run up to the point when enthusiasm would have placed either of them on the ticket, CHASE was not allowed this privilege, because the applause had been so vociferous and hearty on the announcement of a vote for him as to show too great danger. The handling of that announcement here was masterly, and as CHASE was the supposed certain nominee of New York, no thought was entertained that the motion to adjourn had been made in the interest of the President of the Convention, but on the contrary that it was dictated by a lofty unselfishness.

SEYMOUR had been overslaughed at Chicago —the social influences there all being against him as was the outside and gallery sentiment—and it was determined that the next Convention should be held at New York, where these influences might be reversed. The invitation to the Southern Democracy to participate was as general as to exclude no one. SEYMOUR's position in the war, and was carried out in the spirit of the most generous hospitality. At the grand dinner at the Manhattan Club—paid for in part doubtless out of the appropriation of thirty thousand dollars made by the city for fire-works!—ten, we are told, of the largest salmon were served whole, and it is said over three hundred bottles of Champagne were used. These attentions, not less grateful than were those bestowed by the wealthy friends of SEYMOUR, removed all doubts as to how Southern rebels would be received, and gave the canvass in New York a character the reverse of that which operated at Chicago, and, perhaps, fairly favorable to SEYMOUR's liberality, as he had declined the honor of a nomination.

It would require two impossible things—the election of MR. SEYMOUR to the Presidency, and the exhibition of his policy as to appointments—to inform the country of the exact situation as between the quondam friends of PENDLETON and MR. SEYMOUR; but in neither event is any comprehension who supposes that there was not an understanding between them, inchoate or complete, when the New York move [illegible] or that the studious attempt to show that New York in the ensuing morning would support CHASE, had the least foundation.

The action when SEYMOUR received the unexpected (?) vote of Ohio, could not be excelled by any of the masters who on the stage display the human passions. He could scarcely be held; he stepped with his feet, and doubtless delivered over to the reporters his carefully prepared speech, in which the word meant is unenforced by the word pulsations, thus showing that such was his object in repeatedly declaring that he did not intend to accept a nomination. We are also treated to a scene of unusual interest when SEYMOUR, locked in the arms of TILDEN, was observed in tears, still refusing to serve:

> "Do, good my lord, the citizens entreat you."
> [Sayer of We Wait.]
> "Refuse not, mighty lord, this proffered love."
> [Sayer of Killed Smith.]
> "Will you [says Seymour] enforce me to a world of care?
> I am not made of stone,
> But penetrable to your kind entreaties,
> Albeit against my conscience and my soul.
> Since you will buckle fortune on my back,
> To bear her burden where I will or no,
> I must have patience to endure the load:
> But if black scandal or foul-faced reproach
> Attend the sequel of your imposition,
> Your mere enforcement shall acquittance me
> From all the impure blots and stains thereof;
> For God doth know, and you may partly see,
> How far I am from the desire of this."

The wires had scarcely flashed the news—for such it was—of his nomination over the city, when a vehicle, drawn by eight elegant horses, heralded by a loud bell, was observed, bearing a well-dried placard, in large, well-painted letters, announcing that HORATIO SEYMOUR, the favorite son of New York, had been nominated and would be elected to the Presidency!

A more perfect exhibition of manipulation, management, and the selection of a party as the place for the assembling of the Convention, has never been presented in any country. It stands in powerful contrast with the proceedings of the Republican Convention, which, guided by the wise forecast and deliberate judgment of the solid men of the Union, presented many startling features in the reverse of the revolutionary and repudiating names and doctrines which rebellion has thus put forth in the name of the Democracy.

WHAT GENERAL BLAIR WANTS.

THE country will see in General BLAIR's letter, published during the Convention, the kind of President which the Democratic party would provide in the event of the removal of the President whom it hopes to elect. General BLAIR would have the army used by force of arms the work of reconstruction, and "to compel the Senate" to obey the President. A weaker and more ridiculous nomination could not have been made, and one which reveals more plainly the real spirit and secret hope of the Democratic party. MR. BLAIR says, on the 30th of June, "We must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpations of Congress known as the reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the Convention upon this issue." And upon this issue is nominated him. Upon this issue the country, intent upon equal rights and peace and prosperity, will vehemently reject General BLAIR and his civil war.

AND MR. CHASE—?

ON the twenty-first ballot, in a Convention which on the twenty-second nominated one of the most conspicuous Copperheads in the country, Mr. CHASE received four votes, having previously received half a vote in each of five ballots. If he had said and done and written nothing to affect the result; if, honoring his great office and his own character and career, he had been as satisfied with them as the country was gratefully mindful of them, the introduction of his name into a conclave of those who would gladly disgrace a people they could not subdue, would not be an ineradicable stain upon his fame.

But the master passion of the Chief Justice has destroyed the respect and confidence of those who have long honored and followed him. Was it not enough to have been one of the great senatorial chiefs who overthrew the grinding tyranny of slavery—to have been the skillful Secretary of the Treasury during the war—to be, in his prime of life, Chief Justice of the United States? Was it worth while to renounce the respect of the great party that is founding the Government impregnably upon justice and liberty in order to secure four votes in a Convention that was balloting for PENDLETON and ASA PACKER and finally nominated HORATIO SEYMOUR and FRANK BLAIR?

The late political history of the country is full of the most instructive and painful warnings. The three most conspicuous names among the statesmen of the last generation were WEBSTER, CLAY, and SEWARD. They all fixed their hearts upon the Presidency; they were all disappointed, and their disappointment overpowered them. HENRY CLAY pursued the phantom of the Presidency for a generation. The DANIEL WEBSTER of 1820 became the WEBSTER of the 7th of March, 1850. The WILLIAM HENRY SEWARD of the prairie speeches of 1860 became the flatterer of ANDREW JOHNSON for his ribald speech of December 22, 1865. To this melancholy list the name of SALMON P. CHASE is now added.

"Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition;
By that sin fell the angels."

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

THE Freedmen's Bureau has always been an object of Democratic hatred; but no institution was ever more imperatively necessary, and none has been more useful. Naturally a party which was steadily hostile to the abolition of slavery loudly clamored for the abolition of any system of defense for the emancipated class. But there is no doubt whatever that the war of races which that party has prophesied and encouraged, and which it would gladly have seen begun in the hope of the extermination of a race guilty of a colored skin, has been prevented by no means so powerful as that of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The war left the late slaves free among a population that had always despised them as a servile race, and that now hated them as men who had loved and trusted the Government. The freedmen had the habit of dependence which a severe system of slavery develops. They had no resource, no hope whatever, but their labor, in a region where all the land belonged to the employers, and all the employers were their enemies. The circumstances of their emancipation were a constant exasperation to the late master class that waited only for the moment to reduce them again to some kind of peonage or to actual slavery. The laws in regard to the freedmen, that these masters passed with the support of the President, were infamous. They were spiteful and inhuman. Had there been no friendly and powerful hand ready to interfere, had the slaves freed by the war been left wholly, as the Democratic party and the President desired, to the tender mercies of their late masters, and had some bold leader appeared among them, as undoubtedly he would, they would not have submitted without a desperate struggle to the doom intended for them.

The Freedmen's Bureau was the conscience and common-sense of the country stepping between the hostile parties and saying to them, with irresistible authority, "Peace!" The country had made the slaves free. It recognized them as men. It had seen their unswerving and heroic fidelity to the cause of the Union, knowing it to be that of their recovered liberty. It resolved that the only way to develop manhood is to treat men as men. It therefore stood between the freedmen and starvation and cruel laws, meanwhile giving them arms and schools and civil and political equality, that they might start fair in the common race. Through the quiet force of the Bureau the hostile class at the South has felt the perpetual presence of the will and power of the American people. The Bureau charities of direct relief of food have been shared by all the destitute of every color, and meanwhile its organizing hand has helped to arrange labor upon the new basis, to compose disputes, to accustom the whole population to the new order. Its service in this respect has been incalculable.

It must be remembered that the danger of a bloody disturbance of the settlement of the war in regard to the freedmen has never been upon the side of the late slaves, but of their masters. Despised and outraged as they have been, the anarchical element was not the race that was said to be imbruted and degraded by slavery; it was that which claimed to be the superior and master race. The crimes of the freedmen have been under the circumstances so few as scarcely to be noted. Their industry in labor and their devotion to education have been so striking as to gain perpetual honor. While the late rebels at the South were passing their black-codes intended to restore as much of slavery as possible, and the Copperheads at the North were declaiming about the barbarization and Africanization of the Southern States—as if liberty were more barbarizing than slavery—the freedmen were filling nearly four thousand schools, and themselves supporting more than a thousand of them. Old and young were busily studying; the increase of general intelligence among them has been remarkable; and as General HOWARD says—who, as Chief of the Bureau, and a most sagacious friend of the freedmen, and untiring worker for them, has the best opportunity of knowing—"the hopes of the warmest friends of the freedmen have been more than fulfilled. The future is full of promise for the entire race redeemed from bondage and ignorance."

Except for the Freedmen's Bureau, keeping the peace with intelligence and authority, organizing labor, establishing schools, saving the white population from the consequences of their own ferocity, it is easy to imagine how fearful would have been the condition of the Southern States during the period between the end of the war and the establishment of loyal governments. And now that those States are resuming their old relations in the Union, and for the first time with truly Republican governments, Congress is providing that the Bureau, which was in its nature temporary, shall cease its work. It has taught the freedmen that they are citizens of a government which recognizes their equal manhood. It has taught the late master class that all men have rights which must be respected. Clad in the armed authority of the United States, it has been a true minister of peace; and as the occasion for its service disappears, the Freedmen's Bureau passes into history with that highest crown of praise, the pious gratitude of the poor and unfortunate.

A. H. STEPHENS SPEAKS FOR THE DEMOCRATS.

THE most impudent event in the Democratic Convention was the offering by Mr. WRIGHT, of Delaware, of a series of resolutions from ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, the second civil officer of the late rebellion. This gentleman, although disapproving the particular movement for secession at the time it was made, was one of the most devoted of secessionists. His speech upon retiring from Congress shows as intense a hostility to the Union, unless controlled by the Southern slave power, as any speech of JEFFERSON DAVIS; nor is his later and inhuman boast of a government built upon the most revolting injustice as the corner-stone ever to be forgotten. A subject of the clemency of the government which he had spent his best energies to destroy, Mr. STEPHENS might properly remain profoundly silent at this time. But a convention of those who had sympathized with him and had declared him and his confederates successful was too tempting an opportunity. He was sure of an enthusiastic welcome from an assembly of which WADE HAMPTON, FORREST, VALLANDIGHAM, HORATIO SEYMOUR, and their companions, were members; nor was he disappointed.

Mr. STEPHENS deliberately announced the Southern theory of the Union as the true theory, and repeated the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions by implication. He went on to talk of rescuing the Constitution of the United States—which for four years he has been trying to overthrow—from the hands of those who have maintained it and the national Union which it ordains. He proceeded to dictate to the Democratic party what view of the war it might be permitted to take; and then this man, whose life has been given him by the loyal people of the United States, with shameless and unspeakable effrontery, speaking for the rebel chiefs in the Convention, for JEFFERSON DAVIS and every red-handed murderer of Union men, deliberately declared that "we have neither thanks nor sympathy" for certain classes of loyal soldiers.

That baffled rebels should have no thanks for those who subdued them is not surprising; but that one of them should be suffered to express his hatred in the name of a great party without rebuke, and with loud applause, is sufficiently indicative of the character and sympathy of that party, and illustrative of the spirit of those who represent the late rebels. Impudent as it was, Mr. STEPHENS knew his men. He knew that, accustomed as they were to the haughty dictation of Southern leaders, he might transcend all bounds of honorable decency and be sure of the servile applause of the Democratic delegates. He was not mistaken. The resolutions were read. The Democratic report records that "a lively curiosity was manifested as to what the honored statesman of the Empire State of the South had said, or rather transmitted, to the body." When curiosity was satisfied by the reading admiration was expressed in "spontaneous and spirited applause." The allusion to the Union soldiers, and Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS'S censure of some of them, was called an "eloquent and liberal reference." It "produced the liveliest gratification, and aroused the most unexampled enthusiasm."

How grimly WADE HAMPTON, who in his speech a month ago at General LEE'S College in Virginia said that "the lost cause" would yet triumph, must have smiled as he heard the view which the companion of JEFFERSON DAVIS chose to take of the war arousing the most unexampled enthusiasm of the Convention! No wonder that this unquailing believer in the final success of the cause for which he fought declared in his speech at the ratification meeting that "we have been inspired by but one single motive, the success of the Democratic party."

THE BONDHOLDING ARISTOCRACY.

THE Democratic platform, and orators, and papers, with the old Democratic policy of exciting the poor against the rich, and "the people" against the Government, not only insist upon paying the debt in paper, but demand what they call one currency for the laborer and the office-holder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder. This is, of course, intended as "gag," and it is the very poorest kind. It is meant to suggest that there is a lazy and luxurious class of the community, a bloated aristocracy of bondholders, whom the virtuous and toiling "Democracy" are to bring to grief. It is worth while, therefore, to expose this aristocracy and privileged class which is fattening upon the life-blood of the nation. Who are these rascally fellows who are to be made to suffer?

Besides the three or four hundred millions of the bonds held abroad mainly in Germany, they are the investments of savings banks, of fire, marine, and life insurance companies, and of trust estates. As we have before stated, the savings banks in New York hold nearly fifty millions of dollars; in Massachusetts twenty-five millions, in Rhode Island thirteen millions, and so in other States. The Life Insurance Companies in the city of New York invest twenty millions of dollars in these funds; the Marine and Fire Insurance Companies about forty-six millions of dollars. The various Guarantee Companies in New York hold a hundred millions of United States stock. Probably, as a careful estimate in the Evening Post showed, at least two-thirds of the funds are owned by such Companies.

Having thus discovered where the money is, let us now inquire who are the proprietors of it—who are these lazy rogues that put money in the savings banks, and snap their fingers at the toiling "masses?" In the State of New York the depositors in the savings banks are nearly five hundred thousand in number, and in Massachusetts more than three hundred thousand. The Post, of which we have spoken, had before it a list of the occupations of the principal depositors in one of the savings banks of this State, and we find this body of Sybarites to be composed of persons who are even more laborious than delegates to a Democratic Convention. All the branches of hard-workers are represented in this army. The largest in number are domestic servants; then technical laborers; then seamstresses; 4th, clerks; 5th, tailors; 6th, waiters; and 7th, cartmen. This is the luxurious aristocracy which is to be brought low. These are the useless members of society who, having invested their all in the promises of the United States, are now to find those promises as valuable as brown paper if the Democrats can only persuade the people to repudiate.

It is against this pampered body, against domestics and seamstresses and clerks and waiters and cartmen—it is against the poorest and hardest working members of society that the Democratic Convention raises its cry of repudiation. When these persons invested in the Government bonds the Government told them they were to be paid in gold. "Pay 'em in paper," shout the Democratic leaders. When they took the bonds the Government declared them free from taxation. "Tax 'em roundly," cried the Democratic leaders. "But," plead the poor laborers, "we lent money to save the Government." "Ho! ho!" scream the Democratic chiefs, "didn't we tell the Government four years ago that it couldn't save itself and ought to surrender? If you trusted it you must pay the penalty."

If the people care so little about it that they permit the Democratic chiefs to obtain control of the Government they will pay the penalty, and they will deserve to pay it.

JOHN A. GRISWOLD.

IN the young prime of life, of unspotted character, of proved ability, of conspicuous patriotism, unfettered by cliques, generous, ardent, and persistent, JOHN A. GRISWOLD is the happy choice of the Republicans of New York as their candidate for Governor. Formerly a Democrat, he snapped every mere party tie when "Democrats" excused rebellion and derided the country striving for life. From that moment the country has had no more faithful friend, and liberty and progress no sincerer advocate. When the rebel guns were yet roaring against Sumter, Mr. GRISWOLD led a movement to place a regiment in the field; and when ERICSSON was looking for aid, Mr. GRISWOLD helped him build the Monitor just in time to sink the Merrimac.

When emancipation was proposed in Congress Mr. GRISWOLD cried Amen, and of every wise measure of reconstruction he has been among the foremost friends. To a certain frank nobility of nature he adds a striking capacity for affairs. Direct and honorable in all his dealings, he has that sound sense which inspires universal confidence. His nomination heals the dissensions which are always developed in a party long in power. His name is unhackneyed in the public mind with mere partisan contests or personal aspirations. It is worthily united with those of GRANT and COLFAX in the great struggle of which New York is to be the arena. It will be with them the rallying cry of all who believe that repudiation is "a crime against the national honor only surpassed by the crime of treason itself," as the resolution of the nominating Convention truly declares.

ELECTIONEERING IN THE SOUTH.

THE illustration upon page 468 is one of the most significant possible. It shows the newly-enfranchised citizens of the United States engaged in the discussion of political questions upon which they are to vote; and however crude the arguments of the orator may be, they can not be more so than those which may be heard every evening in the clubs of the "superior race" in the city of New York. The scene is wholly characteristic. The eager attention of the listeners, and the evidently glib tongue of the speaker, reveal that remarkable adaptability and readiness so observable in the colored race. They take naturally to peaceful and lawful forms; they are naturally eloquent; and instead of scoffing loftily at them as incompetent, their white brethren will find it necessary to bestir themselves, or the "incompetent" class will be the better educated and more successful. Does any man seriously doubt whether it is better for this vast population to be sinking deeper and deeper in ignorance and servility, or rising into general intelligence and self-respect? They can not be pariahs; they can not be peons; they must be slaves or citizens. The policy of enslaving them has produced such results as we have seen; and we are now to see that liberty is truly conservative, and that honesty is the best policy.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

A FATAL disaster occurred on the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad, near Union Mills, July 9, some fiends having thrown the express passenger train off the track in order to rob the passengers. Five persons, three ladies and two children, were killed and several persons were seriously injured. The baggage car was broken open and rifled.

Ex-Governor Orr, of South Carolina, has published an address to the people of the State urging them to accept Governor Scott's administration in a just spirit. It would have been wise for them, he says, to have accepted Congressional reconstruction at first, and at present it is folly to expect any relief from the Democratic party on the subject of suffrage.

FOREIGN NEWS.

AUSTRIA, "Catholic Austria," has snubbed the poor Pope most grievously. He lately issued an allocution, or proclamation, or bull, or curse, or something of that sort, denouncing the Austrian Reichsrath, or Imperial Council, for inaugurating measures giving greater religious freedom, and granting protection to all churches in the empire. Baron von Beust, the Prime Minister of Austria, is a good Protestant, and in response to the Pope's allocution he has written a note to his Holiness, in which he plainly tells him that he is meddlesome, and that his allocution is an insult to the independence and dignity of the empire.

The Pope's allocution is a curious document. He speaks of the law of December 21, 1867, as "an odious law," and thus describes it (we copy his own words):

"That law establishes free liberty for all opinions, liberty of the press, of all faith, and no matter what confession or doctrine. It grants to the members of every confession the right of establishing public schools and colleges, and members of every confession are allowed to be admitted on the same footing, with the sanction of the State. Although we felt great grief on being informed of the fact, and wished to raise our voice against it, we nevertheless gave proof of forbearance, and we deemed it advisable then to keep silent, chiefly supported by the hope that the Austrian Government, lending a docile ear to the just complaints of our venerable brethren (the holy prelates of Austria), would return to more wholesome ideas and adopt a sounder determination. But our hopes have been frustrated. In fact the same Government, on the 25th of May of the present year, issued another law, which involves all the subjects, even the Catholic ones of the empire, deciding that sons born of a mixed marriage shall follow the religion of the father and the daughter that of the mother, and that under seven years of age they must follow in the stray path of their parents from the true faith.

"By this law this same Government has also promulgated a law on education which suppresses all the influence of the Church over education, decreeing that the whole superior supervision of education, literature, and science, as also the inspection of schools, appertains to the State, which finally decrees that religious teaching in the public schools must be placed in the hands of members of each separate confession; that any religious society may open private or special schools for the youth of its faith; that these schools shall also be subject to the supreme inspection of the State, and that the school-books shall be submitted to the approval of the civil authorities, with the exception, however, of such books as are meant for religious instruction, books which must be submitted to the approval of the competent authorities of each confession."

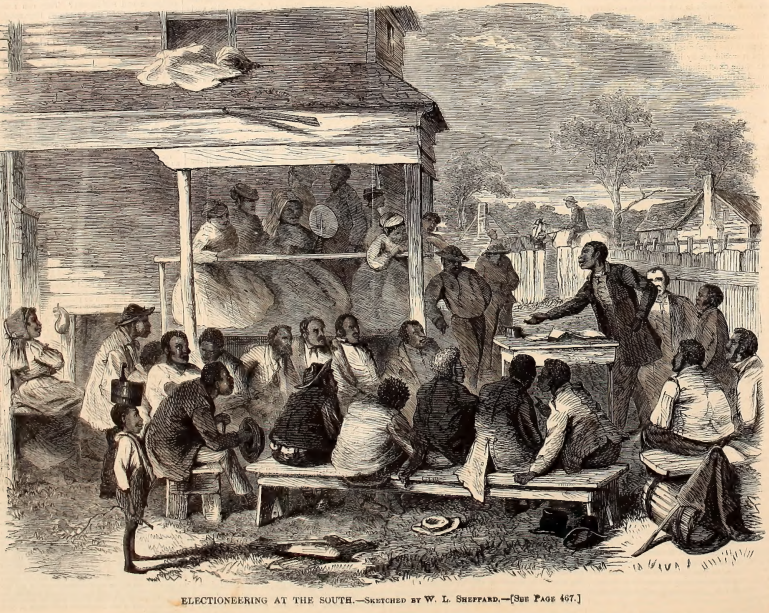
Civilization in any form appears to be very odious indeed to the Papacy.

THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES.

UPON the twenty-second ballot the New York Democratic Convention unanimously nominated HORATIO SEYMOUR for President. His name had been brought forward upon the fourth ballot, when he received 9 votes, and was then withdrawn on account of his refusal to accept the nomination. It seems to have been agreed upon between Governor SEYMOUR and his friends that his name should not be brought forward until the PENDLETON faction should declare a surrender. PENDLETON stood far ahead of all competitors on Tuesday. On Wednesday he steadily declined, being out-distanced by both HANCOCK and HENDRICKS, the former, upon the eighteenth ballot, receiving 144½ votes, and the latter, 87, while PENDLETON had declined to 56. If the balloting had continued HANCOCK would have undoubtedly been the choice of the Convention. On this account the PENDLETON and SEYMOUR men forced an adjournment; and when the Convention met again on Thursday, SEYMOUR'S nomination was a foregone conclusion. Before the balloting commenced, Mr. WILLIAM BIGHAM—who had given the finishing blow to the Democratic Platform of 1864 by the insertion of the resolution declaring the war a failure—rose, and in a few words settled the business of this Convention. He read a letter from Mr. PENDLETON, authorizing the withdrawal of his name whenever it should seem desirable. That time had now come. If the letter had been read on the previous afternoon—as it might have been—it would have given HANCOCK a decisive advantage. Presented at this time, it was the first step in the SEYMOUR intrigue. Upon the nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first ballot HANCOCK and HENDRICKS nearly divided the Convention. Then the time came for the second and final stage of the adroit intriguers. When Ohio was called, on the twenty-second ballot, Mr. M'COOK threw the 21 votes of that State for SEYMOUR. New York followed, then Wisconsin; and then all the other States changed their votes, and the nomination of SEYMOUR was unanimous.

Thus by the intrigue of SEYMOUR'S friends, to which he, while saying he would ne'er consent, consented, the three only available candidates —CHASE, HENDRICKS, and HANCOCK — were thrown overboard. The Convention united upon SEYMOUR; but he is the rock upon which the Democratic party will split in the election.

HORATIO SEYMOUR was born in Pompey, Onondaga County, New York, in 1811. He is descended from RICHARD SEYMOUR, one of the early settlers of Hartford, Connecticut, and is a nephew of Senator SEYMOUR, of Vermont. He was liberally educated, and adopted the legal profession. In the fall of 1841 he was elected to the Assembly, where he sat until 1845, when he was elected Speaker. In 1850 he was nominated for Governor against WASHINGTON HUNT, and was defeated by 262 votes. In the next gubernatorial contest he was elected. His principal official act was his veto of the Maine Liquor Law. In 1854 he was again nominated, but was defeated, though the opposition was divided up between three candidates. In 1862 he was again elected Governor, but was defeated by FENTON in 1864.



GEN. F. P. BLAIR, DEMOCRATIC NOMINEE FOR VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Mr. SEYMOUR has always been a Democrat. He has never held any official position outside of his own State, and even there he has in all elections fallen behind his ticket. The only national reputation which he has arises from his opposition to the war. No weaker candidate, not even excepting PENDLETON, could have been nominated by the Convention.

Nor is the nomination of FRANCIS P. BLAIR, JUN., for Vice-President, any more auspicious for the Democratic party. He was nominated for three reasons: 1st, because he was a soldier, and a war-man was necessary to balance SEYMOUR'S anti-war record; 2d, because he was a Western man; and 3d, because of his recent revolutionary letter to Mr. BROADHEAD. Sedition is the forte of the Democratic party. SEYMOUR raised a mob, and FRANK BLAIR threatens revolution. This is the Democratic platform.

FRANCIS P. BLAIR, JUN., was born at Lexington, Kentucky, February 19, 1821, was educated at Princeton College, New Jersey, and, removing to St. Louis, adopted the profession of the law. He entered upon political life as an advocate of emancipation. In 1848 he sustained VAN BUREN and the Free-Soil party, opposing the extension of slavery into the Territories, and advocating its abolition in Missouri. As an Abolitionist he was elected in 1852 to the Missouri Legislature, and was re-elected in 1854. In 1856 he was returned to Congress, where he remained till the outbreak of the rebellion. He had been in the Mexican War, and in 1861 entered the Union Army as a Colonel of Volunteers, being soon after appointed Brigadier-General. In May, 1863, he commanded a division of M'PHERSON'S Corps, and was before the close of the year appointed Major-General, when he resigned his seat in the Thirty-eighth Congress. When M'PHERSON in 1864 was made commander of the Army of the Tennessee, he was succeeded by General BLAIR in the command of his corps. This command he held until the close of the war, attending SHERMAN in his marches from Atlanta to Goldsborough. He was a brave soldier, although he now seems to be sorry on that account, and willing to surrender the results of the national victory. In 1866 he was appointed by President JOHNSON Collector of the Port of St. Louis. His political record is marked with the inconsistency which has characterized the whole BLAIR family, and he is now a nominee of the party which steadily reviled him throughout the war.

Such are the Democratic candidates; and if any thing were necessary to secure the election of GRANT and COLFAX next November, their nomination has supplied it.

ELECTIONEERING AT THE SOUTH.—SKETCHED BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE PAGE 467.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

The Journal of Ezra Jennings (Concluded.)

THE first and foremost question, is the question of Mr. Blake's health.

So far as it is possible for me to judge, he promises (physically speaking) to be quite as susceptible to the action of the opium to-night as he was at this time last year. He is, this afternoon, in a state of nervous sensitiveness which just stops short of nervous irritation. He changes color readily; his hand is not quite steady; and he starts at chance noises, and at unexpected appearances of persons and things.

These results have all been produced by deprivation of sleep, which is in its turn the nervous consequence of a sudden cessation in the habit of smoking, after that habit has been carried to an extreme. Here are the same causes at work again, which operated last year; and here are, apparently, the same effects. Will the parallel still hold good, when the final test has been tried? The events of the night must decide.

While I write these lines, Mr. Blake is amusing himself at the billiard-table in the inner hall, practicing different strokes in the game, as he was accustomed to practice them when he was a constant visitor at this house in June last. I have brought my journal here, partly with a view to occupying the idle hours which I am sure to have on my hands between this and to-morrow morning—partly in the hope that something may happen which it may be worth my while to place on record at the time.

Have I omitted any thing, thus far? A glance at yesterday's entry shows me that I have forgotten to note the arrival of the morning's post. Let me set this right, before I close these leaves for the present and join Mr. Blake.

I received a few lines then, yesterday, from Miss Verinder. She has arranged to travel by the afternoon train, as I recommended. Mrs. Merridew has insisted on accompanying her. The note hints that the old lady's generally excellent temper is a little ruffled, and requests all due indulgence for her, in consideration of her age and her habits. I will endeavor, in my relations with Mrs. Merridew, to emulate the moderation which Betteredge displays in his relations with me. He received us to-day, portentously arrayed in his best black suit, and his stiffest white cravat. Whenever he looks my way, he remembers that I have not read Robinson Crusoe since I was a child, and he respectfully pities me.

Yesterday, also, Mr. Blake had the lawyer's answer. Mr. Bruff accepts the invitation—under protest. It is, he thinks, clearly necessary that a gentleman possessed of the average allowance of common-sense, should accompany Miss Verinder to the scene of, what he will venture to call, the proposed exhibition. For want of a better escort, Mr. Bruff himself will be that gentleman.—So here is poor Miss Verinder provided with two "chaperons. It is a relief to think that the opinion of the world must surely be satisfied with this!

Nothing has been heard of Sergeant Cuff. He is no doubt still in Ireland. We must not expect to see him to-night.

Betteredge has just come in, to say that Mr. Blake has asked for me. I must lay down my pen for the present.

* * * * *

Seven o'clock.—We have been all over the refurnished rooms and staircases again; and we have had a pleasant stroll in the shrubbery which was Mr. Blake's favorite walk when he was here last. In this way, I hope to revive the old impressions of places and things as vividly as possible in his mind.

We are now going to dine, exactly at the hour at which the birthday dinner was given last year.

My object, of course, is a purely medical one in this case. The laudanum must find the process of digestion, as nearly as may be, where the laudanum found it last year.

At a reasonable time after dinner, I propose to lead the conversation back again—as inartificially as I can—to the subject of the Diamond, and of the Indian conspiracy to steal it. When I have filled his mind with these topics, I shall have done all that it is in my power to do, before the time comes for giving him the second dose.

* * * * *

Half past eight.—I have only this moment found an opportunity of attending to the most important duty of all; the duty of looking in the family medicine-chest, for the laudanum which Mr. Candy used last year.

Ten minces I caught Betteredge at the unoccupied moment, and told him what I wanted. Without a word of objection, without so much as an attempt to produce his pocket-book, he led the way (making allowances for me at every step) to the store-room in which the medicine-chest was kept.

I found the bottle, carefully guarded by a glass stopper tied over with leather. The preparation of opium which it contained was, as I had anticipated, the common Tincture of laudanum. Finding the bottle still well filled, I have resolved to use it in preference to employing either of the two preparations with which I had taken care to provide myself, in case of emergency.

The question of the proportion which I am to administer presents certain difficulties. I have thought it over, and have decided on increasing the dose.

My notes inform me that Mr. Candy only administered twenty-five minims. This is a small dose to have produced the results which followed—even in the case of a person so sensitive as Mr. Blake. I think it highly probable that Mr. Candy may have unconsciously underdosed for the given—knowing, as I do, that he has a keen relish of the pleasures of the table, and that he measured out the laudanum on the birthday, after dinner. In any case, I shall run the risk of enlarging the dose to forty minims. On this occasion Mr. Blake knows beforehand that he is going to take the laudanum—which is equivalent, physiologically speaking, to his having (unconsciously) a certain latent capacity in him to resist the effects. If my view is right a larger quantity is therefore imperatively required this time to repeat the results which the smaller quantity produced last year.

* * * * *

Ten o'clock.—The witnesses, or the company (which shall I call them?), reached the house an hour since.

A little before nine o'clock I prevailed on Mr. Blake to accompany me to his bedroom; stating as a reason, that I wished him to look round it, for the last time, in order to make quite sure that nothing had been forgotten in the refurnishing of the room. I had previously arranged with Betteredge that the bedchamber prepared for Mr. Bruff should be the next room to Mr. Blake's, and that I should be informed of the lawyer's arrival by a knock at the door. Five minutes after the clock in the hall had struck nine I heard the knock; and, getting out immediately, met Mr. Bruff in the corridor.

My personal appearance (as usual) told against me. Mr. Bruff's distrust looked at me plainly enough out of Mr. Bruff's eyes. Being well used to producing this effect on strangers I did not hesitate a moment in saying what I wanted to say before the lawyer found his way into Mr. Blake's room.

"You have traveled here, I believe, in company with Mrs. Merridew and Miss Verinder?" I said.

"Yes," answered Mr. Bruff, as dryly as might be.

"Miss Verinder has probably told you that I wish her presence in the house (and Mrs. Merridew's presence of course) to be kept a secret from Mr. Blake until my experiment on him has been put first?"

"I know that I am to hold my tongue, Sir!" said Mr. Bruff, impatiently. "Being habitually silent on the subject of human folly, I am all the readier to keep my lips closed on this occasion. Does that satisfy you?"

I bowed, and left Betteredge to show him to his room. Betteredge gave me one look at parting which said, as if in so many words, "You have caught a Tartar, Mr. Jennings—and the name of him is Bruff."

It was next necessary to get the evening over with the two ladies. I descended the stairs—little nervously, I confess—on my way to Miss Verinder's sitting-room.

The gardener's wife (charged with looking after the accommodation of the ladies) met me on the first-floor corridor. This excellent woman treats me with an excessive civility which is plainly the offspring of downright terror. She curtsies whenever I speak to her, and never looks to her. On my asking for Miss Verinder she stared, trembled, and would no doubt have courtesied next, if Miss Verinder herself had not cut that ceremony short by suddenly opening her sitting-room door.

"Is that Mr. Jennings?" she asked.

Before I could answer she came out eagerly to speak to me in the corridor. We met under the light of a lamp on a bracket. At the first sight of me Miss Verinder stopped and hesitated. She recovered herself instantly, colored for a moment, and then, with a charming frankness, offered me her hand.

"I can't treat you like a stranger, Mr. Jennings," she said. "Oh, if you only knew how happy your letters have made me!"

She looked at my ugly wrinkled face with a bright gratitude so new to me in my experience of my fellow-creatures that I was at a loss how to answer her. Nothing had prepared me for her kindness and her beauty. The misery of many years has not hardened my heart, thank God. I was as awkward and as shy with her as if I had been a lad in my teens.

"Where is he now?" she asked, giving free expression to her one dominant interest—the interest in Mr. Blake. "What is he doing? Has he spoken of me? Is he in good spirits? How does he bear the sight of the house after what happened on it last year? When are you going to give him the laudanum? May I see you pour it out? I am so interested; I am so excited—I have ten thousand things to say to you, and they all crowd together so that I don't know what to say first. Do you wonder at the interest I take in this?"

"No," I said, "I venture to think that I thoroughly understand it."

She was far above the paltry affectation of being confused. She answered me as she might have answered a brother or a father.

"You have relieved me of unbearable wretchedness: you have given me a new life. How can I be ungrateful enough to have any concealments from you?" I love him," she said, simply: "I have loved him from first to last—even when I was wronging him in my own thoughts; even when I was saying the harshest and the cruelest words to him. Is there any excuse for me in that? I hope there is—I am afraid it is the only excuse I have. When tomorrow comes, and he knows that I am in the house, do you think—?"

She stopped again, and looked at me very earnestly.

"When to-morrow comes," I said, "I think you have only to tell him what you have just told me."

Her face brightened; she came a step nearer to me. Her fingers trifled nervously with a flower which I had picked in the garden, and which I had put into the button-hole of my coat.

"You have seen a great deal of him lately," she said. "Have you really and truly seen that?"

"Really and truly," I answered. "I am quite certain of what will happen to-morrow. I wish I could feel as certain of what will happen to-night."

At that point in the conversation we were interrupted by the appearance of Betteredge with the tea-tray. He gave me another significant look as he passed on into the sitting-room. "Ay! ay! make your hay while the sun shines. The Tartar's up stairs, Mr. Jennings—the Tartar's up stairs!"

We followed him into the room. A little old lady, in a corner, very nicely dressed, and very deeply absorbed over a smart piece of embroidery, dropped her work in her lap, and uttered a faint little scream at the first sight of my pigeon complexion and my piebald hair.

"LET ME POUR OUT THE WATER," SHE WHISPERED.

"Mrs. Merridew," said Miss Verinder, "this is Mr. Jennings."

"I beg Mr. Jennings's pardon," said the old lady, looking at Miss Verinder, and speaking at me. "Railway traveling always makes me nervous. I am endeavoring to quiet my mind by occupying myself as usual. I don't know whether my embroidery is out of place, on this extraordinary occasion. If it interferes with Mr. Jennings's medical views, I shall be happy to put it away of course."

I hastened to sanction the presence of the embroidery, exactly as I had sanctioned the absence of the burst buzzard and the Cupid's wing. Mrs. Merridew made an effort—a grateful effort—to look at my hair. No! it was not to be done. Mrs. Merridew looked back again at Miss Verinder.

"If Mr. Jennings will permit me," pursued the old lady, "I should like to ask a favor. Mr. Jennings is about to try a scientific experiment to-night. I used to attend scientific experiments when I was a girl at school. They invariably ended in an explosion. If Mr. Jennings will be so very kind, I should like to be warned of the explosion this time. With a view to getting it over, if possible, before I go to bed."

I attempted to assure Mrs. Merridew that an explosion was not included in the programme on this occasion.

"No," said the old lady. "I am much obliged to Mr. Jennings—I am aware that he is only deceiving me for my own good. I prefer plain dealing. I am quite resigned to the explosion—but I do want to get it over, if possible, before I go to bed."

Here the door opened, and Mrs. Merridew uttered another little scream. The advent of the explosion? No: only the advent of Betteredge.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Jennings," said Betteredge, in his most elaborately confidential manner. "Mr. Franklin wishes to know where you are. Being under your orders to deceive him, in respect to the presence of my young lady in the house, I have said I don't know. That you will please to observe was a lie. Having one foot already in the grave, Sir, the fewer lies you expect me to tell the more I shall be indebted to you, when my conscience pricks me and my time comes."

There was not a moment to be wasted on the purely speculative question of Betteredge's conscience. Mr. Blake might make his appearance in search of me, unless I went to him at once in his own room. Miss Verinder followed me out into the corridor.

"They seem to be in a conspiracy to persecute you," she said. "What shall I make it?"

"Only the protest of the world, Miss Verinder—on a very small scale—against any thing that is new."

"What are we to do with Mrs. Merridew?"

"Mrs. Merridew," said Miss Verinder, "this is Mr. Jennings."

"I beg Mr. Jennings's pardon," said the old lady, looking at Miss Verinder, and speaking at me. "Railway traveling always makes me nervous. I am endeavoring to quiet my mind by occupying myself as usual. I don't know whether my embroidery is out of place, on this extraordinary occasion. If it interferes with Mr. Jennings's medical views, I shall be happy to put it away of course."

I hastened to sanction the presence of the embroidery, exactly as I had sanctioned the absence of the burst buzzard and the Cupid's wing. Mrs. Merridew made an effort—a grateful effort—to look at my hair. No! it was not to be done. Mrs. Merridew looked back again at Miss Verinder.

"If Mr. Jennings will permit me," pursued the old lady, "I should like to ask a favor. Mr. Jennings is about to try a scientific experiment to-night. I used to attend scientific experiments when I was a girl at school. They invariably ended in an explosion. If Mr. Jennings will be so very kind, I should like to be warned of the explosion this time. With a view to getting it over, if possible, before I go to bed."

I attempted to assure Mrs. Merridew that an explosion was not included in the programme on this occasion.

"No," said the old lady. "I am much obliged to Mr. Jennings—I am aware that he is only deceiving me for my own good. I prefer plain dealing. I am quite resigned to the explosion—but I do want to get it over, if possible, before I go to bed."

Here the door opened, and Mrs. Merridew uttered another little scream. The advent of the explosion? No: only the advent of Betteredge.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Jennings," said Betteredge, in his most elaborately confidential manner. "Mr. Franklin wishes to know where you are. Being under your orders to deceive him, in respect to the presence of my young lady in the house, I have said I don't know. That you will please to observe was a lie. Having one foot already in the grave, Sir, the fewer lies you expect me to tell the more I shall be indebted to you, when my conscience pricks me and my time comes."

There was not a moment to be wasted on the purely speculative question of Betteredge's conscience. Mr. Blake might make his appearance in search of me, unless I went to him at once in his own room. Miss Verinder followed me out into the corridor.

"They seem to be in a conspiracy to persecute you," she said. "What shall I make it?"

"Only the protest of the world, Miss Verinder—on a very small scale—against any thing that is new."

"What are we to do with Mrs. Merridew?"

"Tell her the explosion will take place at nine to-morrow morning."

"So as to send her to bed?"

"Yes—so as to send her to bed."

Miss Verinder went back to the sitting-room, and I went up stairs to Mr. Blake.

To my surprise, I found him alone; restlessly pacing his room, and a little irritated at being left by himself.

"Where is Mr. Bruff?" I asked.

He pointed to the closed door of communication between the two rooms. Mr. Bruff had locked in on him, for a moment, that attempted to renew his protest against our proceedings; and had once more failed to produce the smallest impression on Mr. Blake. Upon this, he had taken refuge in a black leather bag, filled to bursting with professional papers. "The serious business of life," he admitted, "was safe by out of place on such an occasion as the present. But the serious business of life must be carried on for all that. Mr. Blake would perhaps kindly make allowance for the old-fashioned habits of a practical man. Time was money—and, as for Mr. Jennings, he might depend on it that Mr. Bruff would be forthcoming when called upon. With that apology the lawyer had gone back to his own room, and had immersed himself obstinately in his black bag.

I thought of Mrs. Merrider and her emboldery, and of Betteredge and his conscience. There is a wonderful sameness in the solid side of the English character—just as there is a wonderful sameness in the solid expression of the English face.

"When are you going to give me the laudanum?" said Mr. Blake, impatiently.

"You must wait a little longer," I said. "I will stay and keep you company till the time comes."

It was not then ten o'clock. Inquiries which I had made, at various times, of Betteredge and Mr. Blake, had led me to the conclusion that the dose of laudanum given by Mr. Candy could not possibly have been administered before eleven. I had accordingly determined not to try the second dose until that time.

We talked a little; but both our minds were preoccupied by the coming ordeal. The conversation soon flagged—then dropped altogether. Mr. Blake shortly turned over the pages in the bookroom table. I had taken the precaution of looking at them, when we first entered the room. The Guardian—The Tatler—Richardson's Pamela; Mackenzie's Man of Feeling; Rosoe's Lorenzo de' Medici; and Robertson's Charles the Fifth—with a classical work or two, of the immeasurably superior to any thing produced in later times; and all (from my present point of view) possessing the one great merit of not including nobody's interest, and exciting nobody's brain. I left Mr. Blake to the composing influence of fictitious Literature, and busied myself in making this entry in my journal.

My watch informs me that it is close on eleven o'clock. I must shut up these leaves once more.

* * * * *

Two o'clock A.M.—The experiment has been tried. With what result I am now to describe.

At eleven o'clock I rang the bell for the last edge, and left Mr. Blake that he might at last prepare himself for bed.

I looked out of window at the night. It was mild and rainy, resembling, in this respect, the night of the birthday—the twenty-first of June, last year. Without professing to believe in omens, it was at least encouraging to find no direct nervous influences—no stormy or electric perturbations—in the atmosphere. Betteredge joined me at the window, and mysteriously put a little slip of paper into my hand. It contained these lines:

"Mrs. Merridew has gone to bed, on the distinct understanding that the explosion is to take place at nine to-morrow morning, and that I am not to stir out of this part of the house until she comes and sets me free. She has no idea that the chief object of the experiment is getting rid, somehow or other, of the mischief which I have brought into my hand. It contained these lines:

"Mrs. Merridew has gone to bed, on the distinct understanding that the explosion is to take place at nine to-morrow morning, and that I am not to stir out of this part of the house until she comes and sets me free. She has no idea that the chief object of the experiment is getting rid, somehow or other, of the mischief which I have brought into my hand. It contained these lines:

I followed Betteredge out of the room, and told him to remove the medicine-chest into Miss Verinder's sitting-room.

The order appeared to take him completely by surprise. He looked as if he suspected me of some cruel medical design on Miss Verinder! "Might I presume to ask," he said, "what my young lady and the medicine-chest have got to do with each other?"

"Stay in the sitting-room, and you will see."

Betteredge appeared to doubt his own unaided capacity to superintend me effectually on the occasion when a medicine-chest was included in the proceedings.

"Is there any objection, Sir," he asked, "to taking Mr. Bruff into this part of the business?"

"Quite the contrary! I am now going to ask Mr. Bruff to accompany me downstairs."

Betteredge withdrew to fetch the medicine-chest without another word. I went back into Mr. Blake's room, and knocked at the door of communication. Mr. Bruff opened it, with his papers in his hands—immersed in Law, impenetrable to Medicine.

"I am sorry to disturb you," I said. "But I am going to prepare the laudanum for Mr. Blake; and I must request you to be present, and to see what I do."

"Yes?" said Mr. Bruff, with nine-tenths of his attention riveted on his papers, and with one-tenth unwillingly accorded to me. "Any thing else?"

"I must trouble you to return here with me, and to see me administer the dose."

"Any thing else?"

"One thing more. I must put you to the inconvenience of remaining in Mr. Blake's room, and of waiting to see what happens."

"Oh, very good!" said Mr. Bruff. "My room or Mr. Blake's room—it doesn't matter which; I can go on with my papers any where. Unless you object, Mr. Jennings, to my importing that amount of common sense into the proceedings?"

Before I could answer Mr. Blake addressed himself to the lawyer, speaking from his bed.

"Do you really mean to say that you don't feel any interest in what you are going to do?" he asked. "Mr. Bruff you have no more imagination than a cow!"

"A cow is a very useful animal, Mr. Blake," said the lawyer. With that reply he followed me out of the room, still keeping his papers in his hands.

We found Miss Verinder, pale and agitated, restlessly pacing her sitting-room; and trying to end. At a table in a corner stood Betteredge, on guard over the medicine-chest. Mr. Bruff sat down on the first chair that he could find, and (emulating the usefulness of the cow) plunged back again into his papers on the spot.

Miss Verinder drew me aside, and reverted instantly to her one all-absorbing interest—the interest in Mr. Blake.

"How is he now?" she asked. "Is he nervous? is he out of temper? Do you think it will succeed? Are you sure it will do no harm?"

"Quite sure. Come and see me measure it out."

"One moment! It is past ten o'clock. How long will it be before any thing happens?"

"It is not easy to say. An hour perhaps."

"I suppose the room must be dark, as it was last year?"

"Certainly."

"In his interests I will endure—just as I did before. I shall wait in my bedroom—just as I did. It was a little way open last year. I will watch the sitting-room door: and the moment it moves I will flare out my light. I shall respond in that way on my birthday night. And it must all happen again in the same way, mustn't it?"

"Are you sure you can control yourself, Miss Verinder?"

"In his interests I can endure any thing!" she answered, fervently.

One look at her face told me that I could trust her. I addressed myself again to Mr. Bruff.

"I must trouble you to put your papers aside for a moment," I said.

"Oh, certainly!" He got up with a start—as if I had disturbed him at a particularly interesting place—and followed me to the medicine-chest. There, deprived of the heedless excitement incidental to the practice of his profession, he looked at Betteredge, and yawned assiduously.

Miss Verinder joined us. I took the key of cold water, which she had taken from a sideside. "Let me pour out the water," she whispered. "I want to have a hand in it."

I measured out the forty minims from the bottle, and poured the laudanum into a medicine-glass. "Fill it till it is full," I said, and handed the glass to Miss Verinder. I then directed Betteredge to lock up the medicine-chest; informing him where he was to give it to me. A look of unutterable relief overspread the old servant's countenance. He had evidently suspected me of a medical design on his young lady!

After adding the water as I had directed, Miss Verinder seized a moment when Betteredge was locking the chest, and while Mr. Bruff was looking back at his papers—and slily kissed the rim of the medicine-glass. "Drink it up, give it to him," whispered the charming girl, "give it to him on that side!"

I took the piece of crystal which was to represent the Diamond from my pocket and gave it to her.

"You must have a hand in this, too," I said. "You must put it where you put the Moonstone last year."

She led the way to the Indian cabinet, and put the mock Diamond into the drawer which the real Diamond occupied on the birthday night. Mr. Bruff looked on, unmoved, under protest, as he had witnessed every thing else. But the strong dramatic interest which the experiment was now exciting (in spite of my good amusement) to be too much for Betteredge's capacity of self-restraint. His hand trembled as he held the candle, which I had previously lighted. "Are you sure, Miss, it's the right drawer?"

I led the way out again, with the laudanum and water in my hand. At the door I stopped to address a last word to Miss Verinder.

"Don't be long in putting out the lights," I said.

"I will put them out at once," she answered. "And I will wait in my bedroom, with only one candle alight."

She closed the sitting-room door behind us. Followed by Mr. Bruff and Betteredge, I went back to Mr. Blake's room.

We found him moving restlessly from side to side of the bed, and wondering irritably whether he was to have the laudanum or not. On the presence of the two witnesses I gave him the dose, and shook up his pillows, and told him to lie down again quiet and easy.

His bed, provided with light chintz curtains, was placed, with the head against the wall of the room, so as to leave a good open space on either side of it. On one side I drew the curtains completely—and in the part of the room thus screened from his view I placed Mr. Bruff and Betteredge to wait for the result. At the bottom of the bed I half drew the curtains—and placed my own chair at a little distance, so that I might let him see me or not see me, speak to me or not speak to me, just as the circumstances might direct. Having already been informed that he always slept with a light in the room I placed one of the two lighted candles on a little table at the head of the bed, where the glare of the light would not strike on his eyes. The other candle I gave to Mr. Bruff; the light, in this instance, being subdued by the screen of the chintz curtains. The window was open at the top so as to ventilate the room. The rain fell softly, the house was quiet. It was twenty minutes past eleven. By my watch, when the preparations were completed, and I took my place on the chair set apart at the bottom of the bed.

Mr. Bruff looked at his papers, with every appearance of being as deeply interested in them as ever. But looking toward him now, I saw that certain signs and tokens which told me that the Law was beginning to lose its hold on him at last. The suspended interest of the situation in which we were now placed was slowly asserting its influence even on his unimaginative mind. As for Betteredge—consistency of principle and dignity of character had become, in his case, mere empty words. He forgot that I was performing a conjuring trick on Mr. Franklin Blake; he forgot that I had upset the house from top to bottom; he forgot that I had not read Robinson Crusoe since I was a boy. "Do you think it will take, Sir," he whispered to me, "tell us when it will begin to work."

"Not before midnight," I whispered back. "Say nothing and sit still."

Betteredge dropped to the lowest depth of familiarity with his master—and struggle to save himself. He answered me by a wink!

Looking next toward Mr. Blake I found him in a restless state of mind. I fearfully wondered why the influence of the laudanum had not begun to assert itself yet. To tell him, in his present humour, that he must be neglected and wondered the longer he would delay the result for which we were now waiting would have been simply adding fuel to the flame. The one way to dismiss the idea of the opium from his mind by leading him insensibly to think of something else.

With this view I encouraged him to talk to me, contriving so to direct the conversation, on my side, as to lead him again to the subject which had engaged us earlier in the evening—the subject of the Diamond. I took care to revert to him as the person who was in charge of the Moonstone which related to the transport of it from London to Yorkshire; to the risk which Mr. Blake had run in bringing it from the bank at Frizinghall; and to the unexpected appearance of the Indians at the house on the evening of the birthday. I purposely neglected, in referring to these events, to have misunderstood much of what Mr. Blake himself had told me a few hours since. By doing so, I set him thinking on the subject with which it was now vitally important to fill his mind—without allowing him to suspect that I was leading him to that purpose. Little by little he became so interested in putting me right that he forgot to fidget in the bed. His mind was now under the exclusive influence of opium at the all-important time when his eyes first told me that the opium was beginning to lay its hold on his brain.

I looked at my watch. It wanted five minutes to twelve when the premonitory symptoms of the working of the laudanum first showed themselves to me.

At this time no unprejudiced eye would have detected any change in Mr. Blake. But, as the minutes of the new morning wore away, the swiftly-subside progress of the influence began to show itself more plainly. The sublime indifference of opium gleamed in his eyes; the dew of a stealthy perspiration began to glisten on his face. In five minutes more the change had become one that no one failed in coherence. He held steadily to the subject of the Diamond; but he ceased to complete his sentences. A little after he ceased to drop the sentences. Then there was an interval of silence. Then he sat up in bed. Then, still kept under the influence of the Diamond, he began to talk again—not to me, but to himself. That change told me that the first stage in the experiment was reached. The stimulant influence of the opium had got him.

The time, now, was twenty-three minutes past twelve. There was half an hour, at most, which I could decide the question of whether he would, or would not, get up from his bed, and leave the room.

In the breathless interest of watching him—in the unutterable triumph of seeing the first result of the experiment declare itself in the manner, and near the time, which I had anticipated—I had utterly forgotten the two companions of my night vigil. Looking toward them now, I saw the face of Mr. Bruff (over his papers) lying unheeded on the floor. Mr. Bruff himself was looking eagerly through a crevice left in the closed drawn curtains of the bed. And Betteredge, oblivious of all respect for social distinctions, was peeping over Mr. Bruff's shoulder.

They both started back, on finding that I was looking at them, like two boys caught out by their schoolmaster in a fault. I signed to them to take off their boots quietly, as I was taking off mine. If Mr. Blake gave us the chance of following him, it was vitally necessary to follow him without noise.

Ten minutes passed—and nothing happened. Then, he drew his right leg out of bed. Then left. He put one leg out of bed. He waited.

I wish I had never taken it out of the bank," he said to himself. "It was safe in the bank."

My heart throbbed fast; the pulses at my temples beat furiously. The doubt about the safety of the Diamond was, once more, the dominant impression in his brain! On that one pivot the whole success of the experiment turned. The prospect thus suddenly opened before me, was too much for my nervous nerves. I was obliged to look away from him—or I should have lost my self-control.

There was another interval of silence.

When I could trust myself to look back at him he was out of his bed, standing erect at the side of it. The pupils of his eyes were now contracted: his whole face gleamed in the light of the candle as he moved his head slowly to and fro. He was thinking; he was doubting—he spoke again.

"How do I know?" he said. "The Indians may be hidden in the house."

He stopped, and walked slowly to the other end of the room. He turned—waited—came back to the bed.

"It's not even locked up," he went on. "It's in the drawer of her cabinet. And the drawer doesn't lock."

He sat down on the side of the bed. "Any body might get at it," he said.

He rose again restlessly, and reiterated his first words.

"How do I know? The Indians may be hidden in the house."

He waited again. I drew back behind the half-drawn curtain of the bed. He looked at the room, with the vacant glitter in his eyes. It was a breathless moment. There was a pause of three sort. A pause in the action of the opium? a pause in the action of the brain? Who could tell? Every thing depended, now, on what he did next.

He laid himself down again on the bed!

A horrible doubt crossed my mind. Was it possible that the sedative action of the opium was making itself felt already? It was not in my experience that it should do this. But what is experience in such a question as this? How are we probably no two men in existence on whom the drug acts in exactly the same manner. Was some constitutional peculiarity in him, delaying the influence in some new way? Were we to fail on the very brink of success?

He rose again abruptly. "How the devil am I to sleep," he said, "with this on my mind?"

He looked at the light, burning on the table at the head of his bed. After a moment he took the candle in his hand.

I blew out the second candle, burning behind the closed curtains. I drew back, with Mr. Bruff and Betteredge, into the farthest corner by the door. We agreed to them to be silent, as if their lives had depended on it.

We waited—seeing and hearing nothing. We waited, hidden from him by the curtains.

The light which he was holding on the other side of us moved suddenly. The next moment he was up, swift and noiseless, with the candle in his hand.

He opened the bedroom door and went out. We followed him down the corridor. We followed him down the stairs. We followed him along the second corridor. He never looked behind him.

He opened the sitting-room door, and went in, leaving it open behind him.

We waited, hearing (in all the other doors in the house) on large old-fashioned hinges. When it was opened, a crevice was opened between the door and the post on which it hung. I signed my companions to look through this, so as to keep the door shut. I placed myself—outside the door also—to watch him. A recess in the wall was at my left hand, in which I could instantly hide myself if he showed any sign of looking back into the corridor.

He advanced to the middle of the room, with the candle still in his hand: he looked about him—and he began to undress himself.

I saw the door of Miss Verinder's bedroom standing ajar. She had put out her light. She listened herself intently. I could hear the outline of her summer dress was all that I could see. Nobody who had not known it beforehand would have suspected that there was a living creature in the room. She kept back in the dark; not a word, not a movement escaped her.

He was now five minutes past one. I heard, through the dead silence, the soft drip of the rain, and the tremulous passage of the night air through the trees.

After waiting irresolute for a minute or more in the middle of the room, he moved to the corner near the window, where the Indian cabinet stood.

He put his candle on the top of the cabinet. He opened and shut the drawers after another, until he came to the drawer in which the mock Diamond was put. He looked into the drawer for a moment. Then he took the Diamond out with his right hand. With the other hand he took the candle from the top of the cabinet.

He walked back with both of them to the middle of the room, and stood still again.

Thus far he had exactly repeated what he had done on the birthday night. Would his next proceeding be the same as the proceeding of last year? Would he leave the room? Would he go back now, as he believed he had gone back then, to his bedchamber? Would he show us what he had done with the Diamond when he had returned to his own room?

His first action, when he moved once more, proved to be an action which he had not performed on the occasion to which the influence of the opium for the first time. He put the candle down on a table, and wandered slowly forward the farther end of the room. There was a sofa here. He leaned heavily on the back of it with his left hand—then moved round it—then reversed to the middle of the room. I could now see his eyes. They were getting dull and heavy; the glitter in them was fast dying out.

The suspense of the moment proved too much for Miss Verinder's self-control. She advanced a few steps—then stopped again. Mr. Bruff and Betteredge looked across the open doorway at me for the first time. The provision of a convincing disappointment was impressing itself on their minds as well as on mine.

Still, so long as he stood where he was, there was hope. We waited, in unutterable expectation, to see what would happen next.

The next event was decisive. He let the mock Diamond drop out of his hand.

It fell on the floor, before the doorway—plainly visible to him and to every one. He made no effort to pick it up: he looked down at it vacantly, and, as he looked, his head sank on his breast. He staggered—roused himself for an instant—walked back unsteadily to the sofa—and sat down on it. He made a last effort; he tried to rise, and sank back. His head fell on the sofa cushions. It was then twenty-five minutes past one o'clock. Before I had put my watch back in my pocket he was asleep.

It was all over now. The sedative influence had got him; the experiment was at an end.

I entered the room, telling Mr. Bruff and Betteredge that they might follow me. There was no fear of disturbing him. We were free to move and speak.

"The first thing to settle," I said, "is the question of what we are to do with him. He will probably sleep for the next six or seven hours at least. It is some distance to carry him back to his own room. When I was younger I could have done it alone. But my health and strength are not what they were—I am afraid I must ask you to help me."

Before they could answer Miss Verinder called to me softly. She met me at the door of her room with a light shawl and with the counterpane from her own bed.

"Do you mean to watch him while he sleeps?" she asked.

"Yes. I am not sure enough of the action of the opium, in his case, to be willing to leave him alone."

She handed me the shawl and the counterpane.

"Why should you disturb him?" she whispered. "Make his bed on the sofa. I can shut my door and keep in my room."

It was infinitely the simplest and the safest way of disposing of him for the night. I mentioned the suggestion to Mr. Bruff and Betteredge, who both approved of my adopting it. In five minutes I had laid him comfortably on the sofa, and had covered him lightly with the counterpane and the shawl. Miss Verinder wished us good-night, and closed the door. At my request we three then drew round the table in the middle of the room, on which the candle was still burning, and on which writing materials were placed.

"Before we separate," I began, "I have a word to say about the experiment which has been tried to-night. Two distinct objects were to be gained by it. The first of these objects was to prove that Mr. Blake entered this room and took the Diamond last year, acting unconsciously and irresponsibly, under the influence of opium. After what you have both seen, are you both satisfied so far?"

They answered me in the affirmative, without a moment's hesitation.

"The second object," I went on, "was to discover what he did with the Diamond after he was seen by Miss Verinder to leave her sitting-room with the jewel in his hand on the birthday night. The gaining of this object depended, of course, on his still continuing exactly to repeat his proceedings of last year. He has failed to do that; and the purpose of the experiment is defeated accordingly. I can't assert that I am not disappointed at the result—but I can honestly say that I am not surprised by it. I told Mr. Blake from the first that our complete success in this matter depended on our completely reproducing in him the physical and moral conditions of last year; and I warned him that this was the next thing to a downright impossibility. We have only partially reproduced the conditions, and the experiment has been only partially successful in consequence. It is also possible that I may have administered too large a dose of laudanum. But I myself look upon the first reason that I have given as the true reason why we have to lament a failure, as well as to rejoice over a success."

After saying those words I put the writing materials before Mr. Bruff, and asked him if he had any objection—before we separated for the night—to draw out, and sign, a plain statement of what he had seen. He at once took the pen, and produced the statement with the fluent readiness of a practiced hand.

"I owe you this," he said, signing the paper, "as some atonement for what passed between us earlier in the evening. I beg your pardon, Mr. Jennings, for having doubted you. You have done Franklin Blake an inestimable service. In our legal phrase, you have paved your case."

Betteredge's apology was characteristic of the man.

"Mr. Jennings," he said, "when you read Robinson Crusoe again (which I strongly recommend you to do), you will find that he never scruples to acknowledge it when he turns out to have been in the wrong. Please to consider me, Sir, as doing what Robinson Crusoe did on the present occasion." With those words he signed the paper in his turn.

Mr. Bruff took me aside as we rose from the table.

"One word about the Diamond," he said. "Your theory is, that Franklin Blake hid the Moonstone in his room. My theory is, that the Moonstone is in the possession of Mr. Luker's bankers in London. We won't dispute which of us is right. We will only ask, which of us is in a position to put his theory to the test first?"

"The test, in my case," I answered, "has been tried to-night, and has failed."

"The test, in my case," rejoined Mr. Bruff, "is still in process of trial. For the last two days I have had a watch set for Mr. Luker at the bank; and I shall cause that watch to be continued until the last day of the month. I know that he must take the Diamond himself out of his bankers' hands—and I am acting on the chance that the person who has pledged the Diamond may force him to do this by redeeming the pledge. In that case I may be able to lay my hand on the person. And there is a prospect of our clearing up the mystery, exactly at the point where the mystery baffles us now! Do you admit that, so far?"

I admitted it readily.

"I am going back to town by the ten o'clock train," pursued the lawyer. "I may hear, when I get back, that a discovery has been made—and it may be of the greatest importance that I should have Franklin Blake at hand to appeal to if necessary. I intend to tell him, as soon as he wakes, that he must return with me to London. After all that has happened may I trust to your influence to back me?"

"Certainly!" I said.

Mr. Bruff shook hands with me and left the room. Betteredge followed him out.

I went to the sofa to look at Mr. Blake. He had not moved since I had laid him down and made his bed—he lay locked in a deep and quiet sleep.

While I was still looking at him I heard the bedroom door softly opened. Once more Miss Verinder appeared on the threshold in her pretty summer dress.

"Do me a last favor," she whispered. "Let me watch him with you."

I hesitated—not in the interests of propriety; only in the interest of her night's rest. She came close to me and took my hand.

"I can't sleep; I can't even sit still in my own room," she said. "Oh, Mr. Jennings, if you were me, only think how you would long to sit and look at him! Say yes! Do!"

Is it necessary to mention that I gave way? Surely not!

She drew a chair to the foot of the sofa. She looked at him in a silent ecstasy of happiness till the tears rose in her eyes. She dried her eyes, and said she would fetch her work. She fetched her work, and never did a single stitch of it. It lay in her lap—she was not even able to look away from him long enough to thread her needle. I thought of my own youth; I thought of the gentle eyes which had once looked love at me. In the heaviness of my heart I turned to my Journal for relief, and wrote in it what is written here.

So we kept our watch together in silence. One of us absorbed in his writing; the other absorbed in her love.

Hour after hour he lay in his deep sleep. The light of the new day grew and grew in the room, and still he never moved.

Toward six o'clock I felt the warning which told me that my pains were coming back. I was obliged to leave her alone with him for a little while. I said I would go up stairs and fetch another pillow for him out of his room. It was not a long attack this time. In a little while I was able to venture back and let her see me again.

I found her at the head of the sofa when I returned. She was just touching his forehead with her lips. I shook my head as soberly as I could, and pointed to her chair. She looked back at me with a bright smile and a charming color in her face. "You would have done it," she whispered, "in my place!"

* * * * * *

It is just eight o'clock. He is beginning to move for the first time.

Miss Verinder is kneeling by the side of the sofa. She has so placed herself that when his eyes first open they must open on her face.

Shall I leave them together?

Yes!

* * * * * *

Eleven o'clock.—They have arranged it among themselves; they have all gone to London by the ten o'clock train. My brief dream of happiness is over. I have awakened again to the realities of my friendless and lonely life.

I dare not trust myself to write down the kind words that have been said to me—especially by Miss Verinder and Mr. Blake. Besides, it is needless. Those words will come back to me in my solitary hours, and will help me through what is left of the end of my life. Mr. Blake is to write, and tell me what happens in London. Miss Verinder is to return to Yorkshire in the autumn (for her marriage, no doubt); and I am to take a holiday, and be a guest in the house. Oh me, how I felt it, as the grateful happiness looked at me out of her eyes, and the warm pressure of her hand said, "This is your doing!"

My poor patients are waiting for me. Back again, this morning, to the old routine! Back again, to-night, to the dreadful alternative between the opium and the pain!

God be praised for his mercy! I have seen a little sunshine—I have had a happy time.

NEW ENGLAND FACTORY LIFE.

When Charles Dickens was first in this country he made many examinations of our industrial and our humane institutions, our prison and our slavery systems; and when he returned home he published those famous "Notes," which we have been used to hear cried down as prejudiced and false, because they abused slavery and heartily condemned some other of our less terrible national crimes and social peculiarities. But among the things which he did not condemn was the New England factory system, as he saw it at Lowell, Massachusetts; and his chapter contrasting the laborers in the mills there and those in the mills at Manchester in Old England, is one of the most interesting passages in the "Notes." He narrates, with much more detail than we have room for, that he visited one of the factories "just as the dinner-hour was over, and the girls were returning to their work," and "the stair of the mill was thronged with them." He states that "they were well-dressed, but not, to my thinking, above their condition; they had serviceable bonnets, good, warm cloaks and shawls; they had the manners and deportment of young women, not of degraded brutes of burden." He describes the rooms in which they worked as being "as well ordered as themselves;" he tells that they were healthy, clean, and happy, and solemnly declares that "from all the crowd I saw in the different factories that day, I can not recall or separate one young face that gave me a painful impression." He has painted, too, their life in the boarding-houses of the town, their "joint-stock pianos," their "circulating libraries," their "newspaper and literary magazine, the Lowell Offering," and, altogether, has given a pleasant idea of their existence. And he illustrated his idea of their great numbers, and their holiday existence and attire, by stating that "on the occasion of a visit from General Jackson, or General Harrison," (he does not remember which), "he walked through three miles and a half of these young ladies, all dressed out with parasols and silk stockings."

This general account applies to factory life throughout all the Northeastern States, where, without doubt, it has less of horror, is accompanied by less of disease and misery contingent on the labor, and is better paid than in any other part of the world. Mr. Dickens, of course, could see only the bright side of the picture, seeing it as he did, and as all previously heralded observers who threaten to be critical necessarily must; but looking at the dark side—taking into consideration the troubles attendant on this as on all trades and all conditions of life—it is very certain that every considerate, thinking man will agree with Mr. Dickens that in these mills there are few young girls whom, assuming it to be a matter of necessity that they should gain their daily bread by the labor of their hands, he would remove if he had the power.

One of the most interesting sights to be witnessed in the various factory towns of the North is the dispersion of the hands at the conclusion of the day's work, or at "bell-time," as the hour is called by the operatives. Our artist has on page 472 illustrated such a scene with great power and effect, and his picture will prove a study to every intelligent reader. The scene sketched is at Lawrence, Massachusetts; the Washington Mills at that place employ about 2500 operatives, and it is these who are seen crossing the bridge over the run which supplies the water-power to the factory, and wending their way homeward. But the drawing will apply to dozens of New England factory towns: the same faces, the same costumes, the same characters may be seen at "bell-time" on the streets of every great manufacturing town in New England and the Middle States.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Now that the Fourth of July has fairly passed out of sight for this year, and the patriotic enthusiasm of the masses has measurably vanished with the rockets and Roman candles and the money expended for them, it may not be amiss for sensible people to consider whether the dignity of our nation might not be equally well sustained, and the real pleasure and comfort of our people greatly increased, by adopting such amusements in celebrating this anniversary as would not involve the utter destruction of so much money as has been, by the consent of the authorities, absolutely burnt up, on this last "Fourth," and on previous similar occasions. The people must, of course, celebrate the Nation's birthday. It is fitting and proper. They must have a holiday, and a good time; or at least make the attempt. It may be an old custom to make noisy demonstrations of joy; but old customs may be improved upon, and we are only improving by making more and more noise, and burning up more and more money every year. The city becomes unendurable to quiet folks on that day, and the most frightful accidents occur, to say nothing of the general discomfort which a dangerous powder-smoking demonstration really causes, but which so-called patriotism refuses to admit.

Of course it is not to be expected that Young America will give up all their booming cannons and fizzing fire-works; the young like noise and display. But may not those whose tastes have been refined and cultivated by years or education lend their influence in favor of more harmless and wholesome pleasures? There is a happy medium to be taken. Nobody would like to see the anniversary of American Independence pass wholly unobserved. Last year we survived the day amidst the incessant fire, fizzle, booming, cracking, and snapping of New York city. This year, while on an excursion with a party of trout-fishers amidst the mountains of Maine, we chanced, on the evening of July 3, to come to a pleasant little village, where we spent the night. Of course we expected early next morning to be aroused by sundry noisy demonstrations: on the contrary, no sound broke the stillness of the morning air. No gun, no pistol, no fire-cracker, no torpedo, no ringing bell, nothing! A Sabbath silence pervaded the place. Opposed as we are to a succession of hideous noises, we should have been glad to hear as much as a popgun. Perhaps something did happen there before the Fourth was past; we know not, for we left the place early in the day, wondering at this novel way of celebrating our independence. This is one extreme; the mode adopted in large cities, of spending thousands of dollars of the public money in exhibitions which are attended with more danger and exciting fatigue than wholesome enjoyment, is the other. Can not less money be burned up next year, and suitably-arranged excursions, and other health-giving pleasures, take in part the place of fire-works and warlike demonstrations?

It is estimated by competent judges that the total number of torpedoes manufactured in Greenpoint and Southold during the past year is between 110,000,000 and 120,000,000. They are sold to wholesale dealers, who ship them to all parts of the world. So long as they are kept dry torpedoes do not deteriorate by age, but on the contrary the volume of sound is increased. They range in price from thirty cents per thousand. Formerly the Southern States used to be one of the best markets for the sale of torpedoes, but the war changed all that. The manufacturers consume annually a large amount of silver, mostly American coin, in preparing the fulminating powder which explodes the torpedo on coming in contact with any hard substance; the premium on silver, joined with the high price of alcohol, tissue paper, and other material, at one time reduced the profits of the business to so low a figure as to cause a partial suspension, but it has since improved considerably.

The Falmouth Hotel, which has been recently opened in Portland, Maine, is one of the finest and most pleasantly-arranged hotels in the country. The Middle Street frontage is built of Albert stone, and the Union Street of brick, with iron columns and pilasters; being six stories high on the one street, and seven on the other. The building contains over two hundred and fifty rooms, which are warmed by steam, and in every way well-adapted to the comfort of the guests. At the opening of this hotel the doors were thrown open, and 1500 invited guests admitted to admire its arrangements. A delegation of about 600 persons came from Boston, by special train, on this occasion.

A beautiful piece of mechanism which has lately been exhibited in Boston is a miniature locomotive with tender, the former about fifteen inches and the latter about eight inches in length, composed of 188 ounces of silver and 37½ ounces of gold. It is a miniature representation, in exact symmetrical proportion, of "Engine No. 16" of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad, and in its most minute detail, even to the number of rivets, it accurately represents its great prototype. The engineer and fireman are seen at their posts, and are literally solid (silver) men. The locomotive stands upon a rose-wood box, within which is a music-box manufactured in Geneva, and when it commences playing the driving wheels and the eccentric rods and the working parts move in perfect unison to airs from the Grand Duchess, five of which are given, including "Le sabre de mon pere" and "J'aime le militaire." The value of this very beautiful piece of workmanship is $4500.

Every thing goes by fashion, especially in flighty Paris. Once it used to be the style for young ladies to look as if they were fed on rose-leaves and zephyrs. But those days are past. Now it is the fashion to like mutton-chops, beef-steaks, and good things generally. Of course this fashion will come across the waters, and our young ladies may yet look strong and healthy.

A very remarkable and interesting story is related of some New Hampshire sheep, which our readers are at liberty to believe or discredit as they please. A farmer, living in Salisbury, has a flock of twenty-eight sheep, which during the winter were housed in a place where their wool became filled with hay-seed. They have been out to pasture for several weeks past, and the excessive wet weather has caused the seed to sprout, and they are now bearing about with them a crop of grass two inches in length. It is thought that if the wet weather continues much longer the clover will blossom.

A Portland man has a mania for collecting pipes. He has 365 different varieties, consisting of meerschaum, brier, china, French clay, glass, and common clay dudeens.

Owners of greenbacks and bonds continue to hide them away in unsuspected places, sometimes to their own great annoyance and discomfort, if not with positive loss. A Willimantic man placed $700 in bonds and a bank-book, bearing $500 credit, in a pile of old magazines, which his wife a few days after sold to a peddler. Imagine the fear and trembling with which he posted to the peddler when he found it out! He succeeded, however, after some serious arguments, in recovering his property.

